NOTES OF THE DAY.

The Stage Society, which has just held another of its meetings, certainly helps on an intelligent interest in the many dramatic questions now in the air. And its existence increases our surprise that no really serious theatrical magazine is able to live. An attempt was made towards this end by the Theatre, which was founded by Mr. Frederick Hawkins, whose death this week we read with much regret. He had been at one time dramatic critic of The Times, and had written several books on dramatic subjects, such as "A Life of Edmund Kean," "Annals of the French Stage from its Origin to the Death of Racine," and "The French Stage in the Eighteenth Century."

* * * *

We may perhaps conclude that the failure of the Theatre, in spite of the fact that it had such competent editors as Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Addison Bright, and Mr. Clement Scott, proved that there is no room in England at the present time for a review devoted to the interests of the playhouse. The purely professional organs which record every little provincial performance, generally with the intimation that it was "much above the average," are understood to be very profitable properties. So are some of the organs that content themselves with retailing the scandals of the coulisses. But for the higher criticism of the drama there seems to be no great demand. Yet there is much wider interest in dramatic things than there used to be. We follow and discuss the [illegible] and the new men in French, German, Italian, Scandinavian, and Belgian drama, and we have theories which struggle to expression in "Elizabethan" and other "stage societies." Nevertheless, those who have something to say on the drama have to scramble for places in the other high-class magazines, and take their chance of being elbowed out by the writers on the Chinese crisis, the Settlement of South Africa, Ritualism, and Cadet Corps.

* * * *

How warmly the public is concerned with dramatic questions is shown in the Fortnightly Review for July. One sign of that concern is the growing recognition of the fact that we do not do Shakespeare justice in our so-called "Shakespearian revival." Mr. Tree, however, who writes on "The Staging of Shakespeare," claims the public taste for his own method. He frankly does not care what may be the opinion "of literary experts as revealed in print," he is all for "public opinion as revealed by the coin of the realm." The despised literary experts will probably turn with much more interest to Professor Lewis Campbell's article in the same review on "Climax in Tragedy," especially if they have been reading Mr. Courtney's little book on "The Idea of Tragedy," about which Mr. Walkley writes in another column. We can only here state the point raised by Professor Campbell—viz., that the so-called "Climax" of the classical tragedies is never the close of the play. The other method is probably due to the introduction of a certain—though Professor Campbell does not admit this. Anyhow, the old tradition was that a great production should end quietly. The dramatist works up to a crisis, and then is not afraid of the sequel when excitement and curiosity may give way to sympathy and awe. Shakespeare was in the classical tradition [illegible] those are apt to forget who complain of the lingering close of his tragedies.

* * * *

The Stage Society performance brought an exhilarating experience. As Mr. George Bernard Shaw humorously remarked on the fall of the curtain, they lived for three hours or so in the London of 1919. Candida, now produced for the first time on metropolitan boards is one of the four "Pleasant Plays" by Mr. Shaw. It was written in 1891, and at that time a prominent actor-manager predicted that a quarter of a century later Candida would be played successfully to crowded houses. In his words of thanks at the close Mr. Shaw explained another matter, namely, that the Bishop of London alluded to in the play is not Dr. Creighton—a man too wide-minded to keep a clergyman "[illegible] . . . . although the poor fellow's not a bit more religious" than the Rev. James Mavor Morell, Candida's well-meaning husband. Mr. Shaw's reputation for humour stands him in request at times; more than once the audience—regarded by some as of more than average intelligence—laughed at awkward moments. The cast was excellent. It we mistake not, Mr. Granville Barker, who as the scatter-brained, [illegible] past Empire Matrimonials was a signal success, was the only one fresh to the part. To provincial audiences Mr. Charles Cherrington had been supposed as Morell, Miss Janet Achurch as Candida, Mr. Robert Farquharson as the curate. Is Mr. Bernard Shaw serious in this play or is he laughing at us all the time? As to the answer there may certainly be two opinions. For our part, while admitting the unfortunate presence of certain Shavisms, we cannot but think that the aim is to reveal the foundations of Morell's self-satisfaction, his complacency builded on sand. There is something more than sparkling and incisive dialogue, there is genuine psychological development. After Maeterlinck's Intruder and The Death of Tintagiles, to say nothing of Hauptmann's doleful The Coming of Peace—wherein, by the way, Frau Beehner is supposed to fall in love with her daughter's ill-fated fiancé, William—Candida, with its serious levity, was welcome.

As was expected, Mr. Walter Raleigh, Professor of Modern Literature at University College, Liverpool, and some time Professor of English Literature at the Mahomedan Anglo-Oriental college, Aligarh, has been appointed to succeed Professor Dudley in the Chair of English Language and Literature at Glasgow. Mr. Raleigh is best known to the general reader by his book on Style and his University Extension manual dealing with "The English Novel." No better appointment could have been made.

* * * *

Two recent protests in a matter of literary ethics may be noted together for the humour of their coincidence. Miss Corelli, with an indignant eye on Mr. Kipling and others, protests in a "Social Note on the War" against the "self-advertisers who are posting their names in large print on Tommy's uniform," and bids them "stop bill-sticking while he is fighting." Meanwhile another writer has been protesting against a scene in Miss Corelli's new romance "Boy," for making romantic capital of contemporary death scenes in South Africa, going so far as to introduce the name of Lieutenant Roberts; and this writer bids the novelist stop sentimentalizing and sensation-mongering, while the soldiers are dying. There is something pertinent about motes and beams in a book which Miss Corelli describes as "a very old book in the world which notwithstanding its age is always called new."

* * * *

On the eighty-sixth anniversary of the publication of "Waverley" it is pleasant to welcome the appearance of one more in the unending series of new editions of the "Waverley Novels." This comes from Messrs. Macmillan, but, though it bears their imprint for the first time, it is not strictly a new edition. It is, in fact, the "Border Edition" furnished with introductions and notes by Mr. Andrew Lang for Mr. Nimmo some half dozen years ago, the rights whereof Messrs. Macmillan have acquired. It is in twenty-four volumes with 250 illustrations. "'Tis Sixty Years and More Since" Sir Walter died, so neither Mr. Nimmo nor Messrs. Macmillan nor Mr. Lang himself fall under the condemnation by Mr. Lang pronounced on the body-snatching publishers who fall upon works fresh out of copyright, and on the backs of editors who add and abet them by writing notes and introductions. In the matter of Scott and his descendants Mr. Lang has before expressed that he has a clear conscience; and in his amusing remarks in Longman's Magazine this month he explains again that he will not be afraid to meet Sir Walter in the Elysian shades, dwelling in a community of old associations of country side, Border and friends.

* * * *

The face of Chaucer puts the temperate heart and the kind countenance of Hamlet to shame. The traditional portrait, as engraved by W. J. Linton, appears still on the cover of Macmillan's Magazine. But it can be only an approximate likeness for it seems from a portrait drawn only from memory by the poet Occleve at Hoccleve, one the Chaucer's contemporary. The whole page in which it appears in Occleve is, for the first time, reproduced by Mr. M. H. Spielmann in a first article on Chaucer's portraits in the Magazine of Art. Mr. Spielmann's entire essay, which promises to be an instructive one, is to be issued by the Royal Society of Literature. May we suggest to Mr. Spielmann that, should the essay be reprinted, he might revise the following sentence:—"The best likeness that is presented to us of Chaucer, then, is the limning, or what we would nowadays call 'water-colour drawing,' which he introduced into his book 'De Regimine Principis'"? The sentence is preceded by a longish paragraph which has no reference to Occleve at all; and Chaucer did not write the "De Regimine Principis." Nor, for the matter of that, did Occleve. His work was "De Regimine Principum."

* * * *

The Cumnock Express is very wroth with Literature for having dared to refer disparagingly to Covenanting poetry. In a sentence as perspicuous as it is grammatical, the journal observes:—

> As a Cockney critic, he (with the usual ignorance but full-blown presumption of his class) has just now been telling the world, the columns of Literature, that "all Covenanting, or Cameronian poetry, save 'The Cameronian Dream'—the bard of Crawick—is wretched stuff" (judging all, we suppose, from the low, grovelling, gutter standard of "The Absent-Minded Beggar").

The Cumnock critic has not even taken the trouble to quote correctly. What was stated in Literature was that "Most of the Cameronian and Covenanting poetry of Scotland is wretched stuff, almost the solitary exception, certainly the only outstanding exception," being Hyslop's poem "The Cameronian Dream." It may be unfortunate for the Covenanters, but the statement is strictly accurate. However, tastes differ. The Cumnock Express as "proof of the utter falseness of that verdict" (of Literature) gives some lines from a "stirring account of the Battle of Drumclog, by Mr. Hugh Brown, a Galston schoolmaster of some sixty years ago." The following samples bear eloquent testimony to the beauty of Covenanting poetry:—

> Roused by the rolling of the distant drum,
> Breathless the watcher cried, "The foemen come!"
> One short, but fervent, hurried sigh they breathed,
> Folded their Bibles, and their swords unsheathed.
> Along Drumclog the soldiers' proud array
> Of glittering armature flung back the day;
> The prancing war-steed proudly pawed the heath,
> And felt afar the battle's burning breath;
> Oppression's steelgirt bandit undismayed,
> With jest and scorn the peasant ranks surveyed.
> . . . . .
> But a moment they paused, and they lion-like sprung
> From the lair they were kneeling upon;
> And the glens and the rocks with the wild music rung
> As they chanted a psalm and rushed on.

The Cumnock Express is quite correct in assuming that Literature will pronounce these lines "wretched stuff." All Covenanting poetry, however, it is only fair to say, is not quite so bad as this. But there is some even worse—for example, the lines referred to by Sir Walter Scott in "Old Mortality." Two verses of this "awful example" are sufficient for quotation:—

> They marched east through Lithgow-town
> For to enlarge their forces;
> And sent for all the north country
> To come, both foot and horses.
> . . . . .
> When they were all provided well,
> In armour and ammunition,
> Then thither wester did they come
> Most cruel of intention.

The fact is that the greatest kindness that can be shown to the bulk of Covenanting poetry is to leave it alone.

It was an excellent idea to represent Sir Thomas More's residences at Bucklersbury and Chelsea in the memorial stained glass window recently unveiled in the church of St. Lawrence Jewry. More was born in Milk-street, Cheapside, and lived in Bucklersbury for some years after his marriage, prior to purchasing Crosby-place. In The Merry Wives of Windsor Shakespeare makes Falstaff allude to the traders in herbs for which in his day Bucklersbury was famous: "Come, I cannot cog, and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lisping hawthorn-buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple time." The Chancellor's house at Chelsea, built in 1521, stood at the north end of Beaufort-row. Erasmus has left a record of his life here:—

> He converses with his wife, his son, his daughter-in-law, his three daughters and their husbands, with eleven grandchildren—a goodly household, in truth. There is not any man living so affectionate as he, and he loveth his old wife as well as if she was a young maid. . . . I should rather call his house a school, or a university of Christian religion, for though there is none therein but readeth or studieth the liberal sciences, their special care is piety and virtue; there is no quarrelling or intemperate words heard; that worthy gentleman doth not govern with proud and lofty words, but with well-timed and courteous benevolence; everybody performeth his duty, yet there is always alacrity; neither is sober mirth anything wanting.

This is a fascinating word-picture of More's life in his quiet Chelsea retreat, where Henry VIII. often visited him.

Renan, the life-long friend of M. Berthelot, is said to have written the following epitaph for that great chemist and philosopher:

Ci-Git
M. Berthelot.
This is the only place which he never solicited.

—a superscription, the exact opposite of Piron's well-known epitaph on himself:—"Il ne fut rien, pas même académicien." Anyhow, M. Berthelot has now another title to add to the prodigious list which Renan so shortly summarized. He has been elected to the French Academy. Nineteen votes were cast for him. Nine academicians abstained, and eleven did not turn up to vote. Among the latter was M. de Freycinet, in spite of his pretensions to be himself a man of science. This illustrates the kind of bias which ever since Renan's death has prevented M. Berthelot's entrance into the Academy. He had wished to succeed Renan, but the Catholic and Conservative wing of the Academy rallied round M. Brunetière, whose views on "la faillite de la science" had been demolished by M. Berthelot, and black-balled one of the greatest scientific men of the day. To-day, M. Berthelot, in spite of the nationalist cabal against him, takes his revenge.

The "Dictionary of National Biography."

The issue of the final volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography," which we notice elsewhere, leads one to look at the undertaking as a whole. Perhaps we can pay no higher compliment to those who are responsible for it than to say that their achievement is by no means confined to the production of a standard dictionary of English worthies. The inception of the work, its steady and business-like execution, and its reception by the public mark something like an epoch in English literary history. Never before, we may safely say, has the chief magistrate of the City of London found in the publication of the last volume of a book an occasion which called for public and honourable recognition. Few publications, even in an age when collaboration is the fashion, have brought together so many distinguished writers; none certainly have done more to organize research and turn it to a practical use. Mr. Lee, who has himself, in addition to his very exacting editorial work, written an amount equal to three volumes of the Dictionary, gives a full record of the names and labours of his collaborators. Masses of historical evidence, unheard and unthought of by older students, are being unveiled before us at the present day; and new avenues of discovery are still being opened up. The task of the contributors has been to attack [illegible] of data on a careful and organized scheme, each with his own special goal before him, pursuing his own special quarry from place to place, from book to book, from manuscript to manuscript, catching at every hint which may open up new lines of inquiry, every gleam which may throw a side-light however faint upon the subject, and never permitting himself to be drawn away into by paths or to roam at large over the enticing pastures of historical personalia. To those who have worked for the Dictionary we owe this great object lesson, as it were, in methods of study, and in the zealous search for, and the businesslike handling of, evidence—a feature particularly illustrated by the exhaustive bibliographical matter contained on every page. Equally creditable to English culture is the origin of this great enterprise. The public, accustomed to see the volumes appearing every quarter with unfailing regularity, have been content to note the rapidity and completeness with which the editor and his staff were doing their work, and did not, in their admiration for the successful strategy displayed, inquire too curiously how the sinews of war were provided. Mr. Lee's preface gives us the story. The conception of the Dictionary was entirely that of Mr. George Smith. After some forty years' experience as a publisher in the firm of Smith, Elder, and Co., he was the first seriously to face a task of national importance, the need of which had been universally recognized. A certain boldness in embarking upon new ventures is inseparable from the publishing business. But the magnitude of the undertaking to which Mr. Smith set his hand eighteen years ago must have surpassed anything recorded in the recent history of modern publishing. It "satisfied none of the conditions of a merely commercial undertaking." Roughly, it promised to involve, and did involve, an outlay, unremunerative as far as material profit was concerned, of some seventy thousand pounds. Mr. Smith, however, put his hand to the plough and did not look back. Throughout the progress of the work he has, "says Mr. Lee, "ignored considerations of profit and loss in providing for its conduct to a successful issue." The business of publishing, like any other business, may be conducted by many methods. Some of them may provoke criticism, and the relations between authors and publishers may, as we know, lead to controversy and misunderstanding. Publishers may complain that authors are not always mindful of what is due to them. Authors may assert that the position of the publisher is solely that of the business agent of the author. Nothing can tend more to raise to a higher level the dealings between publisher and author than the public spirited claim made by Mr. George Smith of his right, when an opportunity arises to do a great public service, to be something more than a mere agent of the author. We are far from saying that such a display of public spirit is unique among publishers; but its magnitude certainly calls for special recognition. It has often been pointed out that a literary enterprise of this kind might well have been subsidized by the State as similar enterprises have been subsidized abroad, and that [illegible] in accordance with the independence of the British [illegible] should be due to the liberality and energy of individuals. One conclusion to be drawn from the completed Dictionary is, we believe, that the system on which it has been published is for the most likely to produce workmanlike results—and some features of the State-aided Historical Manuscripts Commission seem to confirm this view. Certainly such a spontaneous action on the part of private citizens exerts a highly stimulating influence on the literary life of England—whether we look at the share of the publisher who conceived and fostered the Dictionary, to at that of the contributors who have produced so fine a monument of literary skill and research, or at that of the editors Mr. Leslie Stephen, Mr. Sidney Lee, and their assistants, who have so well accomplished the extremely difficult and delicate task of organizing, revising, and completing this great collection of biographies.

Personal Views.

HISTORY—OLD AND NEW.

Once, some fifty years ago, when a man was born into the world, an enthusiastic relation turned to the mother and asked anxiously—the first and only vital question—"Will he love his Macaulay?" Will any one in the coming years speculate eagerly on an infant's probable affection for—shall we say—his Seeley? Or is there any living historian about whom the ordinary reader cares two straws?

If we come to think of it, this is rather a serious question. History, we assume, is meant to be read, and not merely crammed for examination, or discussed by a few specialists. Yet the tendency of the English Historical School, the disciples of Freeman especially, is so to write that he who runs certainly will not read. Indeed, to judge by the tone of some of the most modern historical teachers, they would prefer not to be read save by the initiated, and a literary presentment of their real and indisputable learning is the last thing they desire. To hear them talk about "mere popularizing" one would think that they constituted some esoteric mystery whose art was to conceal their knowledge. There is evidently, to the elect, something vulgar in being readable; and the resources of style, the effects of rhetoric, all the light and shade of chosen language are the meretricious tricks of the sciolist. They do not "love their Macaulay," they positively abhor their Froude, they can scarcely tolerate even their Grote.

We cannot help thinking that there must be something wrong about this. As it seems to us, modern historical scholars are forgetting the essential in their zeal for accurate detail. What is history for (we are not now referring to oral teaching or the preparation for examinations) unless to give the mass of mankind broad and instructive views of how men lived and acted and dealt with the problems of their age? And how can the desultory reader of these days, pampered with periodical "piffle," be induced to take an interest in this vital and philosophic study, unless the results of research are set before him with all the power of a great mind and all the fascination of a noble style? No attempt at such a presentment of history seems to be made by the modern "Fachmann." The new style of historian edits texts—a necessary preparation of material; elaborates episodes and minor details—all excellent pioneering work: prepares short text-books full of carefully verified facts—useful, no doubt, to the examinee, not to say his examiner. But all this no more makes a History than the squaring of stone, and plumbing of walls, and designing of dados make a house. The master builder of history, like the Comassian mason, appears to be an extinct species.

No one who has any true understanding of the work to be done will undervalue the important labours of the modern school of historical research. The scrupulous editions of fundamental texts, the scholarly and unbiassed examination and collation of every authority and every statement, the collection and verification of documents, the stern rejection of glosses and inauthentic records—all these are of incalculable service to the Historian who is to be. Nor is it fair to reproach the young researchers for busying themselves with the details rather than with the ensemble. The truth is that the immense accumulation of new materials, the lately opening of the manuscript collections of all Europe to the inquirer, the monthly publication, in scientific periodicals devoted to research all over the world, of new discoveries of documents and new lights or new interpretations of disputed points, have for the time overwhelmed conscientious students. As a writer in Literature said some time ago (11 June, 1898) "In wandering through untrodden paradises, they have completely lost their way. They give us masses of undigested, incoordinate facts, but no History. This is the natural result of too hasty, too indiscriminate absorption, and the attacks which are sometimes levelled at what is called the Oxford School of History are scarcely philosophical. Historical students have to go through this stage, till they get abreast of their materials. Then comes the process of coordination, of generalization, of refining the gold from the dross—the process of reducing History out of matériaux pour servir."

The mistake is to confound the matériaux pour servir with the resulting History. As well might one take the tuning of the fiddles for the symphony itself. And the danger is that the people who are now tuning the fiddles are trying to convince the world that all the old symphonies, composed before the new orchestra was perfected, are radically bad music. One might equally argue that because various modern improvements in wind instruments, or in organ stops, were not then invented, John Sebastian Bach could not write a Mass or an organ fugue! In music, whilst we wonder and admire as we hear the marvellous new effects produced in the modern orchestra in the hands of a Wagner or a Tchaikowsky, under the baton of a Richter, we do not dismiss as obsolete the great conceptions of the earlier composers, though expressed in a more limited range. And it is so with History. Whilst we welcome every new fact, every correction or verification, every clearance of rubbish heaps and exploration of purlieux, we cannot afford to neglect the great works in which the master-minds of the past have surveyed the progress of the world. Minor inaccuracies, inadequate materials, even political bias are as nothing in the scale against the illumination which comes from the working of a large mind upon the large facts of history. Lord Acton has well said that History is "not a rope of sand but a continuous development, not a burden on the memory but an illumination of the soul." There is too much microscopic poring over grains of sand, nowadays, and too little "illumination of the soul." To get large views and profound reflections we must still turn back to the old masters. Thoroughly to grasp the historical teaching of men like Arnold, Thirlwall, and Grote is an education in itself, a veritable "illumination of the soul." We will not even part with our Motley, our Froude, or our Macaulay. Granted that there are mistakes in detail, personal prejudices, and even serious misrepresentation, and that a vast amount of new material has come to light since their days, still their works remain imperishable, because they are theirs. Whole shelves of accurate little text-books by modern scholars will not train the mind in history as it is trained by the study of the works of the great Historians. These men, for the most part, looked out upon the field of past events and developments from the fortress of a mind deeply versed in human affairs, profoundly acquainted with all that was best and wisest in the literature and thought of the past. They approached their subject as philosophers, and treated it on the grand scale. Work so conceived and prepared can never become obsolete, let the specialists discover never so newly. Hence the old masters are read, and will be read.

Indeed, it seems to us that specialism, developed too early, is at the root of the present dearth of broad historians. The mind must be trained in great things before it deals with small, must endeavour to grasp the universal before it descends to the particular. In the present day we appear to be reversing the process. We labour an acre before we try to understand the earth. We toil at a "period," elaborate an incident, before we endeavour to grasp the broad principles and immutable laws of human progress. And our lack of philosophy is equalled by our want of culture. Your modern historical student is proud to be master of a few years, or a few reigns, of a single branch of a single race of mankind. With the literature, the thought, of the rest he has no concern. The inevitable result is that his minor studies of details lack not only philosophic grasp but literary sympathy. His fellow students will read and applaud—or demolish—his learned lucubrations, but the great mass of educated men will never hear of him. The historian requires more than the elaborate documentary apparatus of which he is justly proud. He needs a philosophical training, and a literary culture; and, until the modern historical school realizes these essential conditions, we cannot expect that it will produce a masterpiece. The last thing we would defend is superficial study or mere literary charm. The more accurate in detail a history is, the more worthy is it of its high function. But it is better that great views of history, even if only approximately accurate, should go home to the minds of the mass of educated men than that they should live on, ignorant of the past. History is not an affair for dilettantism, nor yet for the private edification of the few. It is for all mankind. And to reach mankind it must be treated largely and humanely. It must not be merely a collection of bare facts, but philosophy and literature in one—"an illumination of the soul."

WOMEN POETS OF TO-DAY.

Critics, since the art of criticism began, have puzzled over the true nature of poetry, but few of them have omitted from their attempted definitions the word emotion. "The true expression of true feeling" is the chosen formula of Mr. Edmond Holmes, the latest writer who essays to answer the question "What is poetry?" Why, then, is poetry the creation of one sex in so much larger degree than of the other? Women surely have as true a gift of expression as men; of sensitiveness to emotion they are acknowledged to possess a larger share. In imaginative prose as represented by fiction they have for long more than held their own, and perhaps in the higher art their day is yet to come. At any rate, it is interesting to mark the signs of the times. Mrs. Humphry Ward, in her recent speech at the Women Writers' Club, was hopeful for the future. Space forbade us to give any portion of the speech verbatim in our reference to it last week, but as only a brief report of it has appeared in the Press our readers will, we think, be interested to read her review of the past and her estimate of women poets of to-day.

Mrs. Ward is ready to admit that they are "minor poets," yet "how much this means in a day when so much is demanded! Look back at the times of Mrs. Hemans, of Caroline Bowles, and L.E.L. . . . Look back to the nine women poets—the nine Muses of their day—reviewed by the Quarterly in 1810, in that tone of compassion half mocking, half patronizing, the mere disappearance of which to-day is in itself a landmark. Among these poets, indeed, was Mrs. Browning; and for all his masculine scorn, let us just say in passing that the reviewer had no eyes whatever for Mrs. Browning's true place among his motley band. Take, however, some of the rest—a certain Lady Emmeline, for instance—for whose 'talents,' the Quarterly has 'sincere respect'—while it ventures to mock the 'fevered woe' of 'her ladyship's' verse, and to urge upon her ladyship a little closer attention both to metre and to rhythm. Still, Lady Emmeline gets her four pages from the Quarterly, and had apparently earned them by not entirely unsuccessful efforts much relished by the public. One stanza of her poetry may give us the perspective. Like all other poets, she sings of the lark, but the strain of Wordsworth and Shelley pales beside Lady Emmeline's:—

> And thou'rt compelled deep dreams of poesy and pride
> Even from the soul's abysses! forth they rise—
> Delights, and Hopes, and Shadowy Memories,
> Speechless Abstractions, Terrors, Sublimities, Chaos,
> Imaginations borne on seraph plumes!
> Passions, and Ecstasies, and keen Perceptions,
> And lightning-pinioned Pleasures and Conceptions,
> And starry Ardours, breathless Expectations,
> Beatitudes, and fervid Adorations,
> And bright Amazements, that, transfixed and still,
> Yet with a rapture of Assurance thrill!

"Prodigious! All one can say is that Lady Emmeline's lark would not to-day thrill Vigo-street to rapture. Or I turn to an Annual of 1826—'Friendship's Offering'—which contains a poem by Ruskin, Macaulay's 'Armada,' and a contribution by Alfred Tennyson—good company enough! Amongst the women are Mrs. Howitt, Mrs. Norton, and L.E.L.; but there is also a Miss Sarah Stickney, who writes on a pet squirrel, and it is to her artless verse that again you come upon the simplest and truest detect the public:—

> My own little pet
> How oft have we met
> Here in the woodland among the sweet flowers;
> Why should we sever,
> Since can we never
> Hope to find brighter or happier hours.
> Go and be free,
> Like the bird and the bee,
> Sport in the sunshine among the sweet flowers;
> But sometimes return to
> The spot our hearts yearn to
> For this was the scene of our happiest hours.

"Life was certainly less strenuous when those verses emerged unabashed by the side of Mr. Alfred Tennyson. Take up almost the first volume under your hand from Mr. Lane or Mr. Grant Richards. Compare with these verses of 1810 some lines written by a woman of to-day—not yet as well known as she will be, when her gift is fully ripe, and if she does not unduly press her talent—

APRIL. (By Nora Hopper.)

I flood with gold the gorses,	I open all [illegible] alone,
With rain the water-courses,	I quicken the [illegible];
And I restrain	The cloud that [illegible]
With silver rein	[illegible]
The wild sea-horses.	My [illegible]
I am the blackbird singing,	I am the [illegible]
I am the grasses swinging;	The wild [illegible];
I am the spur	No [illegible]
Sets reeds astir	Dare soar, as I
And bluebells ringing.	Their [illegible]
I quicken in their graves	I flood with gold the [illegible],
Seeds that the winter saves:	With rain the [illegible],
Flags for me stay;	And I restrain
The budding May	With silver [illegible]
My coming craves.	The wild sea-horses.

"It is true that by 1810 Emily Bronte had written the school-girl poem containing the expressive verse beginning 'A little and a lone green lane,' and Mrs. Browning had written 'Cowper's Grave.' But the general standard was so low—for the women—that only genius of the highest kind could manage to be tolerable. Now—what gift, what genius, what accomplishment is left a dozen women, writing in England to-day, that we could all of us name without much stopping to think!—whether it be the passive and intimate beauty of which Mrs. Meynell has the secret, or the [illegible] and lyric charm of Nora Hopper, or the lovely ease, invention, and [illegible] of Moira O'Neill, or the Celtic wildness and melody of Katharine Tynan's verse, or the intensity of maternal feeling that speaks in Miss Lawless, or the noble and beautiful poems that the world owes to the author of 'A Village Tragedy.' What in Mrs. Hemans or Mrs. Norton—full of rhetorical strength and passion though Mrs. Norton was—is worth, judged by any standard of pure literature, the 'Corrymeela' of Moira O'Neill, or Mrs. Wood's 'To the Forgotten Dead,' or Mrs. Meynell's 'Renouncement?' It is not that the older poets were not women to feel and see the world; but the great singers of the beginning of the century had not yet done their work; the 'pure Greek wine' of Keats, the magic of Shelley, the music of the Elizabethans had still to freshen the poetic sense of England, and so create those capacities and those delicate perceptions of heart and ear which are at work for us to-day. And now how interesting to notice the Celtic admixture in this growth of poetry among women! Three or four of those I have named are in fact Irishwomen, and the Celtic yearning, the Celtic spell, is in their voices.

"Perhaps sometimes—if we are in a critical mood—if we are musing on the dangers of the future as well as its promise—we may ask ourselves whether the range of this modern verse is yet wide and varied enough. We may weary of its introspection. We may say with the brutal Quarterly of 1840 that 'there is a great difference between writing always from the heart and always about the heart, even the heart of a woman of genius'; we may ask sometimes for a wider content, a sterner, more penetrating reflection of this astonishing or tragic world; we may see in the poems of an Italian writer of the present day, Ada Negri, how many new themes still await the hand of the Englishwoman, themes torn—like Mrs. Browning's Italian poems—from the living fibre of common and national life. But whatever wants and weaknesses the critical conscience will admit amongst our poets—and certainly not in the women only!—there can be no question at all as to the astonishing rise of level and of standard. All round us, and in most arts, it is not a day of great and solitary genius, it is a day of much high talent, of exquisitely-trained faculty. The poems of our generation are shorter than of old; the subjects with which they deal are subtlety and lightness itself. Our poets, men and women, have taken the advice that Corinna gave to Pindar—'to sow from the hand, and not from the bag,' to offer beauty in delicate measure, to avoid all gross superfluity. The latter half of the century has seen a growth of song among us like the Elizabethan. But—let us note this striking difference—in the Elizabethan outburst the women of England had no part. Research, indeed, may discover here and there a stray copy of verses by a woman; but, as a rule, you may search the Elizabethan song-books—'England's Helicon,' 'The Paradise of Dainty Devices,' Breton's 'Bower of Delights,' and what not—you will find no women there to take her part in that great kindling of verse which made England, under the rule of one of the rebels of women, a nest of singing birds. But now in the great spread of poetry among us moderns—of the delight in it and the power for it—women are no longer content to be sung to; they also must sing, and sing with the best. We will not claim, as the women of old Greece might, that Corinna has defeated [illegible]; but at least she sings again in the same divine contest with Pindar, she moves in the same world of high and living [illegible], and in her art to-day all we poor mortals of a lower earth, we strong she-wolf, the dusty ways of prose, are proud and glad."

THE DECAY OF FABLE-WRITING.

It is somewhat curious to note that the two earliest forms of literary art to come to maturity have both in these latter days fallen into disuse. The Epic is no longer written for lack of subject, men say; while as for the fable, the poor little fable," it seems nowadays to be quite despised. And yet it is in some respects surprising that it should be so. For in truth a well-considered apologue contains more art to the square inch than any other form of literary composition, and more wisdom too. But Gnosis, perhaps, has the best reason why fable-writing is a neglected if not a forgotten art. For the art in it is not artifice, nor the wisdom mere wise-acreage. The first fabulists were doubtless men who lived the simple lives of farmers, shepherds, gardeners, and the like; who were brought daily in contact with Nature, with the birds of the air and the beasts of the field, that seem to have been the work of her 'prentice hand ere she tried it on man—the alphabet, as it were, of which man, the compound word, is made up. It was the child-man of earlier times, nature's own philosopher, who, seeing this play-alphabet in animals, tried to put the letters together, in order to spell out the larger meaning—himself, and in so doing he hit upon the fable. And it was because he was so intimate with the animals, studied them so closely, and loved them so well, that he was able to make such beautiful fables.

But the apologue did not come all at once. There were steps and stages in its evolution. Some opine that it may have been helped into existence by that doctrine, so implicitly mixed up with the life and thought of the East, whence the fable first came, which sends the souls of men for their purification into the bodies of the lowlier creatures. That doctrine must undoubtedly have added to the verisimilitude as well as to the interest of the fable. It could not be otherwise when both the narrator and his hearers felt that behind the animal mask one of themselves was speaking—one, perchance, who had been near if not known to them. From regarding animals in such a light it is an easy step to the belief that they are endowed with language. Certain species of birds, like the rook, the swallow, seem to indicate its possession. Whence comes their need of society if they have not the power of making themselves mutually understood? To the believer in metempsychosis nothing would be more natural than to credit them with such a gift, nor bound as we are together in one long chain of moral being to make them talk for the instruction and edification of men.

Montaigne tells us that "our wisdom derives from the animals the most useful instruction in the greatest as well as the most necessary parts of life." And in truth one can imagine a philosopher who was in the habit of contrasting the beauty, the innocence, and the happiness everywhere manifest amongst the humbler members of creation, with man's intrigues, his hates and his crimes—comparing the gentle and harmless squirrel, perched on the swaying branch of a fir, with the mischievous schoolboy creeping stealthily behind with his ready catapult, or the graceful fawn, peacefully cropping the foliage of a pendulous bough, with the gunner taking careful aim to lay it low; one can imagine such a nature-lover figuring to himself the look of the stricken deer or the wounded squirrel as with failing breath it reproaches its slayer with his barbarism. So much only is it necessary to imagine—and behold the fable invented!

Nor is it a forced imagination to suppose the first fabulist was an Indian Brahmin—one of those to whom, more than any other, the lower world is chained in moral purpose with ourselves. Certain it is that the most ancient fables we have come from Hindustan. A collection which has enjoyed great celebrity is the Arab version named Kalila wa Dimna, which contains a number of apologues much more developed than those of the Greeks. They comprise a complete system of morals: and it is curious to note that, arising out of the doctrine of transmigration, the animal dramatis personæ are endowed with the most delicate sentiments, the loftiest ideas, and thoughts the most complex and profound. But the Kalila wa Dimna is itself only a translation, being derived from another composed in Hindustan at a time altogether beyond our ken. The Panchatantra, as it is called, or the Five Sacred Books, is reputed to have been originally written in Sanscrit by a mythical Brahmin named Vishnu Sarma. This primitive work gave birth to another more modern, but still very ancient, and likewise written in Sanscrit, named the Hitopadesa, of which there are several English translations. It is a perfect chaplet of fables strung together after the manner of the Arabian Nights tales. From this collection, popularly known as Bidpai's fables, translations were made into Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Turkish, and Persian. An Arab version was produced under the Calif Mansour with the title already cited of Kalila wa Dimna. The Greek version is that known as Æsop's. These two form the chief source whence the moderns have derived their material.

Æsop is said to have lived in the sixth century B.C., but there is considerable doubt whether such a person ever lived. The name is interpreted as signifying the Wise One. Curiously enough there is another fabulist, well known wherever the Arabs have set their feet, named Lokman, who, like Æsop, is reputed to have been a slave, hunchbacked, and very ugly. Some have gone so far as to hold that Lokman and Æsop are one and the same, and the supposition is the more plausible because the name Lokman, like the word Æsop, is said to mean the Sage or Wise. But this maze of identification goes still further, for proofs are drawn from etymology, as well as from the resemblance of Phœnician, Hebrew, and Arab names, to show that this Lokman is as likely as not to be King Solomon. Moreover, making comparison of identities and the similarity of anecdotes relating to each, the conclusion is reached that Solomon was no other than Joseph, who became Governor of Egypt under Pharaoh. But, returning to Æsop, we are shown how great is the resemblance between Æsop and Joseph, not only as regards their names, but in respect also to their fortunes; both being in their youth sold into slavery, and bringing prosperity to the house of their masters; both envied, persecuted, and pardoning their enemies; both foreseeing in dreams their future greatness, and both through those dreams being freed from slavery; both excelling in the art of interpreting hidden things; and, finally, both favourites and ministers, the one of Pharaoh, and the other of the King of Babylon. Whether we accept these perhaps fanciful identifications or not, it is nevertheless interesting to note the fact that the names Bidpai, Lokman, Æsop are all similar in signification, that each of the wise men so named relates identical fables, and that they are in the main beast fables. They are similar, too, in construction, inasmuch as they are, body and soul—that is, story and moral—so knit together as to be self-illumining.

But there is one particular in which the Æsopian fable differs from the Indian. It has lost the sympathy, the pathos, the sentiment of its more ancient exemplar, of which "The Two Pigeons" is a good specimen. The narrator has no longer in the back of his head, so to speak, the feeling or belief that his beast interlocutor may be one of his kith and kin. The Æsopian apologue is all pure wit and worldly wisdom. Still it was eminently suited to the genius of the people for whom it was fashioned. With them it was an aid to rhetoric. To that use Aristotle reserves it: and, as we know, Plato, whilst banishing Homer from his ideal Republic, admits Æsop as an indispensable teacher of morals.

In this respect the fable in modern hands has undergone a change; it has passed over from rhetoric to poetry. No modern writer of fables has attained to any eminence save by the quality of his poetry, his humour, or his satire. The few who have excelled may be numbered on the fingers of one hand, and pre-eminent on the forefinger stands La Fontaine. His fables are little poems, full of wit, humour, beauty, tingling with verve, so luisant with esprit that every now and again in his

> Ample comédie à cent actes divers,
> Et dont la scène est l'univers, we seem to see as in the Indian apologue the human soul behind the animal mask. How much is this the case in "La Cigale et la Fourmi," and hardly less in "Maître Corbeau." But the quality here noted is rare in the modern fable. All the refinements and elaborations of later authors are beside the fable pure and simple. They amuse, entertain, possibly instruct, but by something added, not essentially of the fable. As Gay with us, so Yriarte in the Spanish, Pignotti with the Italians—their fables are graceful, sprightly, versatile; but at best they can only be described as clever literary exercises. Kriloff's stand somewhat apart, lifted to the height of genius by the keenness of their satire on Russian society.

Other modern fable writers are little more than names. In German, Hagedorn and Gellert are almost forgotten; and it would Lessing as fabulist be forgotten but for his commanding eminence in other departments. Such a result must inevitably occur in an age of science, in which theories like that of transmigration are regarded as idle dreams. And when the original and vital principle of the fable is gone, it can have but a partial and fugitive acceptance for the moral it conveys or the charming setting it enjoys, whether as regards its humour or its poesy. Even then, the truer the literary culture, the more moral and artificial the fable becomes—until, loaded though it may be with adornments of poesy and fancy, its lingering is, at best, but a beautiful euthanasia.

THE DRAMA.

MR. W. L. COURTNEY ON TRAGEDY.

Mr. W. L. Courtney has printed (Constable) the three lectures which he recently delivered at the Royal Institution on "The Idea of Tragedy," and very good reading they make. They reveal, I think, a robust common sense rather than any especial delicacy or fineness of perception; their tendency is to confirm our familiar friend the man in the street in his opinion. "There," he will say, "didn't I tell you so? Mr. Courtney, a real scholar, who has read Æschylus and Sophocles and Euripides, and all that lot, agrees with me, and he ought to know!" Well, that kind of criticism has its place and value—all kinds being good "sauf le genre ennuyeux"—and "ennuyeux" Mr. Courtney never is. To "popularize" sound opinions is to do good work. Let me not be misunderstood. In no way do I mean that Mr. Courtney falls to think for himself; I only mean that by temperament and training he dislikes—independently and freshly and clearly—what are apt to be (through no fault of his) quite popular thoughts. For instance, that is a pre-eminently popular thought of to-day's tragedy, that it must not be pessimistic. The man in the street desires to be told that pessimism "will never do," and he is so told, in effect, by Mr. Courtney, with manifest conviction. "Such pessimism as this" (i.e., Schopenhauer's) "is, I say, for the most part fruitless, or if it bear fruit is atrophied, sapless, bitter, like Dead Sea apples in the mouth. It is difficult, perhaps, to suggest a work of art which is conceived in this spirit, and is the direct fruit of Schopenhauer's perception. But perhaps Mr. Hardy's 'Jude the Obscure' comes the nearest to it, a work which depresses human vitality, and, therefore, as I take it, sins against humility. Better examples can perhaps be found in some of Zola's novels—'L'Assommoir,' 'La Terre,' and others." I fancy I can hear the Royal Institution positively rustling with well-bred satisfaction at that passage. It is so eminently popular thing to say; though, at the same time, I am quite sure that Mr. Courtney says it not because it is popular, but for the simple reason that he honestly believes it.

Well, it is permissible not to believe it, or, at any rate to believe it only with a good many reservations. For what is the particular piece of pessimism in Schopenhauer which Mr. Courtney is reproving? It is this. "What gives to all tragedy, in whatever form it may appear, the peculiar tendency towards the sublime is the awakening of the knowledge that the world, life, can afford us no true pleasure, and consequently is not worthy of our attachment. In this consists the tragic spirit; it, therefore, leads to resignation." To this Mr. Courtney objects that the artist must believe in his work as a free and joyous form of activity," not assuredly as a mere anæsthetic, an anodyne, a mode of sending to sleep a ceaseless grumble of indignation and despair." But is he not confusing the moral, the philosophic meaning of a work of art with the spirit, the creative impulse of the artist? Is he not, in a roundabout way, arguing that who drives fat oxen must himself be fat? All artistic creation, all literary production, is a form of activity, and that it must be whatever its subject-matter, whatever the tendency of its teaching. A work inculcating passivity is in itself a work of activity. To Schopenhauer himself the production of "The World as Will and Idea" must have been a form of free and joyous activity. Indeed, the artist's belief in his work is a necessity of his being as an artist, and has nothing to do with the philosophy expressed or implied in his work. If art "depresses human vitality" it is not because of its pessimism, but because of its weaknesses, its shortcomings, as art. A play written by a clumsy, inarticulate, vulgar-minded artist will depress human vitality, though its author be as incorrigible an optimist as Pangloss. Dulness, monotony, commonness of spirit—these are the qualities in a work of art that depress. I agree—who will not?—with Mr. Courtney that "La Terre" depresses. But is that because Zola is a pessimist? No, I should say it is because Zola is an inferior artist. The works of Miss Marie Corelli depress me far more thoroughly than the worst of M. Zola's. Yet was there ever such an optimist as Miss Corelli?

I submit, then, that Mr. Courtney does not give Schopenhauer his due. We need not subscribe ourselves pessimists to recognize the enormous debt æsthetics owe to that philosopher. His theory of art—the world as representation, enfranchised from the "will to live"—is surely one of the most luminous contributions in modern times to one of the most obscure of subjects. His theory of tragedy, in particular, showing how all great tragic work is a clearing of the atmosphere, a passage through storm and stress to peace, to the "sleeping well" after "life's fitful fever," is a theory which holds true without the slightest reference to pessimism. It is a development of that much debated Aristotelian καθαρσις, which was, no doubt, in its origin, rather a lucky casual "shot" than an ordered, thoroughly thought-out theory. Aristotle was vaguely groping after the truth, reserved for the modern philosopher to put in its full and true light, that the real differentia of tragic "pity" and "terror" is their "disinterestedness," the fact that they are purged of the will-to-live. Mr. Courtney, however, is almost as hard on Aristotle as he is on Schopenhauer. He says the Greek philosopher, essentially a practical man, objected to pity and fear as weakening human activities, and accordingly "thought it was just as well that spectators should go to a theatre and see what fools the tragic characters made of themselves by indulging in such emotions." Narrow the Aristotelian æsthetics may have been, but I hardly think they were quite so narrow as that.

If Mr. Courtney is unfair to these great men, he is, it seems to me, more than complaisant to some people who are not—or not yet—quite so great, to Mr. Pinero, for instance, and to the writer who calls herself "Zack." Among younger dramatists he singles out two, Mr. Esmond and Mr. Laurence Irving! Ibsen he treats with a consideration all the more creditable because it is evident that he does not "freely and joyously" like that author. His objection to Ibsen's "provinciality"—"popular" though the opinion is—will, I think, be accepted as substantially true by all save the out-and-out Ibsenite, a hopelessly impossible person, not to be reasoned with. There is something "parochial" in Ibsen at times. It is all very well to say that a humble parish may hold all the great passions of humanity. True; but it is also true that, other things being equal, the larger the stage the greater the passions, and the freer their play. That is the real justification of the "heroes" and "princesses" of French classic tragedy; if the personages of the drama are chosen from a class above ordinary law you get a better chance of seeing the elemental forces of nature in their naked truth. Our modern "bourgeois" tragedy is all very well, but there is also much to be said for the Racinian insistence on "cette tristesse majestueuse qui fait tout le plaisir de la tragédie." And so, in the main, one agrees with the statement which Mr. Courtney, I see, has been severely (and foolishly) attacked for making:—"There may be tragedies in South Hampstead, though experience does not consistently testify to the fact; but at all events from the historic and traditional stand-point, tragedy is more likely to concern itself with Glamys Castle, Melrose Abbey, Carisbrooke, or even with Carlton House Terrace." But whether one agrees or disagrees with this or that opinion of Mr. Courtney's, one cannot but thank him for what is throughout a serious, temperate, and competent discussion of a difficult and unjustly neglected subject.

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

[Compiled by Mr. E. A. REYNOLDS BALL.]

The literature of the 1900 Exhibition may be conveniently classified under three heads.

(1) Guide-books (English and French).

(2) Serial Publications.

(3) Official Reports, Catalogues Raisonnés, &c.

I. GUIDE-BOOKS.

A PILGRIMAGE TO PARIS. By A. F. Morris. Illust. 1s. H. Cox. An unconventional little companion to Paris and the Exhibition, written in the somewhat old-fashioned narrative form.

EXHIBITION PARIS, 1900. A Practical Guide, containing information as to means of Locomotion, Hotels, Restaurants, Cafés, Theatres, Shops, Museums, Buildings and Monuments, Daily Life and Habits, the Curiosities of Paris and of the Exhibition. 456 pp. Illust. Maps and Plans. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net. Heinemann. Based mainly on Hachette's "Guide à l'Exposition," "Paris-Hachette," and "Almanach-Hachette," but considerably enlarged. A thoroughly conscientious compilation, certainly the best in most respects of any English guides. The Exhibition portion is, however, a prospective rather than an actual account.

IN PARIS. By K. S. Macquoid. 1s. Methuen. The information, especially as regards the Exhibition section, is almost too elementary.

HARPER'S GUIDE TO PARIS AND THE EXPOSITION. 292 pp. (Exhibition 44pp.) 4s. Harper and Bros. A carefully compiled guide with good illustrations. Deficient, however, in good maps or plans.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO PARIS. Exhibition Edition. 170 pp. 24 Maps and Plans. 1s. A. and C. Black. The information is thoroughly up to date, even the destruction of the Théâtre Française last March being duly recorded. The chief features of the Exhibition are well summarized within the limits of 47 pp. The maps and plans are accurate and distinct.

DANGLE'S GUIDE TO PARIS AND THE EXHIBITION, by A. M. Thompson. Illust. 6d. Walter Scott. The treatment is unconventional, but the information is evidently derived at first hand.

EXPRESS GUIDE TO THE EXHIBITION, by F. Mayer. Illust. 110 pp. 1s. Express Office, 23, Rue Royale, Paris.

ANGLO-SAXON GUIDE. pp. 202. (Exhibition 108). 100 illustrations, many plans. 1s. net. Boot and Sons, Ltd. In a limited sense an official guide, as it is the only English guide sold within the Exhibition. Well arranged and readable. The sectional plans are clearly engraved and accurate.

Nearly every one of the old-established guides to Paris (Baedeker, Cassell, Ward, Lock, Bradshaw, Cook, &c.) has been reprinted or rather republished in view of the Exhibition year, with, in many cases, a rather meagre appendix dealing with the Exhibition. As a matter of fact, little reliable or official information was to be obtained even by the most conscientious compiler early in the year. The most trustworthy and practical of these guide-books is perhaps Ward, Lock's, which has a fuller section (40 pp.) on the Exhibition than the generality of these handbooks. Baedeker devotes 8 pages to a well-condensed summary of the Exhibition.

L'EXPOSITION POUR TOUS. 92 pp. Illust. 60 c. Montgredien, 8, Rue S. Joseph, Paris. An unpretentious but practical guide.

GUIDE À L'EXPOSITION. Hachette. A comprehensive handbook much in use with French people.

GUIDE CONTY. Illust. 1 fr. An English edition has recently been published at 2s. 6d., by Dulau. Thoroughly popular in treatment.

JOANNE'S GUIDE À PARIS. 7 fr. 50 c. Last edition 1900. Hachette. Has a fairly accurate description (30 pages) of the Exhibition.

II. SERIAL PUBLICATIONS.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION. Twelve monthly parts at 1s. 6d. each. (Part 12 will not appear till April, 1901.) Edited by the editor of the Art Journal. Virtue and Co. The best features are the numerous exquisitely reproduced photographs and engravings. This is the best of the many Exhibition serials in English. The letterpress is by various experts. It is the only English periodical which can compare at all with the monumental work of Montgredien et Cie. (See below.)

The Nineteen Hundred. Weekly, 6d. Illust. Marlborough and Co. This is an ambitious work, rather rambling and haphazard in its arrangement, which claims to be a complete literary and pictorial history of the Exhibition. It began as early as 1895, and will be completed at the end of the present year. The complete issue will be published in five volumes, price 37f. The text is in English and French in parallel columns. Much of the information is of an ephemeral character, and as a work of reference it is inferior to the exhaustive and thorough serial cyclopedia of the Exposition of MM. Montgredien et Cie.

(b) French.

L'Exposition de Paris. Montgredien et Cie. The complete work is (to be published in three volumes at 20f. (two have already appeared), and will contain over 2,000 engravings. Published also in weekly parts at 50c.

In this monumental work—a veritable cyclopedia—many of the best-known French authors and artists of the day have co-operated. Among the contributors are MM. Jules Claretie and Mézières, of the French Academy, M. Lausseda, Director of the Conservatoire des Arts, and M. Camille Flammarion. The first volume will be devoted to an exhaustive description of the great permanent monuments of the Exhibition. In the second volume the various palaces of the nations and the buildings erected by private enterprise will be dealt with. The last volume will be devoted to the principal contents of the palaces and galleries, and the great "side shows," and will conclude with an exhaustive compte rendu, comprising a pictorial record of the Exhibition from its opening to its close, describing the fêtes, congresses, &c.

Figaro Exposition. Five monthly parts at 3f. each. 26, Rue Dronot, Paris. The numerous illustrations are admirable reproductions by Goupil and Co.

Le Panorama de l'Exposition Universelle. 12, Rue de l'Abbaye, Paris. In twenty parts at 60c. each, of which three have already appeared.

Le Moniteur des Expositions. 6, Rue Le Peletier, Paris. This is a semi-official publication issued to subscribers only at 17f.

III.—OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS.

A large number of official reports and catalogues will be issued towards the close of the Exhibition.

The Rapport Général alone, edited by the Commissioner-General, Monsieur Picard, will consist of nine or ten volumes. There are also the reports, equally voluminous, of the various congresses, and the Rapport of the Jury International. When it is remembered that there will be some seventy distinct conferences or congresses in the various departments of Science, Applied Science, Industry, Fine Arts, Hygiene and Medicine, Political and Social Economy, Education, &c., covering, in short, the whole field of social and intellectual progress, it will be understood that the literature of the purely educational aspect of the 1900 Exhibition will be sufficiently voluminous.

It will be convenient to give here a summary of the principal topographical, historical, and social works on Paris generally which have been published within the last twelve months.

Belloc, Hilaire. A History of Paris. 468 pp. Five sketch maps. 7s. 6d. Arnold. 1900. Describes the development of Paris up to the Revolution.

Bujon, Pierre. Lectures sur l'Histoire de Paris. 212 pp. Illust. 1f. 50c. E. Flammarion. Paris. 1899.

Busson, A. Paris Intime. 322 pp. Illust. 3fr. 50c. E. Flammarion. Paris. 1899. Deals with the various phases of the vie intime of the French capital.

De Courcertin, Baron Pierre. France since 1814. 6s. Chapman. 1900. A reprint of articles which appeared in 1898-99 in the Fortnightly Review.

De Forest, Katharine. Paris as it is. 284 pp. Many illustrations. 5s. Brentano. Paris. 1900. Well-informed chapters on the literary, artistic, and social life of Paris.

Hare, A. J. C. Paris. 558 pp. Numerous woodcuts. 6s. G. Allen. 1900. An admirable book, absolutely indispensable for all who wish to learn something of the antiquarian and archæological aspects of Paris.

Macdonald, J. F. Paris of the Parisians. 198 pp. 5s. Grant Richards. 1900.

Martin, B. E. The Stones of Paris in History and Letters. pp. 579. 62 illustrations. 2 Vols. 18s. Smith, Elder, and Co. 1900. An exhaustive and conscientious work, dealing with the historic and literary associations of Paris.

Morrow, W. C. Bohemian Paris of To-day. 100 illustrations. 5s. Chatto and Windus. 1899. Gives an unusually full description of the literary and eccentric cafés.

Paris-Parisien. In three parts. I. Ce qu'il faut voir. II. Ce qu'il faut savoir. III. Paris-Guide. IV. Paris Pratique. An English translation has been published by Fisher Unwin. 6s. 2nd Edition. 1900. A novel idea, but scarcely sufficiently worked out.

Reynolds-Ball, E. A. "Paris in the Nineteenth." 200 pp. 60 photogravures. 2 Vols. £1 1s. Dana Estes and Co., Boston, U.S.A. 1900. (An English edition will shortly be published by Fisher Unwin.) This is a "popular study of Paris past and present, historic and picturesque." Two chapters in Vol. II. deal at some length with the 1900 Exhibition.

Strong, Rowland. Where and How to Dine in Paris. 196 pp. 2s. 6d. Grant Richards. 1900.

Vandam, A. An Englishman in Paris: Notes and Recollections during the Reign of Louis Philippe and the Second Empire. 3s. 6d. 9th Edition. Chatto and Windus. 1900.

Vitu, Auguste. Paris. 200 illust. E. Flammarion, Paris.

NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Vol. LXIII. of the Dictionary of National Biography (Smith, Elder) brings this great work to a close; and we owe a debt of homage and gratitude to every one concerned in the making of it. This branch of the subject, however, is dealt with in another column. Here we may content ourselves, in the first place, with considering some statistics set forth in a preface to show the scope and magnitude of the undertaking. The Dictionary "supplies notices of 29,120 men and women" [illegible] larger number than are contained in the [illegible] published in other countries; for the "Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie" has only 23,273 articles, the Cyclopædia of American Biography only about 20,000, while the Dutch and Swedish National biographies lag far behind with only 10,000 and 4,000 articles respectively. The longest articles are on the scale of the English Men of Letters Series; 49 pages have been given to Shakespeare by Mr. Sidney Lee, 31 to the Duke of Wellington by Colonel E. M. Lloyd, and 31 to Cromwell by Mr. C. H. Firth. A point which it is curious to notice is that the names which figure most profusely in Post Office directories are not the names which have been borne by the greatest number of celebrities. The Smiths, it is true, lead the van with a score of 195, and the Joneses are a fair second with 172; but the Browns—whom Judge Hughes averred to be typical of everything that is great and good in British history—[illegible] aback to find themselves beaten in the competition by the Stewarts and the Hamiltons; while the Robinsons [illegible] disappointed with a position lower than that not only of the Taylors, Thompsons, and Williamses, but also of the Clarks, Moores, Campbells, Murrays, Douglases, Davieses, Wilsons, and Howards.

The editors rightly resolved to err, if at all, on the side of over-comprehensiveness. Their principle was the proposed [illegible]

Every endeavour has been made to accord admission to every statesman, lawyer, divine, painter, author, inventor, actor, physician, surgeon, man of science, traveller, musician, soldier, sailor, bibliographer, book-collector, and printer, whose career presents any feature which justifies its preservation from oblivion. No sphere of activity has been consciously overlooked. Niches have been found for sportsmen and leaders of society who have commanded public attention. Malefactors whose crimes excite a permanent interest have received hardly less attention than benefactors.

Striking examples of this catholicity are not wanting in the volume before us; and the [illegible] examples of it are naturally more striking than the older ones. Thus we find Lives of John Wyatt, army surgeon, whose career was very much like that of any other army surgeon; of Sir Charles Lennox Wyke, diplomatist, whose career was hardly different from the average career, baldly chronicled in the Foreign Office list; of Worth, the dressmaker; Zachnsdorf, the bookbinder; and Zukertort, the chess player, famous for his "irregular openings"; while Edmund Yates gets five columns and a-half by Mr. Thomas Secombe.

A fair proportion of important biographies fall in the volume. The chief of them is that of William Wordsworth, which fell as it were by right to the pen of Mr. Leslie Stephen. It is extremely interesting, and it contains a column of terse and judicious criticism, summing up what there is to say and what has been said over and over again about Wordsworth—a column remarkable, when we remember the writer, for its great restraint. On one little point Mr. Stephen surely goes astray—viz., when he speaks of the inspiration which the poet derived from "the French painter Ramond." Ramond (more correctly Ramond de Carbonnière) would hardly know himself under this description, as his real fame was as a writer of Alpine books, an explorer of the Pyrenees, and a man of science. He held a scientific professorship at Tarbes, and was a member of the Institut de France. The other Wordsworths treated are Charles, Bishop of St. Andrews, by the Bishop of Salisbury; Christopher, Master of Trinity, by Mr. J. Willis Clark; and Christopher, Bishop of Lincoln, by Canon Overton. Another of Mr. Leslie Stephen's contributions is the life of Edward Young, the author of "Night Thoughts"—a sympathetic study, which illustrates the catholicity of the writer's tastes. Mr. Sidney Lee is responsible for the lives of Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton, Shakespeare's patron, and of Sir Henry Wotton. The former is a contribution of great importance both from an historical and a literary point of view, and we must not perhaps complain that Mr. Lee states his own view of the dedication to the sonnets as an established theory. The life of Wotton is another example of the careful scholarship of Mr. Lee, though we rather regret that he does not give more than a casual reference to Sir Henry Wotton's relations with Casaubon. All the facts are in Mark Pattison's Life of Casaubon, which Mr. Lee quotes, and they are very picturesque. In his life of Sir Richard Worsley, Mr. Warwick Wroth makes a curious omission. He does not mention his grand tour under the tutorship of Gibbon's Swiss friend Deyverdun, though Gibbon tells us in the Autobiography that he got Deyverdun the appointment. Philip Stanhope Worsley, the translator of the Odyssey, is written of sympathetically by Mr. Richard Garnett. Other lives to which it seems proper to draw attention are those of William of Wykeham (here Mr. James Tait has been forestalled by Mr. G. H. Moberly, whose excellent biography reached a second edition in 1893); Christopher Wren (11 pages), by Mr. F. C. Penrose; William Wycherley, by Mr. G. A. Aitken; John Wycliffe (21 pages), by the Rev. Hastings Rashdall.

VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Mathilde Blind.

The poetess to whose memory Mr. Arthur Symons has lately rendered a valuable service through his complete edition of her poetry—THE POETICAL WORKS OF MATHILDE BLIND (Unwin, 7s. 6d.)—offers a notable literary contrast to her editor. The one writer deals with the symbols of life, the other with its outward manifestations. The one, naturally gifted with a style, devotes the most careful attention to its elaboration; the other, far less well endowed in this direction, is, more often than not, quite inattentive to form. Again, while Mr. Symons is for ever subtly veiling his personality, that of Miss Blind stands revealed in almost every one of her poems. Indeed these, as Dr. Garnett says at the conclusion of the admirable memoir which he contributes to this volume, are the faithful reflection of her character. At the same time he contends that "they are far from expressing the entire force and depth of her nature," and it is this conviction that makes his introductory sketch so helpful to a just appreciation of her work. After learning the circumstances of her girlhood and of her ardent searchings after religious truths few will fail to find themselves in closer touch with the train of thought which resulted in after years in "The Prophecy of St. Oran," while the glimpses afforded us of her enthusiasms for Garibaldi, Mazzini, and the Polish patriot Langiewicz will tend to emphasize the nobility of feeling which prompted "The Heather on Fire" and help to tide over its defects. Chief among these is its diffuseness, which is in great measure due to the unfortunate selection of an eight-lined stanza instead of the more manageable six-lined stanza used in "St. Oran," the most complete of all her longer poems. As to "The Ascent of Man," it is hardly to be wondered at that the subject, as we have before said, proved too much for her. The effort subsides after prolonged and chaotic movement, eventually dying away with the last verse of "The Leading of Sorrow" into this faint echo:—

> And beside me in the golden morning
> I beheld my shrouded phantom-guide:
> But no longer sorrow—veiled and mourning—
> It became transfigured at my side.
> And I knew—as one escaped from prison
> Sees old things again with fresh surprise—
> It was Love himself, Love re-arisen
> With the Eternal shining through his eyes.

Miss Blind is on far surer ground in "Love in Exile," many of the poems in which have the personal touch so characteristic of her. But perhaps the sonnets are, of all her poems, the most instinct with a magnetic attraction. Take this well-known specimen, for instance:—

> Cleave thou the waves that weltering to and fro
> Surge multitudinous. The eternal Powers
> Of sun, moon, stars, the air, the hurrying hours,
> The winged winds, the still dissolving show
> Of clouds in calm or storm, for ever flow
> Above thee; while the abysmal sea devours
> The untold dead insatiate, where it lowers
> O'er glooms unfathom'd, limitless, below.
> No longer on the golden-fretted sands,
> Where many a shallow tide abortive chafes,
> Mayst thou delay; life onward sweeping blends
> With far-off heaven; the dauntless one who braves
> The perilous flood with calm unswerving hands,
> The elements sustain; cleave thou the waves.

It was a spirit such as this that kept many faithful friends beside her in spite of those defects of her qualities to which Dr. Garnett so gently and sympathetically alludes in a memoir which should certainly tend to increase Miss Blind's popularity.

Mr. A. G. Butler.

All the pieces in Mr. A. G. Butler's CHOICE OF ACHILLES, AND OTHER POEMS (Frowde, 2s. 6d.) bear witness to quick sympathies and genuine feeling. The title poem and that called "The Choice of Heracles" are both what we should expect from so well known a scholar and so cultivated a writer of verse. The sentiments expressed in the patriotic poems are of the right sort, and kindred to these in spirit is the welcome to Nansen. That he has breadth of view will be plain to any one who has read "A 'Parson's Pleasure-ground'" and "Hodge, 'the Natural Man,'" while "Love and Learning," "A Ruined Cottage in the Highlands," and several other pieces are full of tenderness. We quote from the poem called "The Old Books," a very just appreciation of newer ones:—

> The new books, the new books, the other nobler kind!
> Straight from the heart they come and speak, and round the heart they wind;
> Marcella in her lovelier mood, a Stevenson, a Thrums,
> A Kipling great in camp and wood, a Besant in the slums.
> Not theirs to hint that all is dark, the sun has fled the day;
> Not theirs to stamp the fallen leaf more deeply in the clay!
> In every life they find a strain of good as yet untold;
> In simple hearts, a noble vein of unsuspected gold:
> They hold the mirror to our times, they paint in motley dyes
> The image of our wants and crimes; they bid us sympathize.
> And not in vain: so rich the art, so rare the painter's skill
> They wake in every sleeping heart the old knight-errant still.

What Mr. Butler has finally to say about the old books, and it is quite worth saying, we must leave others to read for themselves.

"Poems for Pictures."

The title of Mr. Ford M. Hueffer's little volume POEMS FOR PICTURES (Macqueen, 2s. n.) at once provides a certain standpoint for criticism and directly attracts the reader to two poems to which, by labelling them each "For a picture," he more especially draws attention. The subject of the first of them is the well-known story of St. Ethelburga of Kent who, wedded to the pagan Edwin of Northumbria, with difficulty converted him, and after his death in battle returned to die among her own people. The scene selected for the picture is described in the following verse, the rest of the poem being designed, as we take it, to touch in the whole tale, to heighten its local colour, and generally to bring our sympathies into line:—

> Queen, saint, evangelist; sweet patient, fain to wait
> With crucifix in hand, broad brow and haloed crown
> Half hidden by the coif, she enters through that gate,
> She enters through that door, where tapestry drawn back
> Left seen, a moment since, an apple lawn; but moors
> Spread far away beyond. That span of shorn green turf,
> Won from the heather's grasp, will whisper of regret
> For far-off swarded downs—
> For far-off Kentish downs, soft sky and glint of sea,
> Sweet chime of convent bells and flower scents of home.

We fancy that the mental vision of any one reading this verse carefully would rest during the first three lines with the Queen as she looks into the Saxon hall. In the fifth line, however, it becomes necessary rapidly to shift the point of view, for we are now looking out from the hall upon the glimpse of landscape beyond it, while the last lines transfer us with Ethelburga's homesick heart to Kentland. There would be nothing noticeable in this but for the fact that Mr. Hueffer invites us to conceive, and to paint if we can, an actual picture. That being so, everything should be presented to us from one point of vision, and the writer's effort concentrated upon the one scene. But he distracts our attention a stanza or two later with the questioning of the wisdom of the Queen's religion which subsequently occurred in the crowded interior—a far more dramatic subject indeed, but one which we are not especially invited to consider. Without printing the whole poem it is difficult to illustrate its vague diffuseness. Generally speaking, however, we fancy that any deliberate attempt to "pose" a poem would be no more likely to succeed than the converse attempt to paint a picture solely with the object of inspiring verse. And if we were asked to pick out the most pictorial piece in the book we should cite the little poem called "The Pedlar Leaves the Bar Parlour at Dymchurch," which quite unintentionally leaves a far completer picture in the mind than either of the more conscious efforts.

But the little volume carries a sub-title—"Poems for Notes of Music"—which is amply justified. The song-drama, "King Cophetua's Wooing," is a delicate libretto which would admirably suit a dainty score; any one with an ear might improvise a melody to run with "A Lullaby"; and "At the Bal Masqué" also taps with an air upon a fanciful brain. These are three of many instances which prove Mr. Hueffer's lyric gift. In the first of these we notice a little flaw which is often discernible—a "literariness," if we may so express it, peeping out behind his puppets. "If I make you Queen," says the disguised Cophetua. And Christine immediately catches him up with, "Make, why make, not made?" For a beggar maiden she was uncommonly quick to catch at the subtle distinction. Yet sometimes the poet is singularly happy in blending matter-of-factness with literary fancy:—

> When ye've got a child 'at's whist for want of food
> And a grate as grey's y'r 'air for want of wood,
> And y'r man and you ain't nowise not much good:
> Oh—
> It's hard work a-Christmassing
> Carolling,
> Singin' songs about the Babe what's born.

We might choose upon this theme [illegible] or country corner, yet no one would quarrel with the truthfulness of this or the other two verses of what seems to us a striking little poem. In this, Mr. Hueffer's [illegible] is of more than average interest.

Little of the historian or the antiquary peeps out from the pages of Mr. Horatio F. Brown's book of verses, DIVERSE (Grant Richards, 5s. n.), yet their author is better known as a student of the history of Venice and its [illegible] than as a poet. The most interesting pieces in the little collection are "The Song of Caedmon" and the hexametrical "Railroad Medley," a pleasant record of flying scenes and fleeting fancies and impressions, from the perusal of which we rise with just that feeling of slight fatigue which attends an actual journey by rail [illegible] away by a study of the landscape.

In his translated poem, THE SATYR (Will we Ros., 1s. 6d.), Mr. Charles Innis Bowen has made a daring and by no means unsuccessful attempt to catch the spirit of Victor Hugo's finely conceived and boldly executed allegory. The poem tells how Pan, revelling at Olympus' foot, was captured by Hercules and dragged up into the presence of the Gods enthroned in splendour upon the cloud-capped peaks of the mountain. And being bidden to sing he commenced a wonderous song of "old infernal halls of deities past"; and of Chaos and Creation and the marvellous fruitful Earth, and of the Beasts who typify her vague forces, and, lastly, of Man, more sentient and more troubled through the possession of a soul, passing through endless labour towards the conception of a Divine Ideal before which the old Gods should dwindle to naught—till his beautiful, careless listeners, who had conquered the Earth without comprehending her, bowed their heads in amazement and began to feel the vastness of Pan's All. All this Mr. Bowen has rendered into English in vigorous rough-hewn couplets, of which the following are fair specimens:—

> O, Human Man, be you Humanity
> Man, Woman, Child—that glorious Trinity!
> Seed of a King and larva of a God,
> Slave, demon, be transfigured, Spirit-shod
> And spirit-plumed, on, on usurp the sun.
> Ay, seize the ray, the dawn, on higher and higher,
> O strong-winged Bust, O Head divine and first
> Mount to the Light, mount to the second east
> Upon the heavenly Throne take you your seat,
> And hurl to Hell your shaggy, foul forefoot!

Mr. William Gerard's tragedy DORIAN THORN, PAUL, also tells the old sad story of a great-hearted enthusiast living before his time, first dreaming of how he may win greater happiness for the people about him, then striking wildly for it against overwhelming odds, lastly betrayed and dragging with him in his ruin the faithful few who loved him best, but leaving the many no better off and no worse off than before. There could hardly fail to be many fine passages in a play of this kind, and Mr. Gerard handles both his blank verse and his characters well, but the action throughout would be the better for a good deal of compression.

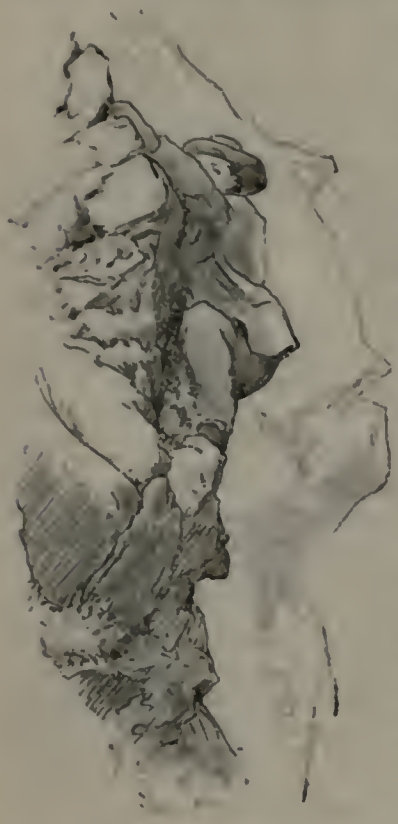
Lastly we may note a little volume of [illegible] kind. THE STRUWWELPETER ALPHABET (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. n.) naturally, like "the political Struwwelpeter," an [illegible] of nonsense verses, the verses being by Mr. Harold Begbie and the illustrations by Mr. F. C. Gould. One cannot review the book better than by giving a specimen of the [illegible]. This is what we find under "Z":—

> Z is Zo[illegible]
> Look at him on this very page:
> He seizes Mercies by the hair,
> Lays hold of crazy Beauty's chair,
> Corpse the [illegible], Zarlinder natty,
> Esterhazy, too, and Paty,
> Into the pot by ones and twos
> He plunges all and cries, "Jesus!"

MOUNTAINEERING.

In Alaska.

We have in THE ASCENT OF MOUNT SAINT ELIAS, Dr. Filippo de Filippi's account of the great climb organized and undertaken by the Duke of the Abruzzi (Constable, 31s. 6d. n.), the story of the first Alaskan mountaineering expedition that has accomplished sensational results. The mountain in question was discovered and christened by Behring in 1741. It was first measured (most inaccurately) in 1786, by the astronomer with La Pérouse, who represented it as only 12,672 feet high. The Spaniard Malaspina, whose name is now borne by the great Malaspina Glacier, also measured it in 1792, and assigned it the much greater altitude of 17,851 feet. Then follows a gap in the history of the mountain until 1852, when a Russian report, based on information derived from traders, declares it to be a volcano—a statement that was not definitely disproved till many years afterwards. Mr. W. H. Dall, of the United States Survey, supported this erroneous view as recently as 1874. Mr. C. E. S. Wood, who set out to explore the mountain in 1877, failed to effect a landing on the coast. The first real attempts to climb the mountain are those associated with the names of Schwatka, in 1886, Topham in 1888, and Russell in 1890; but these climbers only attained the heights, respectively, of 7,200, 11,460, and 11,500 feet. Bad weather and inadequate equipment were their difficulties. The ascent of Mount Saint Elias is really an Arctic as well as an Alpine journey, and is only to be achieved by carefully organized endeavour. The Duke of the Abruzzi prepared himself for all emergencies as diligently as did Nansen when he started for the Pole. His companions, besides Dr. Filippi, were Lieutenant Cagni, of the Italian Navy, Cavaliere Francesco Gonella, president of the Turin Section of the Italian Alpine Club, and Cavaliere Vittorio Sella, the eminent mountain photographer. He took four Italian guides and one Italian porter. Ten local porters were engaged—to wit, four University students, four sailors, one gold digger, and one poet—and four Indians were also pressed into the service. There were ten tents, and the total weight carried was 3,146lb. Thus equipped the party found the mountain easy—"just like the Brothern, only much higher"—and travelled from the coast to the top and back again in fifty-seven days. They fixed the height of their mountain at 18,060 feet, and from it they saw three other peaks which seemed to be still higher. One of these—Mount Logan—has had the height of 19,539 feet assigned to it, so that there are still, in this region, fresh worlds for Alpinists to conquer.



"WILL IT HOLD?"

[From "Mountaineering" in the Badminton Library. New Edition, 1900. Longmans.]

The book in which the story is told is a very luxurious volume. Signor Sella's photographs would no doubt have been better if the atmospheric conditions had been more favourable; but they are very good as it is, and all praise is due to Messrs. Constable for the style in which they have had them reproduced. There is a liberal supply of maps, excellently drawn, and there are several instructive appendices, including a good bibliography, a complete table of meteorological observations, and a complete account of the equipment of the party. Dr. de Filippi may be congratulated on having kept his book short—a rare merit with mountaineering writers. The profits of the sale are to be given to a worthy object—an insurance fund for Italian guides.

In the Alps.

An Alpine reprint of much interest and importance is James D. Forbes' TRAVELS THROUGH THE ALPS, edited with notes and an introduction by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge (Black, 20s. n.). "Forbes," says Mr. C. E. Mathews in the Badminton "Mountaineering," "was no mountaineer in the modern sense, and never accomplished any very difficult feats; he was certainly not an athlete, and would probably have broken down under the stress of what would now be considered a really arduous expedition. He was pale, thin, and had indifferent health, but his expression was singularly sweet and winning, and he had the beautiful and refined manners of the old school." He was Professor of Natural Philosophy at Edinburgh, and afterwards Principal of St. Andrews—"a remarkable instance of the hold the mountains have over men of rare intellectual endowment." The new volume includes not only the well-known "Travels Through the Alps of Savoy," but also the Alpine chapters printed as an appendix to Forbes' book on Norway. Forbes' work lay in what may be described as the "middle period" of Alpine exploration—the period when climbing was reviving after the check given to it by the Napoleonic wars, but had not yet begun to be a popular pastime. He was one of the earliest British explorers of the high Alps, and the author of the first detailed book in English relating to such explorations; he climbed with Agassiz, Studer, and Desor, and was probably the first member of the English-speaking race to penetrate to that popular climbing centre, Arolla, whence he made the first passage of the Col d'Hérens to Zermatt. Mr. Coolidge's notes are the sort of notes that one expects from Mr. Coolidge—that is to say, they are rich in historical and topographical information. He missed an opportunity in not treating the Mont Iseran myth more fully, as it has been treated by M. Henri Ferrand, and by Mr. Coolidge himself in his edition of Ball's Guide; but perhaps he is reserving himself for the monograph which he is understood to be writing on the subject. As usual Mr. Coolidge provides a good bibliography—a list, this time, of the Alpine writers quoted by Forbes.

PRINCIPAL J. D. FORBES.

[From "Chamonix." By Edward Whymper. Murray.]

Messrs. Constable have produced a second edition (6s.), of Sir William Martin Conway's THE ALPS FROM END TO END. This reduction of the price should give a fresh life to an interesting Alpine book which has not so far attained the popularity which it deserves. All Mr. MacCormick's admirable wash drawings are included in this cheaper edition.

We have previously praised Mr. Edward Whymper's guides to CHAMONIX and ZERMATT (Murray, 3s. n. each), and we are glad to see that they have reached a fifth and fourth edition respectively. They are the very best guides of the kind that we know, interesting alike to the climber and the ordinary tourist, and full of good pictures, one of which we are reproducing. It is curious, however, that in the new edition of the "Chamonix" guide Mr. Whymper makes no reference to the recent contributions made by Mr. C. E. Mathews to the controversy concerning the first ascent of Mont Blanc.

CYCLING IN THE ALPS, by C. L. Freeston (Grant Richards, 6s.), does not shine as a piece of literary composition, but it tells cyclists what they want to know about the roads, and that, after all, is the main thing. There is also abundance of useful information about brakes, repair tackle, and the like; and there are a couple of dozen full-page drawings which at least give a good idea of the zigzags.

A new (3rd) edition of MOUNTAINEERING, in the Badminton Library (Longmans, 10s. 6d.), contains a new chapter by Mr. Bryce on "Mountaineering in Far-away Countries," from which we get a good idea of the ranges that remain unexplored, and of the difficulties of climate, expense, and hostile aborigines, which hinder their exploration. Climbers who cannot be happy unless they break new ground will find the information here supplied invaluable, and will consider the new edition a great improvement on the older ones. It seems a pity that Sir Frederick Pollock did not take the opportunity of the new edition to supplement his chapter on the early history of mountaineering, which is excellent as far as it goes, but does not go quite far enough. A few words, for instance, about the ascent of Hæmus by Philip of Macedon, of Popocatapetl by the soldiers of Cortez—described in Cortez's despatches to the King of Spain—and the exploits of the Bishop of Türk on the Glokner, and Zumstein and his companions on Monte Rosa, would have added to the value of the essay. Room might have been found, too, for a word on the first ascent of Monte Corno in the Apennines by Orazio Delfico in 1796.

At a time when the interest in Himalayan exploration is being kept alive by the Freshfield and Bullock-Workman expeditions, Messrs. Constable send us a new edition (6s.) of Major L. A. Waddell's AMONG THE HIMALAYAS. We praised the book two years ago, and have no reason to change our minds about it now.

A HAPPY LAND.

Every one who is so fortunate as to have read Mr. Fielding's book, "The Soul of a People," should get BURMA, by Max and Bertha Ferrars (Sampson Low, £1 10s.). Although, from its size, weight, and price, it comes into the category of "gift-books," books which serve to decorate a table, and never get read, "Burma" should prove the exception to this rule. Our authors' detailed account of the outward life of the Burmese—an account which rounds off and completes Mr. Fielding's story of their inner life—is well worth reading, and we quite appreciate the difficulties of producing it in handier form. To have done so the full-page illustrations must have been sacrificed. Many of these are very fine, although, for the enjoyment of a certain number, the book must be turned sideways, always an exasperation to the reader.

Happy is the man who has lived in Burma. Happier still he, who, having read these two books, is able to satisfy the inevitable desire they awaken, and start for Rangoon. But even those to whom the strong wings of travel have been denied may, by means of this book, construct a fairly complete picture of Burmese scenery, of the various aspects of life there, and of the Burman's existence from the cradle to the grave. The cradle and the flower-stand are the two most conspicuous objects in every Burmese home; flowers and the child are among the most important factors of life. You must not expect to live in Burma without a close association with both. The young child is the welcome guest of the whole village, wandering at will through the neighbours' houses and gardens. The owners show him a kindly interest; the grown-ups play with him, and make him toys. For the Burman remembers his own happy childhood, and believes he will become a child again after death. Between the ages of eight and ten, the boy attends the school of the Buddhist monks, where he is gratuitously taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, passages from the sacred books, and, above all, the value of learning as an inalienable possession. There is an interesting photograph of the interior of one of these monastic schools. Nine little lads with mouthfuls coarse beads crouch upon the floor on elbows and knees, strenuously studying their slates, long boards of soot-blackened wood on which the writing is done with a white soap-stone pencil, while a gentle-looking old monk, sitting upon his haunches, supervises the class. In the background are sacred, life-size figures, lying beneath elaborately carven wooden canopies something like our four-post beds. When his school-life is over, every Burman without exception enters for a time the monastic novitiate, just as in more civilised countries every young man serves as a soldier. The Burman takes back with him into secular life a knowledge of and profound reverence for the truths of religion, which will strike the "Kiplingite" perhaps as a poor equipment compared with that which the conscript acquires during life in barracks.

Then come the days of courtship, very important in Burma, where every one marries. From nine to ten o'clock at night is the hour named "courting-time." The young girl sits upon her verandah, and the suitors come one by one, in the dusk or in the moonlight, to plead their cause. She will give each a cheroot of her own making, but for the favoured boy she will light it herself, thus giving him a kiss by proxy into the bargain. The small illustrations of "The Belle," "The Belle at her toilet," and "The Suitor's Visit" give a pretty and intimate idea of this period of youthful life; and the same chapter, "Manhood and Occupation," contains the most beautiful full-page illustration in the book. In "Cutting the Rice-crop on the Kwin," you get out of the mere black and white a really marvellous effect of colour, sunshine, and heat. After marriage, family cares and the serious life of work begin; and when man's fifth age arrives, and our own revered Justices of the Peace are dealing out wise laws, and not always wise sentences, the Burman's great ambition is to build a pagoda or a school; or, if these are beyond his means, at least to erect a humble shed for the storing of water and the wayfarer's refreshment. With the sixth age, his children "pray him to nebo ast," which means that henceforth they take his support entirely upon themselves. He never becomes, however, the mere "dipper'd pantaloon," for the aged in Burma are never idle. They spend their time in light occupations and in prayer, and preserve a great elasticity of mind and interest in others. Nor do they ever give way to anger, but, steeped in the spirit of Buddhism, wait serenely for the end. And on his death-bed a friend will always remind the Burman of all the good deeds which he has done in life. "Think how you have given alms to the monks. . . . how you helped your brother in his need. . . . Surely these are pleasant things to remember? . . . Think how you have loved and cared for your wife and she for you during all your long life together. Surely this, too, is a pleasant thing."

Where we Westerns state baldly that such a person is dead, the Burman says, tenderly, that for him the present life is ended; and that which we call "the corpse," the "remains," the Burman speaks of as "that which is about to be"—i.e., to be something higher and better. Thus, although the relatives weep for their own loss, the funeral itself rather resembles a festival; and this incongruity between the real affliction felt on the one hand, and the gay incidents of the burial on the other, finds its point in a Burmese fable:—

The python snake was the King of Serpents, and so potent was his venom that did he so much as bite the track of a creature it must die. One day he bit the foot-print of a man who had offended him, and crept to the village to glut over his revenge. But he found there nothing to betoken sorrow. The whole village was in gala costume, music was playing, and the people were dancing. At which sight he [illegible] excessively mortified that he climbed a lofty tree, and spat all his venom forth.

The fable does not add that he died penitent, but we like to believe he did, and so began life anew under improved conditions, probably as a sucking dove. And by this time, we hope, he may have climbed so high upon the tree of life as to have become a Yahán, or even a Sadáw.

Aristophanis Comœdiæ. Recognovernut F. W. Hall, W. M. Geldart. Tomus I.: Acharnenses, Equites, Nubes, Vespæ, Pax, Aves. (3s., 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d.)

Apollonii Rhodii Argonautica. Recognovit R. C. Seaton. (Paper, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s.)

Xenophontis Opera. I. Historia Græca. Recognovit E. C. Marchant. (2s. 6d., 3s.)

The design of this series, whose first numbers we have dealt with already, is excellent; but we are not sure that the choice of editors is the most judicious in all cases. Perhaps it is too late to suggest that a wider search might have been better; but we feel bound to say it. No one will question Mr. Sidgwick's literary taste, or his high rank as interpreter; but we do not feel quite the same confidence in his critical judgment. It is impossible to produce a text of Æschylus which will please every one; and yet we cannot but think that the principle generally prescribed for this series, that the editor should try to restore the earliest tradition which the MSS. attest rather than to give what his author may have written, is sound. This principle would give us, for instance, τέχης, not τύχην in Pers. 602; ἀνακαλεῖσθε, not ἀγκαλεῖσθε in 621; ὡς ἐνδαίμονες, "as poor wretches may," in Agam. 336: θάρσος ἰκαίσιον in 863. A strong example is the much-vexed σωματοφθαρεῖν, Agam. 918, where editors almost with one consent write δωματοφθορεῖν, ignoto ignotius; neither word is found elsewhere, and Mr. Verrall's interpretation seems to make the former possible. In several other places, Mr. Verrall, often so rash, shows a caution which Mr. Sidgwick would have done well to imitate (e.g., Agam. 79). Mr. Sidgwick's text has, however, the merit of making sense nearly always. His short account of the MSS. will be useful to young students, and it was a happy thought to add a detailed table of the MS. evidence for each play.

The editors of "Aristophanes" have a less difficult task than the editor of "Æschylus"; yet not one that can be undertaken with a light heart, when even Cobet has damned the Ravenna MS. as one of the worst in existence, and editors have been over-ready to adopt conjectural changes in the tradition. Cobet's extravagance has not been followed in this edition, and the editors rightly point out that due allowance has not always been made for colloquialism. They might have applied their own canon to Clouds 744, and read κἆτα with the vulgate, instead of inserting καί. Here the MS. tradition is more closely kept to than in other editions, though in the critical notes concession is made to doubters, by the record of changes proposed where scholars have commonly thought such to be needed. Spelling and accidence have been regulated by aid of inscriptions and the evidence of ancient grammarians. In the critical notes on each play is given a list of the MSS. used. The text, so far as we have been able to test it, seems to be an improvement on those in use; but we should not be surprised if future editors should be even more conservative than Messrs. Geldart and Hall.

It is a great pleasure to see an English edition of the text of Apollonius Rhodius, and we hope many will read this interesting author who have not done so before. Mr. Seaton agrees with the view now commonly held, that none of our MSS. represent the earlier recension of the "Argonautica," which survives in only a few fragments and scholia. His text is based on the princeps Mediceus, which has preserved for us also the best text of Sophocles and of Æschylus. He keeps close to the Medicean, except in spelling and accentuation, but does not disdain the aid of G (13th century), or on occasion of the inferior MSS. at Rome, Paris, and elsewhere; the most important scholia have also been used, and a few corrections are introduced on the strength of the "Etymologicum Magnum." A very few conjectures have been admitted, two being due to the present editor. The text has been made with great care and sobriety of judgment.

Mr. Marchant in his first instalment of "Xenophon," has also kept closer to the best MSS. than previous editors, rejecting nothing which could possibly be defended. He has also used a wise discretion in purging the critical notes of trivial variants, thus making room for new matter without making these notes less useful to the student. Orthography may of course be tested by other known rules, and editors are not free but bound to correct certain vagaries of the copyists. His edition is therefore an advance not only on Dindorf's, but in practical usefulness even on that of O. Keller. A few fragments of papyrus come to our aid here in reconstructing the text; and as far as they go, they prove for Xenophon what similar finds have proved for Plato and Thucydides, that our text is substantially the same as it was in the early centuries of our era or even before. We should have liked a rather fuller account of the MSS. in this edition.

WAR BOOKS.

Mafeking, by Major F. D. Baillie (Constable, 6s.), is a diary of the siege, without literary pretensions; but we do not like it the less for being devoid of rhetoric and frankly unconventional in style. Most of the book has already appeared in the Morning Post. Consequently the good stories of Colonel Baden-Powell's reparlees to Cronje, Snyman, and Eloff have not the charm of novelty, having already been quoted far and wide; but most of them were worthy of being rescued from the newspapers. The tone is delightfully, if arrogantly, insular:—

> The Frenchman calls the Boer "canaille," the Boer doesn't seem to like the Frenchman or, indeed, any other foreigner, regarding him as an impetuous fool who would probably lead him (the Boer) into some nasty dangerous place, and the Englishman laughs at the lot; however, as I said before, the poor devils can't help being foreigners.

One of the latest popular military biographies is the life of General Hector A. Macdonald, by David Campbell (Melrose, 1s. n.). One cannot say much more of it than that it states the facts correctly, but the character sketch of the General by a shop-girl who knew him in the days when he was a draper's assistant at Inverness is worth quoting:—

> A braw loon, wi'een like glowin' coal. And the great broad shoulders of 'im! He was mair like a smith than a draper. But, mind ye, there was mething surly about Hector, as we used to ca' him. He was terrible obleegin, 'aye offering to lift up or doon bundles for us lassies.

The preface is an eloquent plea for the promotion of more non-commissioned officers to commissioned rank, and for the payment of officers on a scale which would enable more poor men to take up commissions when these are offered to them. Most people not exceptionally prejudiced will agree with Mr. David Campbell's arguments on this subject.

Yesterday and To-day in Kruger's Land (Elliot Stock, 1s. n.), professes to give us the personal knowledge and experiences of a lady from South Africa. It is a sufficiently readable little book, consisting partly of history and partly of reminiscences, but it adds nothing to the information procurable from a hundred other sources. The author tells us a little about the ostrich-farming industry, but not as much as we should like to know.

Dr. George M. Theal's Little History of South Africa was originally issued several years ago for use in schools, and has passed through three editions. The fourth edition, which is now published (Fisher Unwin, 1s. 6d.), contains an additional chapter dealing with the origin of the present war. Dr. Theal has written this chapter judiciously, not taking any side nor even indicating which side he would take if he were called upon to take one. His narrative ends with the issue of the Boer Ultimatum.

Mr. Horace C. Groser's writing of Field-Marshal Lord Roberts (Melrose, 1s. n.) has reached a third edition, a good fortune which it well deserves.

My Diocese During the War, by the Right Rev. Arthur Hamilton Baynes, Bishop of Natal (Bell, 6s.), is a pious, but platitudinous work, reprinted from a diary which is neither better nor worse than the average diary which does not get into print. In the closing chapter we have the inevitable suggestion that "God has been accomplishing a great purpose with this lesson of war with which He is closing for us the nineteenth century." We cannot wholly approve this easy estimate and rather patronizing approval of the workings of omnipotence.

The New Battle of Dorking (Grant Richards, 1s.) describes an imaginary French invasion of England, undertaken, apparently, without notice or previous declaration of war. The purpose of the book is the laudable one of drawing attention to weak points in our military organization, and the author leaves the impression that he understands his subject. As to the possibility of such an invasion being secretly prepared, however, we have our own opinion. It may be perfectly true that "there is always shipping sufficient for an army of 120,000 men for a short passage in the Northern parts of France"; but very few of the ships are ready to start at any given moment. Some of them are already weighed down to the Plimsoll line with eggs and other merchandise; others are in the middle of the loading or unloading process; the stokers and engineers and others, not expecting their services to be required, have gone carousing in cafés without leaving an address; the big Atlantic liners are under engagements to American citizens, whose Ambassador would be moved to communicate with Washington; and any endeavour to organize this chaos would in itself be a signal of alarm. Moreover, what is the author's authority for the statement that "secrecy for forty-eight hours can be assured?" The non-arrival in fine weather—which would be essential to the raid—of a single packet boat would cause inquiries to be made: and it would be strange if more than ten hours elapsed without the arrival of information. It would be interesting to know how the author supposes that the French would get over these little difficulties.

Mr. Caton Woodville illustrates and "a British Officer" writes a collection of interesting and topical studies of Social Life in the British Army (Long, 6s.). Although the civil population of England is ready to shout "Hurrah for the Army!" and appreciate at its just value the self-devotion and courage of the rank and file, it knows very little of the inner workings of that vast entity. "A British Officer" knows his subject well and lays before the reader the difficulties of the soldier's life, so changed in every respect by the short service system and other reforms from the life familiarized to all the world by Charles Lever. "Social Life in the British Army" should prove invaluable to our novelists who sometimes approach the terra incognita of military life with wonderfully antique information. Mr. Caton Woodville is at his best in the sixteen excellent illustrations he provides.

Mr. L. E. Henry, the author of England's Armed Neutrality (Farmer, 6s. n.), was once a professor at Sandhurst and appears to be that rara avis, a Frenchman who loves England and hates his countrymen. Where, he asks, is the evil eye in Central Europe at the present moment if not in France? We have wrestled with the book as a whole, but fail to discover exactly what it is about. The general impression is one of sentences that have been mixed up together by some one who does not understand their meaning. What is quite clear, however, is that the profits of the sale of the book are to be given to a hospital.

FICTION.

In the Train of Kings.

There are many ways of writing a novel of the past—the dully conscientious, the gaily unmoral, the sentimental, and so forth. But most of them leave out the human interest. Mrs. Stepney Rawson has had the happy thought of making the people in A Lady of the Regency (Hutchinson, 6s.) appear to be of flesh and blood, with the result that her book, in spite of a dull page or so, is extremely interesting. The history part of the book the Prince Regent, Caroline of Brunswick, Princess Charlotte, and the Windsor family disagreements is a little trite, but the period has not been greatly used, and the heroine's fortunes are followed with unusual zest. The pleasure of Caroline is a moving one; her friend, true through all accident and misfortune, Stephen Heseltine, who can sympathize: and we regret that so pleasant a story-teller has not thought fit to continue the relation even beyond the death of the Queen and the coming of happiness to the heroine and Heseltine.

Mr. Ronald Macdonald, the son of a famous novelist, has not had the same happy thought as Mrs. Rawson. "He knew he could write," was the burlesque title Mr. Barnard once gave to a book by Trollope, and the phrase suggests itself on reading Mr. Macdonald's novel The Sword of the King (Murray, 6s.). He knew that (with care) he could write in the style and character of a lady of the time of the Prince of Orange, and he has accomplished his task conscientiously but without inspiration. Now the story of a woman is the story of her love, says Philippa Royston, and, if you mix her love affair with the underhand traffic of the days before William's coming, throw in a disguise in man's clothes, and a bit of fighting, you get Mr. Macdonald's tale. The historical tone and the phraseology are well done, and the plot is not without an ingenious touch. Unfortunately the characters are a little more markedly puppets than those of the average "costume romance." It is a respectable piece of work that will delight and hold only the extremely ingenuous reader.

The Shadow of Allah, by Morley Roberts and Max Montesole (John Long, 6s.), is the most extraordinary Oriental novel that we remember to have seen. Everything is called by some mysterious Oriental name. The Bosphorus, for example, is the Boghaz. The War Office is the Serdarieate. The boatmen are caikdjis. The marines are guerindjilidees, the Servians are the Sharkian, and an Albanian is an Arnaut. The plot is political, dealing with the deposition of Sultan Abd-ul-Aziz and the fall of Midhat Pasha. The authors seem to have an exceptional knowledge of Ottoman affairs, and their book is very bloodthirsty. Whatever rank it may take among the works of Mr. Max Montesole, we are afraid it will not rank very high among the works of Mr. Morley Roberts.

The Heart o' the Peat, a little volume in pale-green paper covers (Simpkin, London; Mayne, Belfast, 1s.), consists of seven "Irish Fireside and Wayside Sketches," by the late Thomas Erskine Mayne. The tales are such as find ready acceptance in the magazines, and the prefatory verses are pretty, but the true chronicler which Ireland needs, the novelist with the seeing eye and the gifted pen, is still to seek.

In Christalla, an Unknown Quantity (Methuen, 6s.), Miss Esmé Stuart tells us the life history of a remarkable little girl. There is also a little boy who is very moral and who also is the "East Lynne" style, and two old gentlemen who remind one vaguely of Flaubert's Bouvard and Pécuchet. The story is not badly put together; but the little children who talk about religion are terrible little prigs, as children in women's novels often are.

We were expecting something about South Africa in the Overseas Library (Unwin), and we get it in Little Indians, by J. Mac (2s.). Some of the stories are about Kaffirs and others about Boers. There is a preface by Mr. Edward Garnett, insisting upon their value as "documents"; they are of no great value as literature.

LIBRARY NOTES.

A few weeks ago we drew attention to the then approaching celebration at Mainz of the quincentennial anniversary of Gutenberg's birth, and the proposal to establish a public library and museum as a permanent memorial. The festivities were carried out with much enthusiasm and magnificence. A typographical exhibition was opened by the Grand Duke of Hesse, a banquet given, and a grand procession organized which surpassed anything of the kind ever seen in Germany. Three thousand persons took part with cars to represent different literary epochs. There were visitors from all parts and the printers of various nationalities flocked to the cradle of their art. In spite of the dispute which continually simmers as to the original discoverer of printing, Gutenberg certainly did more to spread the art than any other man. Had the discovery of printing been retarded until Gutenberg's death the progress of civilization would have been less by something like a century than it is to-day.

The war apparently has had its effect upon the British Museum. From the Annual Report we find that there has been a slight falling off in the attendance in the reading room, though in most of the departments it has been satisfactorily maintained. The year has been marked by the virtual completion of the great catalogue and by many important additions to the library. The Hardwicke MSS., arranged in 930 volumes, are of the highest value historically, while the artistic treasures of Baron F. Rothschild's bequest are supplemented by sixteen illuminated manuscripts of rare excellence. The additions of printed books include a Lactantius of Sweynheyn and Pannartz, dated 1470, a work by Pope Pius II. ("De duobus amantibus"), which was one of the twenty books from the first French printing press at the Sorbonne, and a Florentine book of great rarity (Paulus Ricius "Super Logicam Pauli Veneti"), printed from type and thought to be unique. The MSS. department has acquired the only separate edition of the Vulgate New Testament, printed during the fifteenth century, and an almost perfect English version on vellum of the Golden Legend. A file, from April to July, 1880, of the "Kandahar News," a type-written daily paper published during the occupation of that city, is an interesting relic. We wonder whether, if the British Museum Bill had passed, the authorities would have endeavoured to transfer this newspaper to its birthplace. That ill-fated measure of economy has now perished in the annual "massacre of the innocents." Its disappearance is solely due to the vigorous protests from every quarter which the proposals evoked and it is gratifying to find the country so jealous of its treasure house.

Annual Reports have reached us from the public libraries at Hornsey, St. George's, Hanover-square, Willesden Green, and Lincoln. Readers at Willesden have hitherto been allowed free access to the bulk of the reference books, but the effect of this on valuable volumes has been so disastrous that the system has been abandoned. The Committee found that costly works were used as mere picture books, and they did not think this brought intellectual benefit to the readers. At St. George's a large room, formerly occupied by a natural history collection, has been transformed into a Magazine room, in which 42,000 periodicals have been issued during the year. There are also three quarterly library journals from Manchester, Leeds, and Chorley. A list of books on economic and social subjects has been issued by the librarian of Toynbee-hall, an institution always regarded as a temple of the science of economics. This exhaustive and convenient list of books and pamphlets will be of value for reference purposes in other libraries as well as to the student at Toynbee-hall.

The foundation stone has been laid of a Public Library for Helmsley in Yorkshire. The building is to combine within its walls a market, a court house, and a coffee bar. The public institutions of Helmsley will at least lay claim to being compact. This multiplying of different offices in one building reminds us of the ancient British Mote-hall, which served as a gathering place for the community in almost every circumstance of their tribal life.

The Bishop of Chester has expressed to a gathering of Library Assistants his views upon the Sunday opening of libraries. He made two points chiefly:—That public opinion should be consulted beforehand and that strict supervision of the libraries should be arranged without unduly adding to the labours of the employes. He saw no objection to Sunday opening during limited hours, nor did he think that any reasonable Christian would find objection. This seems to us a common-sense pronouncement upon a question too often debated in a narrow and controversial spirit. It is essentially a matter to be settled by local circumstances.

Correspondence.

EPISCOPAL REGISTERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It might be more accurate to call episcopal registers an "unrealized" instead of an "unrecognized" source of history; every one who has tried really to write the history of a parish must be aware of their existence and their value. In the slender list of those hitherto printed given by Dr. Cox that of Richard Fox, while Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1492-1494, has been omitted. One hundred copies of this were privately printed in 1889 from a transcript by Mr. C. T. Martin. Two reasons are given in the preface for selecting it from among others at Wells—first, the very interesting period to which it relates, a period quite anterior to the Reformation, and yet almost on the eve of that event; secondly, the comparative brevity of the volume, which enables the exact words of the forms used to be lastingly recorded without oppressive repetition. The book was edited by Mr. Chisholm Batten, who wrote the introductory life of Fox. Probably the life and the register would have both been of more value if published separately, but it was a small step in the right direction.

Yours faithfully,
CADWALLADER J. BATES.

GRAMMAR v. IDIOM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—"Too many Cæsars are not good" means there are too many bad Cæsars; with "is" the phrase means, "The fact that there should be too many Cæsars is not good." Mr. Cairns will probably prefer this latter sentence, which is quite grammatical. I don't. As he says, there is no arguing on taste. I note that Mr. Cairns does not return to the question of a plural verb after two disjunctive phrases; I may assume, then, that he grants that point.

The freedom of the early writers is just that which makes their great charm, and this is due partly to the use of vigorous words which the modern purist thinks undignified: partly to a feeling for the real meaning of words which is not in modern prose: partly to "ungrammatical" idioms, which like the one I am now speaking of give the meaning more forcibly, because put in fewer words, and with the emphatic words to the front. In this sentence, for example, "too many" is the essence; in the "correct" phrase, these words come after a formula which has no thought in it, but only helps the grammar. I will return to the other points on opportunity; but I ask leave to quote here one phrase I lately noted, which shows the bluntness of modern taste. A writer in a well-known weekly journal spoke of one who regarded his subject "from a one-sided stand-point."

Correctness is the idol of the modern purist; and to this he sacrifices much that is more valuable. Life and variety, for instance, is sadly to seek; and cumbrous round-abouts take the place of directness and force. The same is seen in verse, which is polished up to the extreme; false sentiment or triviality may pass, but an inexact rhyme never. Imagine the horror of the modern critic if he had to review Herrick for the first time. The man actually rhymes "sleepy" and "keep ye"!

I do not propose to follow out the analogy of painting. Analogies prove nothing, not even Butler's; but if we must have analogy, I compare the free writers to hand-painting, and the modern ideal to a German chromolithograph.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. D. ROUSE.

A MEMORIAL TO G. W. STEEVENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May we be allowed to draw attention in the columns of Literature to the memorial to the late G. W. Steevens, which it is proposed to institute in connexion with the City of London School?

Many friends of the school have felt and expressed the desire that the career of Mr. Steevens should be suitably commemorated in the place where he was educated. A committee has accordingly been formed, and arrangements have been made to present to the school a replica of the well-known portrait by the Hon. John Collier. It is also intended, if sufficient contributions are received, to found an annual prize.

We have done our best to communicate with the old pupils of the school; but, naturally, there are great numbers whose addresses are unknown to us, and we believe that many of them would be glad of the opportunity to make contributions. We therefore venture to ask for the hospitality of your columns in order that by this means they may be made aware of what is proposed.

We feel, of course, that our project is one for which support should be invited chiefly from old pupils of the school. But we have reason to think that some friends and admirers of Mr. Steevens, though not connected with the school, would be desirous of taking part in the memorial. Help from such sources would be gladly welcomed.

It would be convenient if all contributions were sent direct to the Treasurer.

Yours obediently,

B. L. ABRAHAMS, 31, Lansdowne-crescent, W.,
Treasurer of the Steevens Memorial Fund.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Publishers are taking advantage of the keen interest now felt in China. We mentioned some new books a fortnight ago. An important addition will be made next week by Messrs. Macmillan in a new work by Miss Seidmore, called "China: the Long-lived Empire." Like Mr. Colquhoun's book, published by Harper's this week, it is not an answer to the sudden demand for works on the Far East, but was in type before the present crisis arose. Miss Seidmore has already written two volumes of travel—"Jinrikisha Days in Japan," and "Java: the Garden of the East"—and she has visited China seven times within the past fifteen years. Several of her chapters are devoted to Peking; one to the foreign missions; one each to the cities of Tien-tsin, Canton, and Shanghai, and others to the Dowager-Empress and "The Decadence of the Manchus," the alien ruling family. The frontispiece is a portrait of the Dowager-Empress, from a painting in silk.

The Indian Famine is another source of anxiety to Englishmen at the present moment, and in this connexion Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co. are issuing a handy volume on Famines in India and their causes, compiled by Mr. Romesh Dutt, C.I.E. Mr. Dutt is known to English readers by his translations of Indian Epics and his works on Indian history. He has been in the Indian Civil Service for more than twenty-five years and himself been a famine relief officer. His book will have a chapter on Famines in India during the last 130 years, a series of Open Letters to Lord Curzon on the land question in India, and also chapters on Railways, Irrigation, &c. There will be appendices containing the opinions of Lord Salisbury, Lord Roberts, Lord Northbrook, Lord Lansdowne, and others on the Indian administrative and financial questions.

Even if we do not get a history of the siege of Mafeking from General Baden-Powell there is likely to be no lack of literature on the subject from other authoritative sources. Major Baillie's work we notice elsewhere. Messrs. Methuen are publishing a book on the "Siege of Mafeking," by Mr. Angus Hamilton, the Correspondent of The Times during the siege. Mr. Hamilton is a stepson of Mr. Pinero, comes of a fighting stock, and is an amateur soldier himself. He was taken prisoner by the Boers, and afterwards, when wounded in a fight, his coolness and humour won the approval of General Baden-Powell himself. The book will be illustrated by photographs taken by the author. It is hardly likely that Mafeking will have as many siege historians as Ladysmith, but there were several other English correspondents in Mafeking besides Major Baillie and Mr. Hamilton, among them being Lady Sarah Wilson (Daily Mail), whose husband was on Baden-Powell's staff; Mr. Neilly (Pall Mall Gazette) and Mr. Stent (Reuter's). And it will be strange if they do not soon swell the number of books about the siege.

The approach of the Presidential election in the United States is being heralded by the inevitable budget of political literature. Messrs. Putnam will shortly add to its number "A History of Political Parties in the United States," by Mr. James H. Hopkins, who traces the development of party through successive elections down to the coming campaign. The appendix will contain, among other things, a copy of every "platform" from the rise of party to the present day.

The Putnams will publish a "History of the Scotch-Irish Families in America," by Mr. Charles A. Hanna, being a record of the Scot in North Britain, North Ireland, and North America. The volume, which will probably be followed by other works giving a detailed history of Scotch-Irish families in America, deals with the history of Scotland up to the beginning of the eighteenth century; the plantation of Ulster by the Scotch in the time of James I.; the "Regiam Majestatem" of the landowners of lowland Scotland in the time of the Bruce; the origin and location of the families in Scotland; the derivation of Scottish surnames in Scotland and Ireland, and the part which the Scotch-Irish took in the colonization, separation, and final nationality of the American colonies.

Mr. John Mackay, Glasgow, is to publish shortly "An Historical Account of the Settlements of Scotch Highlanders in America Prior to the Peace of 1783: Together with Notices of Highland Regiments and Biographical Sketches," by J. P. MacLean, Ph.D. Mr. MacLean is a Scots-American, and is the author of several antiquarian works.

We reviewed, last week, the new volumes of Mr. Murray's edition of Byron's Poems. The fourth volume of the letters will be ready very shortly, carrying the correspondence from 1816 to 1820. It will include a reproduction of Lawrence's portrait of Lady Blessington in the Hertford-House collection, just opened to the public.

Next week Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish "Scrambles in the Upper Grisons," by Mr. George Yeld, the editor of the Alpine Journal. It consists of the author's contributions to the Alpine Journal, with additions, and records the pioneering days of the mountaineering problems which lay beyond the attainments of climbers when Mr. Yeld first visited Chamonix in 1878. Chalet life, high Alpine passes, and the valleys are dealt with, as well as the peaks and passes.

One of the books promised for the early autumn by Messrs. Putnam is "A New Study of the Sonnets of Shakespeare," by Mr. Parke Godwin, who has undertaken to point out facts which have either been overlooked or undervalued. The volume will contain a reprint of the facsimile edition of the Sonnets.

Mr. Bolton King, the author of "A History of Italian

Daily," in two volumes, is, we understand, engaged in collecting material for a third volume.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. will shortly publish a volume of ballads and blank verse, entitled "In the Waiting Time of War," by Aubrey Mildmay, M.A., author of "Vignettes," "Brown Studies," &c. Some of the pieces have appeared in the Daily News and Pall Mall Gazette; all relate to the troubles in South Africa.

FICTION.—A few weeks ago, in an article on Matilde Serao, we expressed the wish that her novels might be better known in this country. No English versions of her best works, which give such a vivid picture of contemporary Neapolitan life, have yet appeared, and we are pleased to hear that Mr. W. Heinemann has now arranged to publish a series of translations of her novels, uniform with the works of Gabriele d'Annunzio. The first volume will be ready in the autumn.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Richard Whiteing has so far recovered from his long illness as to lead to the hope that he will now be able to settle down to the new novel which he is writing for Messrs. Hutchinson. It is expected to be of greater length than "No. 5, John Street." The Paris articles which Mr. Whiteing has been writing for the Century will also appear in book form when complete.

One of the first books of the autumn season will be Sir Walter Besant's "The Fourth Generation," a modern story which has been appearing serially. For volume form the story has been extended by about a third.

A new novel by Mr. J. A. Steuart, a tale of love and adventure, more after the style of "The Minister of State" than "Wine on the Lees," will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson probably in the autumn.

"For Britain's Soldiers" is the title of a book containing contributions from sixteen popular authors of the day got together by Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne to be published gratuitously in aid of the War Fund by Messrs. Methuen. To encourage the book to go to a premium it will be on sale for the limited period of three months.

A new Lady's Magazine, so it is stated, is to be published by Messrs. Pearson next January, and it will contain Mr. Hall Caine's new serial.

The name of Mr. Leonard Merrick's new novel, which Mr. John Murray will publish, is "The Worldlings," not, as we gave it by a clerical error, "The Wordlings."

EDUCATIONAL.—"The World in 1900," as the new geographical series which Mr. Heinemann is preparing is called, will probably not make a start until the late autumn. The list of subjects and authors is promising. "Britain and the North Atlantic," announced as being in the press, is by the editor, H. J. Mackinder; Sir Clements Markham is responsible for Volume II., on "Scandinavia and the Arctic Ocean"; Professor Elisée Reclus deals with "The Mediterranean and France," Dr. Joseph Partsch with "Central Europe," Dr. Scott Keltie with "Africa," Mr. D. G. Hogarth with "The Near East," Prince Krapotkin with "The Russian Empire," Mr. Archibald Little on "The Far East," Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich on "India," Dr. H. O. Forbes on "Australasia and Antarctica," Professor Israel C. Russell on "North America," and Professor J. C. Branner on "South America."

The new volume of Bell's Science Series, "The Student's Dynamics, comprising Statics and Kinetics," by Professor Minchin, will be ready at once. Great prominence is given throughout the work to arithmetical illustration. Another characteristic of the work is that it treats of the science of Force, or Dynamics, as founded directly on Newton's axioms, or Laws of Motion, and more particularly on the second axiom.

The next volume of Bell's Illustrated Classics (Intermediate Series) will be Sophocles' Antigone, edited, with Introduction and notes, by G. H. Wells, M.A. It will probably be ready early next month. In the early autumn Messrs. Bell will publish "The Proem to the Ideal Commonwealth of Plato," with introduction and critical and explanatory notes by Dr. Tucker, Professor of Classical Philology in the University of Melbourne.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

One by one the old inns to which so many memories cling are coming into the market, usually to be swept away or altered beyond recognition. Many such cases have come to notice during the present week. The Bell at Edmonton, which will shortly come under the hammer, is inseparably connected with John Gilpin, but it also recalls the last years of Charles Lamb, who lived and died about a mile away, in Bay Cottage, and, when any of his friends visited him, used to drop in at the Bell on their return and take a parting glass—usually of porter—with them. The churchyard stands close by his cottage, and it is recorded that about a fortnight before his death he pointed out to his sister the spot at which he wished to be buried. Here he now lies, under a simple, turf-covered mound; and his sister sleeps in the same grave.

* * * *

The sale, too, is announced of the Old Bull Hotel at Rochester, where the Pickwickians stayed on their arrival at Rochester by "Commodore" coach from London; while the Golden Cross Hotel at Charing-cross, connected with the coaching house from which Mr. Pickwick and his friends started on their travels, is to be sold by auction. The Old Bull remains practically unchanged since the day in 1836 when the first number of "Pickwick" made its appearance. There is the large assembly room in which the memorable ball was held, when the encounter took place between Mr. Alfred Jingle and Dr. Slammer, with consequences which might have been disastrous to Mr. Winkle; there, too, are still preserved the bed rooms of the Pickwickians, and No. 17 (Mr. Pickwick's) was the room which Dickens himself frequently occupied. At the Golden Cross Hotel the Pickwickians had their encounter with the [illegible] man and were rescued by Mr. Jingle; and it is mentioned on occasions into "David Copperfield." The original Golden Cross Hotel of Dickens stood some yards to the west of the present building, and was known as "The Bull and Mouth of the West" in its palmy days as a coaching house. It faced the big statue of King Charles at Charing-cross, but was removed to make way for the laying out of Trafalgar-square, and degenerated into a railway parcels office. Wheatley, in his "London Past and Present," quotes "An excellent New Ballad" being entitled "A lamentation over the Golden Cross, Charing-cross," [illegible] to Mugginn:—

No more the coaches shall I see
Come trundling from the yard,
Nor hear the horn blown cheerily
By brandy-tippling guard.
King Charles, I think, must sorrow too
Even were he made of stone,
When left by all his friends of yore,
(Like Tom Moore's rose) alone.

What would we not give to hear Old English "as it was spoke," to hear Chaucer's lines read as he himself read them? That, unfortunately, can never be; but we can, thanks to the phonograph, preserve for posterity the speech of to-day, and Professor Joseph Wright has the credit of perceiving and realizing the great service to literature which can be rendered by the phonograph. His great Dialect Dictionary, of which the second volume has just been completed, is, as we pointed out on the appearance of the first volume, only just in time to preserve the fast-dying provincial speech of England. It is, we are afraid, certain that the dialects of England are being undermined to a slow, but sure, decay under the levelling [illegible] and railways. In connexion with his Dictionary Professor Wright has been enterprising enough to set about collecting phonographic specimens of dialects, partly to preserve a vivid record of them, partly to check the material he is collecting for a Grammar of English Dialects on which, we are glad to learn, he is engaged.

Professor Wright has devised fifteen [illegible] of homely English, with careful instructions as to how they are to be spoken into the phonograph. Whether the true rustic will be equal to the task of mastering these [illegible] may be doubted, and there will always be a danger of his [illegible] his dialect for the occasion, just as he insists on putting on his best hat to have his portrait taken. We are not at all sure that the educated man, who, like the late Rev. H. Ferguson, has thoroughly mastered a dialect, would not be the right man to talk into the phonograph. But two such [illegible], and all under guidance, and Professor Wright has already, we understand, succeeded in obtaining a good number of first-rate specimens. His idea is to hand them over when complete to some public institution, and students of language owe him an immense debt of gratitude for the energy and ability with which he is tackling this difficult subject of dialect, a subject which he has made entirely his own.

The Anglo-Saxon Review seems to us a specially good number. Perhaps the thing of most importance in it is Mr. Gosse's article on "Culture and the Small Nations," which sketches the present condition of culture in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, and hazards the theory that culture will find its true home in the small nations, where it is not oppressed and coarsened by wealth, strength, and activity. Lady Londonderry gives some correspondence of much personal interest about the great Castlereagh, who, she thinks, has never had his due. For his action during the Napoleonic war Castlereagh deserves the epithet great; but besides his later unpopularity there were two circumstances which have stood in the way of his being one of the great figures of political history—he was no orator, and he was never Prime Minister. Mr. Mallock writes, under the heading "The Limitations of Art," on the purpose novel, and to his paper we hope to return. Two other literary articles—one on "Heroic Poetry," by Sir Alfred Lyall, and another on "Some Minor Miseries of a Book-lover," by Lady Warwick—are not specially striking.

* * * *

Apart from criticism the Review gives us three imaginative pieces—a poem by Mr. John Davidson; a tale by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, showing his usual picturesque skill and a twenty-minutes' comedy by Mr. Hamilton Aïde. There is also a verse translation from the Georgics by Lord Burghclere. Mr. Davidson's poem "Eclogue of the Downs" is full of rich poetic speech and finely modelled blank verse. But there is a certain formlessness in its conception, and we cannot get away from the artificiality of his method. Why should Lucian, Urban, and Eustace spend their time on the Downs in describing to each other the scenery? Here, by the way, is a passage which shows Mr. Davidson realizing the opportunities of a poet in this age of mechanical invention.

> Sphinx is now
> A symbol of the Universe; her call
> The queries What and Why, intolerably
> Hurled into my ears at inauspicious
> Times, with subtle craft and iteration fell,
> More vehement than a tunnel-nearing train,
> A factory whistle at the break of day,
> Or siren of a liner in a fog.

Whatever the future of South Africa may be, it is pretty certain that at the close of the present war the old national aspirations will "be ready to vanish away." One need not be a Pro-Boer to feel a touch of the pathos with which the Afrikander will now recall his national hymn, a translation of which we give below. It is not the hymn of the Transvaal or of the Orange Free State, but it may be taken as the political confession of faith of the Afrikander Bond, composed soon after its institution in 1880. It is included in a collection of original poems written in the "Taal," gathered from different sources by Mr. Reitz, and first published in 1888. It was composed by the late Professor Pannevis, and has been set to music for four voices by Professor J. S. de Villiers. The translation is by Mme. Grandinet. It is a perfectly literal one, and shows how easily the phraseology of the one language can be transposed into that of the other:—

THE AFRIKANDER VOLKSLIED.

> Each nation has its native land;
> We dwell on Afric's barren sand.
> To us there is no spot so dear,
> The whole world over, far or near;
> Our pride and glory to proclaim
> "South Afric's children" is our name.
> Each nation has its native speech;
> As far as Cape and Transvaal reach
> We speak one tongue, our Taal so dear,
> We need no other language here.
> The language which our fathers spoke
> Suits well enough South Afric's folk.
> Each nation has its laws, which tell
> How good to do and evil quell;
> These laws are fram'd with such intent
> As fit each nation's nat'ral bent;
> So do our laws the needs provide
> Of those who in South Afric bide.
> Each nation has a right to be,
> E'en though but poor and weak as we.
> There is a Pow'r which governs all
> And makes the proudest tyrant fall;
> He watches those that press us hard,
> But will South Afric's children guard.
> Each nation has a time to stay,
> To grow in strength and then decay;
> Our times are with the Lord, and we > Know that what is, is best to be;
> Our day will rise, though long the night—
> South Afric trusts in God's own might.
> The one great God holds in His hands
> The fate of nations and of lands;
> He gives to each their separate speech,
> Their home, their rights, their time to each.
> Who this forgets will rue the day,
> O Lord, be Thou South Afric's stay!

One of the native Japanese newspapers, the Kokumin Shimbun, has a unique feature which will assume importance at the present moment—an international department, printed in English and other European languages, with the object of facilitating the interchange of views between foreign residents and the Japanese themselves. This paper is edited by Mr. I. Tokutomi, who a short time ago paid a long visit to this country, making the acquaintance of many prominent men. The 3,000th issue of the Kokumin Shimbun was a remarkable publication, consisting of fifty-four large pages as well as two very admirable and characteristic full-page illustrations. The Press of Japan, led by such journals as the Kokumin Shimbun, has amply justified the removal of the irksome restrictions that formerly hampered the free development of Japanese journalism.

A correspondent writes:—"Apropos of Mr. Archer's recent remark in his lecture on Ibsen that the dramatist may have had another ending in his mind when he began to write The Doll's House, it is interesting to remember that a version of the play which ends in reconciliation actually exists. Twenty years ago this version was acted everywhere in Germany. Instead of Nora's exit and the famous bang of the front door, Ibsen substituted the following:—

> NORA. We can no longer live together as married people. Good-bye. (Turns to go.)
> HELMER. Very well then—go! (Takes hold of her arm.) But, first, you shall see your children for the last time.
> NORA. Let me go! I will not see them! I cannot!
> HELMER (drawing her towards the door on the left). You shall see them. (Opens the door, and says softly) Look! there they sleep so peacefully and unsuspecting. To-morrow when they wake and call for 'mother' they will be—motherless!
> NORA (trembling). Motherless——!
> HELMER. As you were!
> NORA. Motherless! (Inward struggle, during which she drops her travelling bag). Oh, I shall commit a crime against myself; but I cannot—no, I cannot desert them! (Sinks on her knees before the door.)
> HELMER (in a low, but joyful tone). Nora!
> (Curtain falls.)

The alteration was made for a famous German actress who exclaimed when the play was being prepared for production in Hamburg, 'I would never have deserted my children.' In 1880 Ibsen wrote to Laube, the Viennese theatrical manager, sending the original ending of Nora, and begged that on its performance in Vienna the change he himself was responsible for might be cancelled. From that time it has ended on the German stage with the same decisive bang of the door as elsewhere."

* * * *

"A Writer for Boys" complains in the Author that boys' books and children's books generally are not treated with proper respect by reviewers, but are "slaughtered in batches of from thirty to forty in a single column." As many of the papers devoted to the interests of literature consecrate special supplements every autumn to the children's gift books, the complaint seems a little unreasonable; and if "A Writer for Boys" could see how much cubic space such books occupy in our own office in the months of October and November he would realize the material difficulty of treating each one of them as if it were a work of what a popular novelist has called "colossal" labour. Moreover, if he read as many of them as we have to read at a certain season of every year, he would realize that they are so much of a muchness that it is not very easy for the reviewer to find anything to say about them.

* * * *

Perhaps, however, the harm done is not, after all, so very great. The boys always find out their favourites. They did not need a reviewer to tell them that R. M. Ballantyne was greater than his contemporaries, and it would be vain for any critic to try to depose Mr. Henty from the pedestal on which they have placed him. Why, then, should the reviewer's withers be wrung because he has never explained in a column of careful analysis, which no boy would ever read, the reasons why Mr. Henty is greater than the author of "Jack Harkaway?" On the other hand, the reviewer may urge in self-defence that, at any rate, he gives more attention to children's books than did his predecessors. Stevenson's poems for children got much more notice from the critics than did those old collections of rhymes for children which Mr. Lucas disentombed. The gravest critics have brought their acumen to bear upon the works of Lewis Carroll; but it is not easy to picture Dr. Johnson similarly analysing "Robinson Crusoe," or Jeffrey or Sidney Smith looking for reasons to explain the immense popularity of "Sandford and Merton."

* * * *

Mr. Herbert Spencer, when he issued his programme of "The Synthetic Philosophy" a little more than thirty-eight years ago, anticipated the "obvious criticism that the scheme there sketched out was too extensive." By his single-minded devotion to his self-imposed task he has not only lived to carry out the whole of his vast programme, but even to return to revise the earlier portion of his work. He has just completed, we learn, the revision of "First Principles." Thus he has not only succeeded in refuting the criticism which he anticipated, but has supplied a ready answer to the familiar jest that his was a "stereotyped" philosophy. Mr. Spencer must be used to this jest, but he was none the less offended when it was repeated in serious philosophical controversy by his latest antagonist, Professor Ward; and he reminded the Professor that it was his poverty and not his will that consented to the stereotyping of the "Synthetic Philosophy."

* * * *

An immense amount of work must have gone to the making of Miss Hetherington's "Index to the Periodicals of 1899" (Review of Reviews office, 10s. n.), which classifies the contents of over 180 British and American publications. The previous volumes have already proved the immense usefulness of this publication to all literary people, and to journalists in particular. We cannot help thinking that the usefulness of the Index might be increased if it recognized the existence of some of the graver weeklies as "Poole" does. One can understand that all the minor popular monthlies have to be treated: for one of the great practical uses of the Index is to inform the editors of those ingenious publications exactly how long it is since any one else published an illustrated article on the Lap Dogs of Lady Novelists or the Noses of Notable Men. On the other hand, serious students of serious subjects are more anxious to know whether they have been treated in the really literary quarterlies than to be referred to papers in the Women at Home or the Girls' Own Paper. Let it be added, however, that Miss Hetherington's generosity in the matter of cross-references is worthy of grateful recognition.

* * * *

In our recent article on Wordsworth as a book collector, there was a reference to the poet's ill-usage of his books. A recent catalogue of an autograph dealer contains a curious passage illustrating this. The letter is from De Quincey, and he says: "Wordsworth was so negligent and so self-indulgent that, as Southey laughingly expressed it to me when I was staying at Greta Hall on a visit, 'To introduce Wordsworth into one's library is like letting a bear into a tulip garden.'" Dogs' ears leaves have been a source of annoyance to readers before Wordsworth's time and since; but the "self-indulgence" of using the forefinger as a paper-knife is one which few of us are willing to extend to even our dearest friend—when the book happens to be our own.

* * * *

Apropos of the Thomson bi-centenary which we mentioned a fortnight ago, a platform is to be erected on Edrom Hangs, opposite the Manse where the poet was born, and in sight of the monument raised to his memory. A local poetaster has written half a dozen quatrains "In Praise of 'Rule Britannia,'" unequalled, he would have us believe, by any song of Scott or Byron, Hogg or Wordsworth. He goes far afield for his comparisons, as thus:—

> Nor Shelley in his giddy skiff
> Off the Italian shore,
> Ne'er gave the world a grander strain;
> Nor Homer long before.

* * * *

Mr. F. G. Kitton writes:—"It is with much regret I learn that my statement regarding the authorship of The Mountain Sylph proves to be incorrect, and that what I hoped was a valuable discovery turns out to be a 'mare's nest.' The only two copies of the play which I have seen (viz. those in Dibdin-combe's 'British Theatre,' and Lacy's 'Acting Editions') are anonymous, and the only clue I obtained as to ascertaining who the criticism (quoted by me) that appeared in Figaro in London. It now transpires that Barnett's opera, The Mountain Sylph, was written by T. J. Thackeray, a cousin of the author of 'Vanity Fair,' and, as the initials were not given in Figaro in London, I hastily arrived at the conclusion that there was but one literary Thackeray, the famous 'Titmarsh.' My note on the subject, however, enabled me to correct Mr. Lewis Melville's error respecting the name of the composer of the music for the little 'opera.'"

A correspondent writes: "The bogus traveller is a considerable and always interesting figure which has seldom been absent from literary history from Mandeville (as some assert) to a notable soi disant voyager of our own day. The past year in America has seen a curious case of the kind in the work of a youth called William Jameson Reid, who supplied many editors, especially in Boston, with accounts of his remarkable experiences and adventures in the remotest corners of the world. One method of Reid's was to invent interviews with non-existent persons. An article on the adventures of a professor who had met with a wonderful race of pigmies appeared in a New York paper. All efforts to find this professor, who was said to be visiting Boston, were futile, the professor, as well as the pigmies, being an invention of Reid's fertile imagination. But as a rule Reid's articles professed to be about his own experiences. In the Boston Home Journal he ran a series of articles on his travels in Spain. From the first the editor noticed mistakes in Reid's copy, names being spelt wrong; but as the general tone of the articles was literary, he supposed that these were merely the eccentricities of genius. Only a few of the articles had been published before readers wrote to point out that the writer apparently knew nothing of the places he described. His largest work is a book of 500 pages on his journey "Through Unexplored Asia," with a man named Burton, in the years 1883 and 1891. This book, published last autumn by a Boston firm who had accepted it in good faith, was quite a revelation to Reid's friends, who were under the impression that they saw him again and again in the neighbourhood of Boston at the time when he says he was making his 6,000 mile journey through Asia. The obvious improbability of this book led to Reid's exposure by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle."

Rostand's L'Aiglon is already being adapted as an opera, and the rumour that Cyrano de Bergerac is also to be presented upon the musical stage is not unexpected. Cyrano, with its heroic style, its strong flavour of bombast and rhetoric, is a play admirably suited to show off all the brilliant combinations of the modern orchestra. If the rumour turns out to be true, we can only hope that the composer who writes the opera will be worthy of all the dramatic situations with which he will have to cope. In the right hands a most effective trio might be made out of the balcony scene, where Cyrano prompts Christian with fine speeches to win the hand of Roxane, the lady with whom he is desperately in love himself. It would require a master to write music for the still more pathetic situation in the last act, where Roxane discovers the real author of Christian's love-letter—the dying Cyrano, who reads it at her request in the twilight, and, as darkness obscures the words, recites from memory the impassioned sentences which had been prompted by himself. What an opportunity for the dramatic musician!

The opera has always been in close connexion with the play in France. Molière himself would scribble off words for a little pastoral opérette for the diversion of Louis XIV. Rousseau, the father of melodrama, was an opera-writer, and Marmontel, when the public found his plays a little insipid, would call upon Rameau to collaborate in an opera. Beaumarchais' plays, Le Barbier de Seville and Figaro, are even better known in their operatic form. Hugo's Ernani and Le Roi s'amuse had hardly the popularity all over Europe of Verdi's musical adaptations—Ernani and Rigoletto. Have not the tunes of La Traviata given more pleasure to different nations than Dumas' play La Dame aux Camélias, on which the opera is based? The language of music is universal, and people who cannot follow a play in a foreign language can listen to a good tune of any nationality.

Dokumente der Frauen is a new periodical edited by Marie Lang and published at Vienna. It reveals a curious state of things as to the position of women in German-speaking countries. In some towns no girl or woman walking unaccompanied is safe from police inquisition. A certain Dr. Heilinger assures the public of the terrible condition of things that the emancipation of women has brought about in this country, where women are mayors, Judges, and professors, with the sad result of the destruction of the family and the entire loss of domestic comfort. Dr. Lueger, however, absolves England, and sees in the emancipation of women an invention of the Jews. But the same journal shows that, in spite of these follies, much useful work is being done in a quiet way by the women's societies and unions in Austria. There is a careful bibliography forming a fortnightly record of the books and articles dealing with the interests of women.

They certainly understand the art of literary celebration and benefaction in Poland. It is about a year and a-half ago that Poland subscribed no less than £20,000 for a monument of Adam Mickiewicz on the occasion of the centenary of his birth. And now we read that the inhabitants of Warsaw have agreed to present Sienkiewicz with a gift of landed property (for which a large sum has already been subscribed) to celebrate his Jubilee. The jubilee celebrations are to take place next November. Sienkiewicz has already many admirers in America and in this country who may feel inclined to contribute. Mr. Edmund Gosse may find here an illustration of the theory which he discusses in the Anglo-Saxon Review that it is the little peoples who are the elect in the matters of the spirit.

An autograph letter of Byron which comes under Messrs. Sotheby's hammer next week is dated Aston-hall, Rotherham, October 4, 1813, and is addressed to Mr. John Murray, his publisher. The poet gives this explicit instruction:—"In the proof from the 'Curse' alter this line 'Whose arts and arms but live in poet's lore' to 'Whose arts revive, whose arms avenge no more.' Remember this." The strange fact in connexion with this particular letter is that the lines have never been altered. In the Byron édition de luxe now being issued by Messrs. Murray the line remains as if the letter in question had never been penned; neither is allusion made to it in the correspondence. If we mistake not, Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge some time ago examined the letter on behalf of the publishers, and, possibly, in future issues the line will appear as revised by Byron. At present there is nothing to show, first of all, why the instruction was not carried out, and, secondly, how the letter passed out of the firm's hand. For some years, we believe, it was in the possession of one of the Whitbread family.

An interesting and rare book is included in Mr. Quaritch's recently issued Part VII. of his "Catalogue of the Literature and History of the British Islands." This is a copy of the first edition, 1584, of Reginald Scot's "The Discouerie of Witchcraft," one of the select volumes that have been condemned to be burned. Scot's work was the first real attack in England upon the popular belief in witches, and raised a great commotion. One of the many to enter the lists against him was none other than James of Scotland. The King published a counterblast under the title of "Daemonologie," a copy of which also figures in Mr. Quaritch's long list of works on this subject. When James came to the throne of England he revenged himself by condemning his opponent's book to the flames. Scot's work is a fair statement of the case for and against witches, without any of the horrible details which generally make the reading of the trials so offensive, and he finishes every section of his argument by showing the utter unreasonableness of the whole superstition. That a considerable body of public opinion was even then on his side is clear, for in his observations on human credulity he remarks:—"Howbeit you shall understand that few or none are thoroughly persuaded, resolved, or satisfied that witches can indeed accomplish all these impossibilities; but some are bewitched in one point and some cozened in another until, in fine, all these impossibilities and many more are by several persons affirmed to be true."

Several matters of moment came before the Congress of Archæological Societies last Wednesday. Mr. J. Willis-Bund dealt with the British Museum Bill, and expressed himself as generally in favour of local depositories for local records; and as chairman of the Worcester County Council he was glad that they had just expended £1,200 on record-rooms for their own purposes. But Mr. Bund regarded it as a mere dodge of the Treasury to expect them to find house-room for the cast-offs of the British Museum unless they were provided with the funds. And there was also the difficulty of proper custody and proper inspection. Sir John Evans, who presided at the Congress, is a British Museum trustee, yet he had no hesitation in opposing the manner in which this permissive Bill was drafted, and he admitted that, if the comparatively modest plan for extending the buildings at the British Museum was only carried, there would be ample room in the basements for the retention of all they were now receiving for a long time. A resolution was unanimously carried asking the Treasury to press forward the new buildings at the Museum as rapidly as possible.

Those who are interested in the subject of Dr. Cox's paper which appeared in these columns a week or two ago will follow the course of the Bill as to custody of diocesan records already carried through the House of Lords, to which the Archæological Congress also devoted considerable time. It was said to have been suggested by the Bishop of London at the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Mr. W. Page said that the Bill provided for "the sufficient housing of diocesan records" by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, apparently from their funds. This was excellent, but the Bill in several particulars was rather vague. It provided that the Commissioners should themselves settle what were "diocesan" records, and if they provided the money they would be tempted to minimize. Archidiaconal and peculiar muniments are little known and are far worse looked after than episcopal records. Mr. Page feared that these, which are of great value, would not come under the word "diocesan." Mr. W. H. St. John Hope said that episcopal records were in great danger. Some that he knew were merely stored in fireside wooden cupboards in an ordinary office. Reference was made to Dr. Cox's article in Literature as to their great value. A committee was recently appointed by the First Lord of the Treasury to inquire into and report as to local records generally and their preservation. This was done at the suggestion of last year's congress. On Wednesday the congress decided to ask the Government not to proceed with the Diocesan Record Bill until this report has been presented.

A correspondent writes: The Daily News of June 30th, in a brief article on "Certain Dickens Clubs," says that "at last, after thirty years, comes the Boz Club, recently formed out of the fragments of 'Boz's' most cherished surviving friends." The allusion is to a select gathering of those who knew Dickens in the flesh, who met to dine together at the Athenæum Club by invitation of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, himself an intime of the great novelist. The party consisted of Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A., the illustrator of "Our Mutual Friend"; Mr. Luke Fildes, R.A., the illustrator of "Edwin Drood"; Mr. J. C. Parkinson, a contributor to All the Year Round; Mr. Ashby-Sterry, a writer on Dickens topics and Dickensian topography; Mr. Charles Kent, who won Dickens' friendship through a kind and appreciative review of "Dombey and Son"; and Mr. F. G. Kitton, who never saw Dickens, but has produced many volumes relating to "the master." Other guests were the novelist's son, Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, Q.C., Mr. Clement Scott, Lord Shand, Lord Herries, the Hon. Mr. Vernon, and Sir James Crichton Browne. I am not aware, however, that the interesting event has originated, or was intended to inaugurate, a "Boz Club," as the Daily News suggests, though it is to be hoped that such a club may be the result of the Athenæum dinner. As the Daily News points out, there are flourishing Dickens Clubs elsewhere, notably that founded in Boston, U.S.A., by Mrs. Adelaide H. Garland (its President) in 1891. This is essentially a ladies' confraternity, and christened the "All Around Dickens Club"; it numbers nearly eighty members, while among the honorary members we find the names not only of Dickens' near relatives, but of those who are distinguished in literature both in England and America. The Dickens Club at Birmingham is, I believe, the only other club bearing his name; it was founded some years ago, and is kept alive by small subscriptions to cover working expenses. Like its kindred society at Boston, it promotes the study of Dickens by means of original papers on Dickens topics at evening meetings, and readings from his works. The Daily News omits to mention the "Pickwick Social Society," founded nearly three years ago by a few Dickens admirers in London. This society has for its object a monthly meeting of members for a social evening, consisting of readings from "the master's" works, interspersed with music and conversation. Beginning as a private réunion, application for membership quickly poured in, until it became necessary to obtain more accommodation. The "Pickwick Social Society" was also formed for charitable purposes, and has already assisted many deserving cases. At the time of the "World's Columbian Exposition," [illegible], there existed the "Columbian Pickwick Club," the headquarters of which were on the Exhibition grounds, in a [illegible] (more or less) the famous "Great White Horse" [illegible] the scene of Mr. Pickwick's adventures with the lady in yellow curl papers. The better known "Pickwick Dinner Club" (established in 1870), of which Sir W. T. Charley, Q.C., was at one time president, still flourishes. A [illegible] fraternity is "The Cheerybee Club", the programme of a meeting (dated 1899), given by the members, [illegible] but one item a propos of Dickens, viz., a reading of "Sunday Under [illegible]

Plots.

Exactly what it is that Mr. Bennett [illegible] about plots in his article on that subject in Cornhill is a question to which a first reading of his paper hardly yields a satisfactory solution. To be only partially intelligible is Mr. Cope's playful way, and a characteristic charm of his prose style. It seems clear, however, that he is writing of the plots of novels, and that he would regard a novel without a plot as quite abnormal. Surely that view is hardly justified by the facts. Dramatic poetry, it is true, has been distinguished from epic poetry by the [illegible] that a drama comes to an end whereas an epic merely leaves off; but there are no adequate grounds for classifying the novel as an off-shoot or subdivision of the drama. In its origin, indeed, as one infers from the early Greek examples, the novel is rather an epic in prose than a drama in narrative form. The Odyssey rather than the Œdipus is its model. Later, the novel has often taken the place of the pastoral and the satire, and to mention the sermon—three kinds of literary composition in which plots are usually dispensed with. Novelists have essayed to fulfil the functions of Theocritus, of Juvenal, and of Sevenoaks; and these functions can be discharged either with a plot or without one. The contemporary tendency, it is true, is distinctly in the direction of plots. On the one hand, the [illegible] plot has, in the hands of such writers as Gaboriau, Wilkie Collins, and the creator of "Sherlock Holmes," reached a perfection which would have been the envy and despair of the most ingenious novelists of the age of Fielding. The [illegible] resembles that which a century of invention has [illegible] into most mechanical contrivances. Between [illegible] and the new there is almost as much difference as between the ancient strong boxes and the modern safes. Of the former kind, what one may describe as the [illegible] follows the lines laid down in the Poetics, and has its beginning, its middle, and its end, its [illegible] and its [illegible] arrangement of scenes so as to make the [illegible] cumulative, has also made great strides during the last [illegible]. Like so many notable literary innovations it probably came from France. At all events it was flourishing in France before it [illegible] to England; and one can most easily trace its progress there. There is no plot, as a dramatist would understand the word, in the novels of Madame de Staël. The plots of Balzac are inchoate and crudely handled. But in Flaubert we find the steady progress towards a previously appointed climax which is of the essence of plot; and Flaubert has since been the favourite model. In England we find the same steady progress to a great dramatic situation not only in theatrical writers like Mr. Hall Caine and Mr. Guy Boothby, but also in novelists of the calibre of Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. [illegible]. But we find little of the sort in Thackeray or Anthony Trollope or any of the writers of the age anterior to them. Whether the change is entirely for the better is another question. The dramatic method, it may be, arrests attention more certainly than any other; but that it holds the attention so long as some of the older methods one hesitates to say. Most of the novels of Dickens [illegible] one turns to again and again—from "Pickwick Papers" and "Vanity Fair" [illegible] reading works, entirely devoid of climaxes and surprises, and defying all the canons, the observance of which has enabled the critics to compare Mr. Hardy to Æschylus. We are inclined to think that, if they did depend upon climaxes and surprises, a good deal of their interest would evaporate after a first reading, and they would not [illegible].

TO ART.

The eve hath gone to sleep upon the lake,
And in the hawthorn brake,
Sleep-lulled by his own mellow carolling
With which he charmed the woods the livelong day,
And by the fragrant incense of the may,
The last sweet-throated thrush hath ceased to sing;
High-rocking poplars make
A gentle rustling murmur as they swing,
Holding faint converse with the evening star;
From them and me I know thou art not far,
Nor thy bright hair from his brown-feathered wing.

The earth of her old deities is lorn,
No more the triton's horn
Sounds in the trumpet song of leaping seas,
Upon the white stones and green waterweeds
No nymphs sleep now, no more the sound of reeds,
Blown on by Pan beneath the pleasant trees,
At high noontide is borne
Through woodland places on the summer breeze,
No more the horde of merry satyrs twines
In glad procession through the laden vines,
Singing wild songs in Bacchic ecstasies.

Like sweet may odours at the breath of June,
Or stars before the moon,
Or sunrise glories from the morning sky
Before the glad sun's surging flood of light,
Man's early dreams and faiths are vanished quite,
Or leave behind for what was hope a sigh.
For earnest prayers a tune
Sung without heeding, for the truth a lie.
The summer and the moonlight and the day
Some know not, but sigh only: "Well-away,
The spring, the starlight, the dawn's roses die."

Yea, they are gone with them that worshipped thee;
But earth and sky and sea
Are thy fair temple still, and fair alway
Are woods and fields that our fast footsteps shun,
Still night is clad with stars, and still the sun
Fills with bright wine the pitchers of the day.
Yea, fair immortally!
And some there are who to thy precincts stray.
"Why seek vain joys with ineffectual pain?
And why for shadows spend thy life in vain
When I have rest and calm?" they hear thee say.

Some see thy soft sweet smile within the stone;
To some thou hast thy throne
Upon the bright crest of a towering song:
To some thou smilest with a homely look,
Ruddy with firelight, in an ingle-nook;
To some thou art where tortured faces throng;
Upon the city's moan
Of anguish thy soft voice is borne along;
To some where the loud tempests shout thou art,
Or in a dewdrop on a violet's heart,
Or thou dost sleep the daffodils among.

We only see thy shadow in a dream,
Or thy white shoulder gleam
Among the twilight woods, then fade away,
So blind are we with dust of little things,
And by the flesh so shorn our spirit's wings;
Thou shin'st a moment as the sunbeams play
On bubbles of a stream,
We take thy light and vanish ev'n as they.
But we have seen in that brief gleam of light
Kinship and source divine and infinite,
And one great throbbing soul within the clay.

Personal Views.

VILLIERS DE L'ISLE-ADAM.

As I was turning over the pages of the recently issued Brussels édition de luxe of selected tales by Villiers de l'Isle-Adam—and the "Histoires Souveraines" is a beautiful volume in its large pages, clear and finely set type, and exquisite grey-ink headpiece and tailpiece ornaments by Th. van Rysselberghe—my glance fell upon these words in "Akëdysséril," an Oriental tale in which the young French experimentalists of to-day dip as though it were indeed the fount sought by Ponce da Leon:—"La juvénile beauté de Sedjnour, en sa blancheur rayonnante, semblait dérler les ténèbres." I put the book down, for some vague thoughts of which I had been conscious of late in connexion with Villiers de l'Isle-Adam had suddenly clarified.

Villiers—"the great Villiers," "the noble Villiers," "the incomparable Villiers," as his admirers delight to speak of him—was for the most part ignored in his lifetime and adored since he died in poverty and disappointment. One or two famous writers helped to make him the fashion, or, at least, a literary vogue, for a time. Verlaine calling him "this incomparable Villiers," M. Maeterlinck doing homage in "noble," and even the exact and exacting Mallarmé minting "the great Villiers" for common use. Since then he has been praised hardly this side idolatry. So generous, indeed, has been this praise that even those who do not read his writings call him master; as an enthusiast of our London Press, who the other day spoke of "that incomparable romance, 'Axël,'" and alluded to "the mystic 'L'Adoration des Mages,'" a work, indeed, promised by Villiers, but, unfortunately, never transferred from the library of dreams to the hands of the printer.

That Villiers was a remarkable, and, above all, a stimulating writer, is hardly disputable; that he is still remarkable, and still stimulates, is the opinion of the present writer and others better fitted to appreciate his peculiar excellences and unique distinction. But was he, is he, really a great writer? Is he, even in his idealism, a clear and convinced thinker?

I see that in his recently published and most interesting and suggestive volume of essays on the "Symbolists," Mr. Arthur Symons quotes Verlaine to the effect that the greatest of the fin-de-siècle poets of France was "far from sure" that "the philosophy of Villiers will not one day become the formula of our century." Verlaine, however, is hardly an authority on such a point, for he himself had in excess in every direction what Villiers had in excess intellectually, an emotionalism akin to hysteria rather than to mental and spiritual sanity. Villiers, as a matter of fact, had no definite philosophy. His mind reflected the speculations and dreams, the thoughts and spiritual axioms, of the gnostics and other mystics of the Asian East; but from "Isis" to "Axël" I doubt if there is a sentence which, in substance, and, indeed, probably in wording, could not be found elsewhere in mystical literature. I remember when I first read "Axël" I imagined that a new gospel of the ideal had been set forth by this master of the white thought and the cameo phrase. Here, it seemed, was the revelation of the poet-seer; in this fascinating, beautiful, auroral, but unreal and fantastic drama of spiritual life, I believed a lofty symbolism revealed the essential ideal. But the interpreter of "a new and profound" spiritual philosophy in "Axël" has yet to come. This strange drama is clothed in continual beauty. It has many moving and lovely phrases, and towards the close in particular displays convincing beauty of thought rarelled by spiritual emotion, and of diction clarified to a noble excellence by perfected art. Yet to aver that Villiers is a great thinker in "Axël" is to confuse the inspired interpreter with the inspiring creator. Even among his contemporaries there was a man who thought all Villiers' thoughts, but thought far more searchingly and exactly—a man, too, who had much of the same arlstocratic attitude towards life, and was not less, perhaps more, impassioned with the Catholic idea—a man of whom we hear little or nothing, and yet one of the most remarkable of modern Frenchmen (with an incalculable influence on certain writers, as Maeterlinck, for example), Ernest Hello. When, recently, I reread "Axël" it occurred to me continually that Villiers' "thought" is as mainly a reflex of the "thought" of Hello as his occultism is mainly a reflex of the occultism of ancient Egypt and India, coloured by medieval mysticism. In "Axël" he strove to sum his life-long mystical ideal, but because that ideal was not natively his but reflected from many kindred minds, or, at least, was never realized absolutely of his own mind, it is of the rainbow-philosophies, which charm the wayfaring imagination, but lead only to phantom goals. In "Isis" and elsewhere Villiers kaleidoscoped from his memory and imagination what he had read in many Oriental and medieval books and speculated upon in many dreamy hours; in "Axël" he was the poet inspired (and it must be admitted vaguely, however beautifully) by Hello, as a consummate influence, as, let us say, the impassioned but vague singer of the "Songs Before Sunrise" was inspired by the profound and exact thinker Mazzini.

It was in relation to this aspect of "the great Villiers" that the sentence quoted in the opening clause struck me as so significant. All his life long Villiers strove "dêter les ténèbres"—strove to defy, to vanquish the shadows of the actual, of the world as we know it, of life as we experience it, of death as we fear it. In all his work, from the "Isis" and "Elën" and "Morgane," of the early sixties, to the posthumous "Propos d'Au-delà," of 1893, the distinguishing characteristic is "une blancheur rayonnante," a radiant whiteness both of thought and phrase: and, always, as it seems at least to the present writer, the beauty which he worships and often so nobly reproduces is not that masterful, that virile, that sane and absolute beauty which we discern in the ideals and achievement of the greatest, but a lesser, a not mature beauty, "la juvénile beauté de Sedjnour."

I have so long been an admirer of the "Contes Cruels" and of other work by Villiers as romancist, that I anticipsted the keenest pleasure from a re-perosal of the twenty selected stories in M. Deman's charming édition de luxe—and the more so as it is known that the selection was made by Stéphane Mallarmé. Here, it is true, are the exquisite "Akëdysséril," the sombre "Souvenirs Occultes," "L'Amour Suprême," and other brief masterpieces; but, alas, I found that memory flattered. All are the work of a rare artist and a remarkable mind, but if the saying of a great contemporary of Villiers be true, "L'art robuste seul a l'éternité," then is it difficult not to believe that in another decade Villiers will be only a fine tradition in French literature, and, perhaps, remembered only for one superbly outlined but incomplete creation, the archetypal Tribulat Bonhomet.

COLOUR SIMILES.

In this age of experiment it is not without interest to consider emotion that attempts to [illegible] intensity but complexity of hue that we try to pursue. Even the primary colours of the rainbow we have [illegible] to re-christen. The [illegible] in Chaucer's "[illegible] and rede," but J. A. Symonds' "[illegible] saffron and ivory, ochre and cinnabar." To quote the most recent example, Rudyard Kipling, always brilliantly successful in colour, names the hills of the veldt "red, cinnamon, opal, amber, dun, and pure cobalt." The early painters wrought with blue, green, red, yellow; but we must coin [illegible] terms to fit the delicate yet shifting hues of Tennyson. Our poets have enlarged the language of colour with images drawn from every source. We have discovered such images chiefly in the jewel world. The old Scottish poet Dunbar is one of the first to experiment in this now exploited field. "The fresh young," he says, "throw beames rede lirkying as rosy cankis." Spenser, still perhaps our most exquisite colourist in [illegible], has countless jewel similes; the grapes of that entwining vine, that overarch a porch of rare device, are

> Some deep empurpled as the hyacine,
> Some as the ruby, laughing sweetly red,
> Some like fair emeralds not yet well ripened.

The "Faerie Queen" also yields such [illegible] as the following, written of Britomart's blushing, > her pure ivory

> Into a clear carnation addeth dyal.

But the wholesale and generally injudicious [illegible] daisies to pearls, grass to emerald, hyacinths to sapphires, the sky to mother o'pearl, belong to the present century. So excessive has been the use of jewel-names to describe [illegible] that nature often seems vulgarized, like an over-bedecked woman, and our more fastidious poets seek never similes. Even the mineral world has furnished epithets less gaudy and often more appropriate. Christina Rossetti writes:—

> Only scorpions perked in the sand
> Black as black iron, or dusty pale [illegible]

nor must Tennyson's magnificent line be omitted: "The [illegible] rusted on their cranes," "copper and [illegible]," etc., are occasionally met with; thus John Davidson:—

> At Easter when the thorns burst
> The breezing wood with Elves [illegible]

Thus Mathilde Blind:—

> Miles and miles of tangled fern
> Burnished by the sun
> To low a copper dun.

The love of the modernest for new colour names shows itself in the universality in ancient times of such a term as "couleur Isabelle,"—in modern times of such a term as "khaki-coloured." So strong is the movement towards enlarging the borders of colour that from each new poet we may confidently expect to find experiments in this direction. Sometimes the technical names of colours are used with effect startling or grotesque—"yellow-ochre boats" being grotesque, and carmine, in the following passage, striking. The [illegible] shares.

> [illegible] nise
> Deep notes of carmine pulsed in crises
> Upon the hissing turf.

There is here, of course, a danger of artificiality; but, in the hands of a master, boldness of experiment rarely shows turns to a success startling by reason of its freshness.

Among the explorers in search of colour-terms the Belgian poet Verhaeren holds a high place. Verhaeren's work is almost unknown in this country. Yet his is the spirit of adventure, the far-off glamour, so dear to this age, the secret of extended perspectives. He embraces, moreover, in extraordinary variety of subjects;—"Les Visages de la Vie" show us [illegible] have the luminous radiance of a Turner; in "Les Flamandes" he has gone for inspiration to the old Dutch painters who illuminated brutality by their genius. In "Les Moines" a vein of modern scepticism and of mediæval mysticism are mingled—while with the pity for all the exquisiteness that is dead, there blends a keen realization of the gross materialism of the Middle Ages. Sympathies of so wide a range must necessarily decrease in intensity; and the poems have the modern note of vague suggestiveness, the modern passion for Nature. Verhaeren's modernity appears in nothing so much as in the colour-expression of his poems. Here he is to a large extent a pioneer. He has forced even chemistry to yield him language. He has given us such terms as "nitre-coloured," "phosphorus-coloured," "sulphur-coloured." He experiments, too, in similes drawn from the world of minerals and precious stones. His gold is not the definite and limited gold of mediæval ages, but the gold of thin sun-suffusion, which seems to interpenetrate his very words. We read of "Le mirage en or des soirs et des aurores." And here is a passage full of the modern mysticism that greets with rapture the unexplained at the core of the commonest object:—

Les beaux soirs dont les gloires voyagent
Et, s'accrochent, à la cime des bois,
Pour les nimber encore, comme autrefois,
De tout ce que le ciel mit d'or et de miracles,
En eux, comme en d'immenses tabernacles.

Verhaeren generally avoids the over brilliance of jewel colour. He loves to extract strange hues from the more uncommon precious stones. Jade, for instance, and ebony are little used as colour terms; here is a fine jade-effect:—

L'eau de ses lacs, où se mirent les nues,
Reste froide d'avoir baigné les chairs de jade,
Et les crins verts des luisantes Hamadryades.

Think of the delicate comparison involved in the juxtaposition of shadow and ebony!—"Des villes d'ombre et d'ébène." Verhaeren also indicates blackness, but less successfully, in the phrase "les cormorans d'encre,"—a metaphor quite inferior to Sir Philip Sidney's comparison of the suffusion of storm-darkness into the sky to ink poured into water. Verhaeren has many sky-metaphors. Here is an immovable one, "un horizon d'ivoire." In Verhaeren we find falling water likened to mother o'pearl, to tortoiseshell, to silver. Sometimes he gets a vivid effect by clothing an abstract idea with colour, as, for instance:—

Dites, la mer, nue et pure, comme une idée
Qui luit et envahit mon âme émeraudée,

and again,

La verte immensité des plaines et des plaines.

The mineral world affords this magnificent metaphor:—

Les grands soleils, cuivrés des suprêmes automnes
Tournent éclatamment dans un carnage d'or.

The absolute rightness of this term seems to lend a glamour of delight to all our future autumns.

The chemical terms have even greater magic, but they are almost too startling: the air of the laboratory is still about them. In time they may become familiar in speech as are such words as olive-green, apple-green, and sage-green. Here are two examples:—

En cette heure d'immobilité d'or. . . .
Au cassement de soufre et d'or
Des cieux d'ébène et de portor,
J'ai regardé s'ouvrir la nuit,

and again,

Dites, les estuaires de nitre et de phosphore. . . .

Thus gradually with the advance of science every minutest colour-shade will come to have its accurate name; and the rainbow, that was only composed of five glories, will have a million; and so in a world whose borders are ever enlarging poetry may find its ever-increasing opportunity.

ETHEL WHEELER.

TABLE TALK OF A GENEVAN NUN.

Her name was Jeanne de Jussie; at the time of the Reformation she was a sister in the Convent of Sainte Claire; in later years she became Lady Superior of a Convent at Annecy. In her honoured age she wrote out her recollections of the Reformation, not with any view of publishing them, but by way of providing something of an improving character to be read aloud in the Refectory at meal times. Half a century or so after her death the book was printed as a religious tract to show Protestants the error of their ways. Possibly it may, at the time, have awakened some of them to a sense of sin; but its interest for the modern reader is not controversial but historical. It abounds in anecdote, and shows us, better than any other book, what the Reformation at Geneva looked like.

The story begins, for practical purposes, with the arrival of Farel—the "nasty little preacher," who was very soon to preach the nuns out of the town. The simple method of this reformer was to walk into any church, climb up into any pulpit, and denounce the doctrines of the rightful occupant. When the municipal authorities began to remonstrate with him he curtly replied: "Magnificent Signors, you must confine yourselves to righteous commands if you wish the servants of God to obey you"; and the magnificent signors let the matter drop. Then things began to happen. Roman Catholic altars were carried off to be used as Protestant wash-hand stands; an uncompromising Lutheran fed his horse on consecrated wafers; a Lutheran husband hired six burly ruffians to kidnap his wife and drag her, screaming, to the Supper of the Lord; and the sisters of Sainte Claire, hearing these stories, formed processions, and marched round and round their cloisters singing penitential psalms.

These religious exercises, however, did not perceptibly delay the progress of the Reformation. The day came when Farel made the case of the nuns the subject of a special sermon of which the substance has been preserved by Sister Jeanne. They were his poor blind erring sisters, he said, but they deserved to be pelted with stones for undertaking to remain unwedded for ever—"a thing which God had not commanded because He knew it to be impossible"; and he further declared that they ought to be "turned out and compelled to marry in accordance with the commandment of God." The effect of the discourse was, Sister Jeanne tells us, that, as soon as the morning sacrifice of praise and prayer was over, a number of bachelors, included in the congregation, climbed up on to the Convent wall and sat there singing amorous songs for the edification of the inmates.

It was a picturesque beginning. The next step was for Protestant visitors to come knocking at the Convent door. One of them was an official who had something to say about the demolition of a wall. He washed his hands in the holy water, and, when he got outside, went about boasting that he had been privileged to kiss the nuns all round. "But this," says Sister Jeanne, "was a foul lie; for he did not even attempt to kiss any one of us." Another visitor was a lady who, though only allowed to converse with the sisters through the grating, sought with "piquant words" to prove to them that married life was more agreeable than spinsterhood. The Lady Superior very properly closed the grating in her face, but she "stopped there a long time talking to the wooden shutter without receiving any answer—which made her very angry." Finally the reformers themselves, Farel and Viret among them, came to call. They also were requested to say what they had to say through the grating, but obtained admission under threat of breaking down the door. The nuns were summoned to their presence; and while the senior reformers discoursed of matrimony in its religious aspects, the junior reformers proceeded to make love. This was more than the Lady Superior could stand;

She sprang from her seat and protested:—

"Mr. Syndic! Since your young people can't keep quiet, I shall not keep quiet either. I insist upon hearing what they are saying to the sisters."

And she placed herself between the sisters and the young men, saying,

"You're a pack of forward young men, but you won't make any progress here."

Whereat they were all very indignant, and exclaimed:—

"What the devil is the matter with the woman? Are you mad? Go back to your place, madam, and sit down."

"I won't," she said. "I won't sit down unless these young men leave the sisters alone."

The Lady Superior was turned out of the room, and the preacher resumed his discourse. We read that "when he spoke of the sins of the flesh the sisters began to scream"; while the Lady Superior, who was listening at the keyhole, battered at the door, exclaiming, "Don't you listen to him, my sisters; don't you listen to him."

The net result of this pastoral visit was one conversion. "The ill-advised Sister Blasine" announced her intention of leaving the cloister for the world, in order to seek a husband. Three hundred potential husbands were waiting for her outside the Convent gate, and no doubt she married one of them. The reformers added insult to injury by requiring the Convent to provide a dowry; and a few days later Sister Blasine returned, dressed in the height of the fashion, to demand damages for discipline inflicted upon her during her membership of the sisterhood. The Lady Superior pleaded justification. "Imprisonment," she said, "did her good; see how well she is looking. As for the whipping, you must know that this kind of correction is as necessary in the cloister as in other walks of life, and Sister Blasine has never been whipped unless she thoroughly deserved it." Sister Blasine replied that she had been whipped for working at her spinning wheel on Corpus Christi Day. "And very wicked it was of you to do such a thing," interrupted the Lady Superior. But the Syndics adjudged that the punishment was in excess of the crime, and that the claims of Sister Blasine must be satisfied; and execution was duly levied on the convent furniture.

It was the culminating outrage. The nuns decided to leave Geneva, and applied to the Syndic for an armed escort as far as the bridge over the Arve where Genevan territory ended. Their request was granted. It is in her description of the "dolorous departure," as she calls it, that Sister Jeanne is at her best. She shows us the nuns walking "two and two, holding each other's hands, their faces hidden, observing a strict silence." She tells us how the Lady Superior broke the silence in order to point out to the Syndic that a young man was disobeying his orders and whispering to a nun, and how the Syndic threatened to cut the young man's head off if he did not at once desist. She assures us that the Syndic himself was so moved at the spectacle that he "sobbed aloud," but presently pulled himself together, saying "Now it is all done and settled, and there's no use in arguing the matter further." Finally she draws a pathetic picture of the wanderers, who, since their taking of the veil, had never been outside the Convent walls, making their dolorous way as best they could across the fields:—

Truly it was a pitiful thing to see this holy company in such condition, so overcome by pain and toil that several of them broke down and fainted by the way—and that on a rainy day and in a muddy road, with no means of getting out of their trouble, for they were all on foot, except four invalids who were in a cart. There were six poor aged sisters who had been for sixteen years members of the order, and two who for sixty-six years had never been outside the Convent gate. The fresh air was too much for them. They fainted away; and when they saw the beasts of the field they were terrified, thinking that the cows were bears, and that the sheep were ravening wolves. Those who met them could not find words to express their compassion for them; and though the Lady Superior had given each sister a stout pair of boots to keep her feet dry, the greater number of them would not walk in boots, but carried them tied to their girdles, and in this way it took them from five o'clock in the morning until nearly nightfall to reach Saint Julian, though the distance is less than a league.

At Saint Julian the nuns were met by the governors and the priests; the latter bringing with them the apparatus of public worship. They fell on their knees to the [illegible] adoration of the cross. And there we will leave them; for their further fortunes and the remainder of Sister Jeanne's narrative have nothing to do with either Geneva or the Reformation.

Reviews.

BETWEEN CHAUCER AND SPENSER.

"Saintsbury duce et auspice Saintsbury, Messrs. [illegible]wood's "Periods of European Literature," under the general editorship of the professor, are not likely to show any lack of learning. The fourth volume, on THE TRANSITION PERIOD (1.), by Mr. Gregory Smith, is a fine example of erudition. This period, which roughly speaking embraces the fifteenth century, or, as far as England is concerned, the period between Chaucer and Spenser, will not seem as unfruitful as it is generally supposed, if we are content to enjoy the treasures of prose which Mr. Smith includes in his survey. In poetry of the highest kind the times were sterile enough. Not all the efforts of Dunbar, Gavin Douglas, Hawes, Occleve or Lydgate can balance the perennial charm of Sir Thomas Malory's prose romance, "La Morte D'Arthur." The picturesque interest of the German Minne-song and Meistersang cannot be compared with the enduring appeal of the "Decameron Chaucer" or even the amusement still provoked by the knaveries of "Till Eulenspiegel." Of the French poetry of the time Villon's alone still maintains its vitality, while in prose we have the chronicles of Froissart and Joinville, the satires of Antoine de la Salle, and the immortal Pathelin, the first of the light comedies in which France excels all other nations. In Italy alone the greatest of the poets were the humble forerunners of Arcadia, the pulpit thunderest with the splendid memory of Savonarola, and the "Novelle" reflected the sparkle of the piazza.

Mr. Gregory Smith recognises the sterility of the Italian creative literature in his period, and endeavours to show its interest for the student who loves to watch the transition from the old to the new. The evolution of the drama from the medieval cycle, founded upon the [illegible] of the Church, to the Renaissance play; the decay of the medieval allegory to the poet's gradual disillusion from the conventional design of the Rose and the Court of Love; the curtailment of the epic romance in the fifteenth century ballad; the medieval humour [illegible] in the "Danse Macabre," giving way to the "comic elegy" spirit of the Renaissance; all these are here carefully [illegible]. The author enters bravely upon the Ultima Ground which the critics have made for themselves in the waste places of the century. Professor Skeat's latest theory that James I. of Scotland, the chivalrous author of the "Kingis Quair," had a hand in the translation of the "Roman de la Rose" is duly chronicled in a note. Another much controverted point, the origin and authorship of the ballad, gives rise to one of Mr. Gregory Smith's most luminous chapters. The oldest extant examples of ballad literature belong to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. But the appearance of native simplicity and vigour which they possess has naturally led to the theory that the ballads as we know them are later versions of earlier forms, existing before the development of the literary romance. The critics who hold this view incline to the belief that these popular songs were of mixed authorship. In an article on "Ballads" Mr. Andrew Lang says:—"Like the Volks-lieder of other European countries, the popular poems of England were composed by the people for the people." Mr. Gregory Smith on the other hand, ranges himself with the writers who regard the ballad, not as a popular "genre," of mixed authorship, and of great antiquity, but as a literary product, based upon the romance. According to this theory, if the extant ballads are not the earliest, they may quite as well be the literary copies of previous literary versions as the echoes of folk-songs, springing from the heart of the people before the days of "individual literary effort." The absence of proof makes it impossible to come to a definite decision between two such opposite theories, but meanwhile Mr. Smith's remarks on the familiar devices of the ballads add much colour to his theory that they are of artificial origin.

The reader will naturally turn with especial interest to the portion of the book which deals with the poetry of our own islands. In the period between the "Canterbury Tales" and the "Faery Queen" the Scottish poets far outshone their confrères south of the Tweed. While Lydgate and Occleve were for the most part mere echoes of Chaucer, the work of Dunbar and Henryson, the vivid realist of the "Dance of the Seven Deidly Sins," and the agreeable fabulist of the "Lion and the Mouse," was of a much more individual character. In the poetry of England proper Skelton, who is said to have been Henry VIII.'s poet laureate, was the first to strike a note of his own. Mr. Smith emphasises the more romantic side of this poet, who is too often regarded merely as a satirical author of disagreeable doggerel at the expense of Wolsey and others. Another poet, Sackville, not mentioned in the present book, has been regarded by some critics as a representative of the transition. Mr. Gregory Smith ends his survey of the period with Sir David Lyndesay, but it is quite possible—in company with Hallam—to regard Sackville's Induction as the last link between the medieval allegory proper and the "Faery Queen." This of course would carry us somewhat far into the sixteenth century. Sackville was actually a contemporary of Spenser's, but the Induction was written some thirty years before the "Faery Queen," and is essentially of a transitionary character. The sound of Skelton's name or even of Sackville's does not exactly communicate a thrill to the average British heart. It is not for individual genius that we must look in this period. But the poets who followed in the wake of Chaucer did some service to poetic form by their submission to so great a model. Once even, in a more original moment, Lydgate added to the forms of verse in the Envoi to the "Flour of Curtesye." Mr. Gregory Smith might have mentioned that these few lines provide the earliest model of the stanza used by Gray in the Elegy.

> Princesse of beautee, to you I represente
> This simple dyte, rude as in makinge
> Of herte and wil faithful in myn entente
> Lyk as, this day, the foules herde I singe.

In manner as well as in their manipulation of stanza and couplet the poets of the fifteenth century imitated Chaucer well enough at times for their work to be confused with his own for centuries to come. After all, the reverence paid to the "old maister dere" in the imitations of the poets of the transition is a touching tribute to his greatness. It is no wonder that his "Well of English undefiled" should have filled the rivers of poetry to the full for so long.

CHINA.

Two things should be made clear concerning Mr. A. R. Colquhoun's THE "OVERLAND" TO CHINA (Harpers, 16s.). In the first place, it is not a book produced because the Chinese crisis has become acute, but a book that happens to be ready at a time when instructive books on Chinese affairs are wanted. In the second place, it is not a book of travel, but a series of essays on the various political and commercial questions connected with China, written by a man who visited China for the purpose of collecting his facts. So many things have happened in the last few weeks, and so much has been cast into the melting pot, that a good deal of what Mr. Colquhoun has written is already, through no fault of his, out of date. His opinion that the Chinese "are not a difficult people to rule, but are, on the contrary, remarkably docile," was no doubt justified by the facts that he was able to observe; but he cannot claim the credit of having foreseen the troubles which have lately burst upon us like a bolt from the blue. The word "Boxer" is not, so far as we have seen, so much as mentioned in his pages, and he appears to regard the Chinese Empire in the light of a patient under chloroform waiting to be operated upon by the Powers. The enemy for him is always Russia. That China itself can be effectively hostile to any one does not seem to have occurred to him.

On the subject of the missionaries Mr. Colquhoun has a good deal that is interesting to say. He seems to regard the Roman Catholic missionaries as the most dangerous, since the French people deliberately use them as agents provocateurs; and the most dangerous of Roman Catholics are the Chinese converts. In connexion with this branch of the subject he gives us an incident which is well worth quoting:—

> A Roman Catholic priest (Chinese) was riding into a town when some of the country people cursed him. He at once got out of his sedan-chair, called for the leading men of the town, and told them that unless they paid him $100 he would denounce them to the magistrates. Ignorant of what the consequences of their getting into the hands of the mandarins might be, the people collected the ransom demanded and paid it to the priest. It is said that he invested the money in a house in the neighbourhood, and settled down in it to propagate the doctrine. It is not surprising that arbitrary proceedings like this should cause the Christians to be feared and hated, and we need not wonder at the occasional murder of a priest when such feelings are spread generally throughout the country.

This, no doubt, explains a good deal.

The chapters which are most interesting at the present juncture are those headed "Peking past and present," in which we have some pleasant pictures of the life of diplomatists at the capital of the Celestial Empire. Until quite recently, it seems, they were a happy family, with very little work to do and no international jealousies worth speaking of. The prominence of the British Plenipotentiary was unquestioned. "The stiff but friendly German, official Frenchman, genial American, smiling Japanese, and suave Russian followed with good grace the Yang Kuo Fu, leading the smaller fry, Italian, Belgian, Spaniard, and Dutchman, who were even more glad to benefit by the British ice-breaker, although, to be precise, ice-breaking was rarely needed." The change came after the war with Japan, when the rivalry for concessions commenced. This rivalry seems to have had its effect upon the social intercourse of the Ministers, and was the occasion of a very humorous incident at the Peking Club. The French Minister, we are told, considered that as the representative of his country he was entitled ex officio to a seat on the committee. When he was not elected, he resigned his membership in indignation. The result was somewhat astonishing:

> What were the incredulity and amazement of the members to hear some weeks afterwards, through the Chinese club-servants, that the French Plenipotentiary, who had meanwhile made a great show of haughty indifference, was in the habit of visiting the club clandestinely, in the early morning, to read the papers and magazines, and even to take them away! When officially taxed by the committee, M. Gérard's sole concern appeared to be lest the story should get into the newspapers. An amusing sketch did, however, appear in the Rattle, a Shanghai illustrated comic journal: "Club Library, Peking, 6 a.m., M. Gérard discovered in pyjamas, devouring La Vie Parisienne!"

Mr. Colquhoun's book is written in a very interesting style, and, though some of the expressions of opinion contained in it will probably need to be revised, there can be little doubt that it will find many readers.

SOME TOPOGRAPHICAL BOOKS.

Chelsea.

We should like to see each district of London treated on the plan adopted by Mr. Reginald Blunt in his ILLUSTRATED HISTORICAL HANDBOOK TO CHELSEA (Lamley). It would be difficult to take a better model. It follows somewhat on the lines of Darlington's London, and is scholarly, lucid, systematic, and within its limits complete. It is profusely illustrated, and the illustrations are carefully chosen from many sources—consisting of photographs, engravings and old prints, pen-and-ink drawings, reproductions of paintings, plans, and excellent maps. Moreover, it is handy in form and printed in excellent type judiciously varied so as to guide the eye to what is distinctive in the subject matter or the arrangement. It is a book which for its care and its lucidity it is a pleasure to praise.

Hampstead.

Mrs. Caroline A. White, the author of SWEET HAMPSTEAD AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS (Elliot Stock, 15s. n.), tells us that her multitudinous literary engagements have prevented her from finishing her book until she has reached her eighty-ninth year. At any rate, she has finished a good book—a little haphazard, perhaps, in its arrangement, but packed with interesting gossip of the eighteenth century, and well illustrated with views both new and old. It is hard to realize that the Hampstead of those days was a health resort holding much the same position that Harrogate holds to-day, except that iron, and not sulphur, was the distinctive ingredient of the waters. So it was, however, and so high was the reputation of the waters that, for the benefit of those who could not repair to the wells, they were "carefully bottled up in flasks and sent to Mr. Phelps, apothecary, at the Eagle and Child, in Fleet-street, every morning, at the rate of 3d. per flask." A physician, too—the great Dr. Soames—"boomed" the waters, much as modern physicians boom those of Marienbad, or Kissingen, or Ischl, and formulated a scheme of treatment for his patients:—

> The best time to take the waters is from June to Michaelmas; the time of day an hour after sunrise (no wonder music began in the Long Room at 6 a.m.). He allows his patients balm, or sage tea, with a little orange peel in it, for breakfast; or chocolate, milk porridge, or mutton broth, with bread and butter. An hour after taking the water coffee may be used—the less the better; but as for the green or bohea thea, that "ought to be banished."

Music and other diversions flourished, as they should at health resorts, and the most distinguished company might be met there—Addison, and Garth, and Steele, and Arbuthnot, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Swift, and all the Kit-Kats. Gay went there, too, to recover his spirits after losing his fortune in the South Sea Bubble; and one of Swift's correspondents tells him that "Pope is off and on, here and there, everywhere, à son ordinaire, therefore, as well as we can hope from a carcase so crazy"; and Colley Cibber paraded there, carrying odes in his pocket and "reading them to those of his acquaintances who would listen"; and Mrs. Barbauld took a house there, in 1785, and was called upon by Dr. Beattie, and Mrs. Hannah More, and Samuel Rogers; and Lord Thurlow cut a noble figure "wearing his full suit of cloth of the old mode, great cuffs, many buttons, great wig, long ruffles"; and Leigh Hunt shocked the respectable by inviting Shelley to his cottage. The muster roll, in short, is as distinguished as need be wished; and Mrs. White is to be congratulated on having made us see all these many notables in their habit as they lived. Her book is really a notable contribution to local history and has no dull pages.

Surrey.

While we are waiting for the large and definite County Histories which have been promised, smaller County Histories continue to appear. The latest is Mr Henry Elliott Malden's HISTORY OF SURREY (Elliot Stock, 7s. 6d.). It is bright and readable. In addition to treating of graver matters, it tells us of such things as Surrey cricket, Epsom Races, and the rise and fall of Epsom as an inland watering place. It seems that the first blow dealt at the Epsom waters was given by an advertising quack:—

> A Dr. Levingstone started a rival well, nearer to Epsom Village, built an assembly room and a sort of bazaar of shops for fancy goods, opened a gambling saloon, and puffed his waters as the real curative Epsom waters. People deserted the old well for the new, having [illegible] them, and not caring for the fact that the new water [illegible] any other, or perhaps preferring it so.

The waters finally went out of fashion when [illegible] invented in 1753, and the assembly rooms and other fashionable surroundings of the well were destroyed in 1804.

School and College Histories.

CHRIST CHURCH is a college of many men, but all the men have one thing in common—viz., a surpassing admiration for "the House." It is, so to speak, a house divided, but not against itself. A member of another college might perhaps derive the smallest soupçon of the feeling of superiority [illegible] about the former home of the "tutts" in Mr. Thompson's very able contribution to the Oxford College Histories Series (Robinson, &c. each). But it is of the slightest, and an old member of the House, already a little proud of his college, naturally grows still more so as he makes research into its former history. The records of Christ Church—so intimately connected with the records of England—are, perhaps, more resplendent than those of any other college. Not only was the foundation royal, but the House has been the resting-place of no less than ten royal progresses, from Elizabeth's to the fourth George's, and the college of the Prince of Wales. All this is duly chronicled by Mr. Thompson, and the still more enduring interest of the buildings is well brought out, though their history is rather too much scattered about the book. Studied consecutively, it affords fine examples in the history of Architecture, in the church and monastic buildings of St. Frideswide, the Tudor buildings of Wolsey, the Gothic roof to the staircase leading up to the hall by Dean Samuel Fell—a wonderful example of good Gothic so late as Charles I., Wren's Tom Tower, rightly praised by Mr. Thompson in spite of its debased Gothic, and Aldrich's buildings in Peckwater. Mr. Thompson has already shown himself to be a skilful biographer in his life of Dean Liddell, and his happy way of characterizing the chief deans of Christ Church—the two Fells, Aldrich, Cyril Jackson, Gaisford, and Liddell—is a pleasant feature of his book.

Turning from Christ Church to Worcester College, one cannot help feeling a certain lack of proportion [illegible] of College Histories which gives as many pages to colleges so very different in importance. The authors, Mr. C. H. Durell and Mr. W. R. Barker are right in filling [illegible] with an account of all the institutions which have occupied the buildings, beginning with Gloucester College for Benedictine monks, originally from St. Peter's, Gloucester, going on to the establishment of Gloucester-hall after the dissolution of the monasteries; and ending with Worcester College, as it has been called since the beginning of the last century, on account of the benefactions of Sir Thomas Cookes, a Worcestershire baronet. Nevertheless, they have found it impossible to restore life to the histories of forgotten men, for there is not one really distinguished name in the whole list of the Priors of Gloucester College, the Principals of Gloucester Hall, and the Provosts of Worcester College. The space, too, which they gave to the attempt of Dr. Woodroffe to found a college for uniting the Greek with the Anglican Church towards the close of the seventeenth century does not add to the general interest of the book. Although there is little of historic interest about the [illegible], there is some about the buildings in which they lived. The different Benedictine monasteries, which sent their members to the original Gloucester College, built their own cloisters (camerae), several of which still remain. It is all the more unfortunate that the assignment of individual chambers to the monasteries is full of difficulty, that the authors do not agree with Rev. T. W. Jackson, Fellow of the College, and that after all their researches the only identification which is absolutely exact is that of Staircase No. 8, on the south side, with Pershore. About the monastic buildings generally the authors have taken a good deal of trouble. But we must point out that they attempt an impossible correction of the position assigned to the Chapel in Loggan's Oxonia Illustrata. They suggest that what Loggan in his picture represents as the refectorium was really the Chapel. But the building in question could not have been the Chapel, because its direction is not eastward but northward, and it had a louvre in the roof to let out the smoke from the central fire-place in the hall.

A third contribution to this series of College Histories is by the Rev. Douglas Macleane, who writes of PEMBROKE COLLEGE, OXFORD. He has not such a good subject as some of the other contributors. Pembroke has not had very many distinguished alumni, but in recent times Professor Bartholomew Price brought distinction to it as Master and the late G. W. Steevens was a Fellow. One notes, however, that Mr. Macleane has brought out some new facts about Dr. Johnson. He has proved that the lexicographer did not pay his batells until more than ten years after he went down; and he has also established that there is no truth in the legend that he kicked Whitefield, the Methodist, round the quad. There is, moreover, a fine piece of pessimistic irony in the author's picture of the Oxford of to-day:—

> Oxford is no longer Matthew Arnold's serene city and adorable dreamer, but extremely wide awake, out of sympathy with "lost" or any other causes, with loyalties possible or impossible, and bustlingly anxious to be abreast of the times. What England thinks to-day Oxford will think to-morrow. The ideals, medieval or Liberal, which made the beginning of the Queen's reign so interesting, are flat and forgotten—in part, realized and stale, in part, exploded and dead. No illusions remain, nor any expectations. Everything is reformed. Everybody is perfect. And the great orb of the nineteenth century sinks comfortably below the horizon in a shapeless bank of grey cloud, shot here and there with angry streaks of red.

At a time when the histories of all schools and colleges are being written, the history of Sandhurst ought certainly to be written with the rest, and ANNALS OF SANDHURST, by Major A. F. Mockler-Ferryman (Heinemann, 10s. n.), fills a gap. The greater part of the book is taken up with records of Sandhurst cricket, football, and athletic sports, and with the official regulations telling young men how they can get into Sandhurst and how they will be expected to behave when they have got there. There are some good stories, however, of the Sandhurst rows that were so numerous in the good old days; and the following story seems worth quoting:—

> Almost the last occasion on which the manager of the theatre complained of the behaviour of the cadets was when Gilbert and Sullivan's Iolanthe was being performed, and the offenders were some dozen G.C.'s, all belonging to B Company. The Assistant-Commandant investigated the case prior to the prisoner being brought before the governor for severer forms of punishment, and, picking out the man most likely to have been the ringleader, he said, "Now, Mr.—— , I suppose you were at the bottom of it; what was it?"
> "Well, sir," was the reply, "it was all the sentry. He was a perfect disgrace. We put him through the manual exercise by numbers, and into the special squad, and that was all right; but when he said that his name was Williams, and that he belonged to B Company, why, we took him off the stage, we simply couldn't help it."
> No defence could have been of more avail; in the eyes of the Assistant-Commander the offence was almost pardonable, and even the ringleader got no more than three weeks' restriction.

Mr. A. F. Leach is the editor and in part the author of BRADFIELD COLLEGE (Froude, 10s. 6d. n.). It is a short history, as the college was only founded in 1850, and in parts it is rather a sordid story of financial squabbles, the masters on several occasions having had great trouble in getting their salaries paid. The school has not yet had many notable alumni though Colonel Kitchener was educated there. The most interesting chapters are those which relate the history of the Greek Play performances. In the first performance, which took place in 1880, the cast was very distinguished, Mr. F. R. Benson being the manager and the actors including Mr. G. B. C. Lawrence, Mr. W. L. Courtney, and the Headmaster himself.

We have received Vol. XII. of the topical section of the GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE LIBRARY (Elliot Stock, 7s. 6d.). It reprints matters of topographical interest dealing with the counties of Surrey and Sussex, informing us, for example, that "at Ashstead Charles II. visited Sir Robert Howard, the dramatic poet"; that "at Barnes, Tonson, the bookseller, and secretary to the Kit-Kat Club, had a house"; that "at Chertsey, on St. Anne's Hill, resided the celebrated Charles James Fox"; and that "Reigate suffered by the plague in 1665." The account of Brighton in 1736 is perhaps the most interesting to quote:—

> Brighthelmstone, in the county of Sussex, is distant from London 57 miles, is a small, ill-built town, situate on the sea coast, at present greatly resorted to in the summer time by persons labouring under various disorders for the benefit of bathing and drinking sea water, and by the gay and polite on account of the company which frequent it at that season. Until within a few years it was no better than a mere fishing town, inhabited by fishermen and sailors, but through the recommendation of Dr. Russel and by the means of his writings in favour of sea water it is become one of the principal places in the kingdom for the resort of the idle and dissipated as well as of the diseased and infirm.

To the average well-informed person Silvertown merely suggests gutta-percha. The neighbourhood, however, has a history going back to the time of the Romans, who reclaimed the marshes, and a tower in which Anne Boleyn once lived. These matters, together with other matters, are duly related in SILVERTOWN AND NEIGHBOURHOOD (Burleigh, 1s.), by Arthur Philip Crouch.

The volume on SCOTTISH MARKET CROSSES, by Mr. John W. Small, F.S.A., Scot. (Stirling, Aeneas Mackay), is a most interesting work of its kind, and will be warmly welcomed by antiquarians and others. Details are given of a large number of crosses, and there are over a hundred drawings of market crosses in position. Mr. Alexander Hutcheson, F.S.A., Scot., supplies an introduction, which is all too short.

NUMMITS AND T'RUMMITS, by Sarah Hewett (Burleigh), is a miscellaneous bundle of Devonshire songs, stories, and superstitions jotted down at random. It is not exactly a book for the folk-lorist, and the authorities quoted for some of the songs are a little odd. Thus for "Lord Lovel" we have "Sung by Mr. Ted Ward at a harvest supper, September, 1893," and for "Barbara Allen" "Sung by John Snow, of Tiverton, at a supper party, A.D. 1869." We wonder whether Mr. Ted Ward's date was B.C. or A.D.? We should like, by-the-by, to have found "Tom Pearce's Grey Mare" among these Devonshire idylls.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Westminster Biographies.

Biography, as a department of literature, seems to be passing through a phase illustrated by the first volume of "the Westminster Biographies," Mr. Arthur Waugh's ROBERT BROWNING (Kegan Paul, 2s. n.)—which, it may be hoped, will result in a clearer perception of its proper aims and its necessary limitations. It is a subject which has great attractions for a large class of readers, and for years they have grumbled at but endured the unnecessary and voluminous chronicles of the lives of second-rate worthies. The "Dictionary of National Biography" may be said to some extent to have codified the laws of biography, and to have shown that, in the vast number of cases, an accurate, careful, and exhaustive record of facts may fulfil every requirement that the most exacting student could demand. And, what is more, it has proved that a compact and unvarnished story if written with sense and intelligence is not less but sometimes more interesting than diffuse pages of trivialities or of extravagant eulogy. There are instances of course in which special interest, literary or historical, attaches to the publication of a man's private diaries and correspondence. But these are few and they have generally been overdone. Not the least evil of the disproportionate length claimed for the lives of those who really deserve not to be forgotten is that they are not read, and injustice is therefore done to their memory. The "Dictionary of National Biography" is available only for a limited class; books which are intended to kindle and sustain an interest in the lives of the great men of our own time often fail, either from their size, their expense, or the style in which they are compiled to achieve their purpose. Hence the brief inexpensive biography, in a handy form, the idea of which, we think, was first conceived in America. We are very glad that Messrs. Kegan Paul have adopted it, and are prepared to test its success with the English public. The one essential to success is that the author of such a biography should not only be a competent critic but an attractive writer, and Mr. Arthur Waugh here proves himself to be both. The combination is by no means common. How often have we to regret that our most admired critics have not learnt the one thing which their studies should have taught them—style! Mr. Waugh's English is not crabbed or laboured: it is not "smart," or irritatingly allusive; it is not self-conscious and superior. The good taste of the style and treatment is what has struck us most in reading this book. The intricacies revealed in the Browning Letters are glanced at with sympathy but with restraint. The real merits of Browning as a man are shown at their right value. Browning as a man and not as a writer is, of course, the main subject of the volume, and we need not discuss closely Mr. Waugh's estimate, which is certainly not indiscriminate in its eulogy, of Browning's poetry. We should have liked a rather fuller bibliography, and in particular the Browning Primer of Mrs. Clement Parsons (Miss F. M. Wilson), which has, we believe, established itself as a University Extension text-book, should not have been omitted.

THE GARDEN AT HUNTERCOMBE.

From "Seven Gardens and a Palace" (Lane).

In the Garden.

"A Garden! The word is in itself a picture, and what pictures it reveals! All through the days of childhood the garden is our fairy-ground of sweet enchantment and innocent wonder. From the first dawn of thought, when we learned our simple lessons of Eden and its loss, and seemed to see the thornless garden, watered with clear streams, beautiful with spreading trees, and the train of unnamed beasts and birds meekly passing before their spotless lord; and then beyond, far onward to that other garden beloved by the Man of Sorrows, Gethsemane, where we could never picture the blossoming of roses or murmurous hum of summer bees, but only the sombre garden walks, and One kneeling among the olives, and dark, heavy drops upon the grass. And [illegible] this, the garden of the Sepulchre—[illegible] haunted. These were our Gardens of the Soul. In later years the mists of those older, holier spots wear away to wreaths in the vivid brilliance of the Gardens of Fancy. . . . . They are all beautiful, these Gardens of Poesy. And through the midst of them flows the [illegible] of Memory, piled with fair lilied [illegible], fringed with [illegible] forests and whispering reeds. And not less beautiful than these ideal shades are the gardens which live unchanged and unchanging in many a painted picture within the heart. Real, and not less ideal, is the [illegible] of gardens we have seen: seen once, it may be, and never since forgotten.

> "Un souvenir heureux est parfois sur terre > Plus vrai que le bonheur."

The quotation is from the "Proem" to SEVEN GARDENS AND A PALACE (Lane, 5s. n.), by "E.V.B.," a writer who does little to veil her identity with the mistress of Hunter[illegible] Manor. The Proem appeared first in Mr. A. F. Sc[illegible] "In Praise of Gardens." The other pages which Mrs. Boyle here gives us are reprinted from various periodicals, and are worth collecting for the pleasure of those who love the atmosphere of old gardens and old houses. The Seven Gardens lie in England and in Scotland, and include Drayton, the magnificent creation of Lord Grosvenor's, and Hunter[illegible], the old manor, with literary memories of Addison and of Miss Jane Porter, the [illegible] of "Thaddeus of Warsaw" and "The Scottish Chiefs." Warter Herald, and with many valuable suggestions which have not been neglected in the replanting of the gardens by the present owners. The Palace, to which the last chapter is devoted, is Hampton Court, where Mrs. Boyle's grandfather lived to the age of ninety two. As we read the really beautiful description of Maryculter, by the Scotch Dee, our critical conscience bids us remind Mrs. Boyle that the bird which darts up the river and gambols on its stones is not the "ring ouzel or dipper," for these are very different birds, both in form and habitat. But it is a pleasant volume, which we are glad to possess, and reminds us of the old romance of gardening, at a time when so much is written about its technical and practical side. The illustrations, though one or two are a little blurred and confused, are well conceived and harmonize with the spirit of the book.

THE BOOK OF GARDENING (Putnam, 10s. n.) is ambitious in its aims, and comprehensive in its treatment. It assumed Gardening for its province, and aims at providing gardeners with all the information they require. In its compilation, the editor has wisely adopted the principle of division of labour, entrusting each portion of the wide field it covers to a writer who has made a special study of that department. The results are quite satisfactory on the whole, and special mention may be made of the chapters on Florists' Flowers, Trees and Shrubs, Orchids, and Aquatic Plants. But, as is almost inevitable, the book is incomplete in some directions, and redundant in others. For example, Chrysanthemums are enthusiastically taken in hand, and some hundreds of the florists' varieties are described, while the lovers of Lilies and Daffodils will search in vain for assistance in the cultivation of their favourite flowers. And though there are a few hints for the building of a Conservatory, scarcely any help is given to those wishing to build Peach-houses or Vineries. There are a great number of excellent illustrations, and in a future edition it will be well worth while to make the Index really representative of the body of the work.

Tchaikovsky.

In TCHAIKOVSKY: HIS LIFE AND WORKS (Grant Richards, 6s.), Mrs. Newmarch offers to the general public a collection of articles already known to the specifically musical public, through the medium of the musical papers, together with some other matter. The whole makes an extremely interesting book. Tchaikovsky was one of the pioneers of music in Russia, one of the first professional musicians in his country. The Russians used to content themselves in the towns with Italian and German music; and in the villages with the untutored performances of the peasantry. In this century arose a race of serious amateurs—soldiers, chemists, doctors, and chinovniks—who devoted their leisure to composition. And last of all came the Rubinsteins and Tchaikovskys, who held that Mistress Music, like Mistress Common Law in the proverbial philosophy of the Temple, "must lie alone." The outward events of a musician's life are unexciting—he struggles, hopes, gives lessons, goes on a continental tour, and dies peacefully. A Boswell would find a musician a sorry prey; his thoughts are his own, unspeakable except in his works. Rival composers do not quarrel wittily over supper tables; they do not argue their differences of opinion to a tangible minimum; they shake hands politely and part. Brahms, "aware that I did not belong to his camp, made no effort to become intimate." "Brahms confided to Tchaikovsky with quiet sincerity that he did not like his symphony at all. Tchaikovsky was encouraged to speak out with the same uncompromising sincerity his own convictions about the work of the great German master." As Tchaikovsky tells us elsewhere—in spite of all efforts, "I never could and never can admire Brahms' music." The candour of Tchaikovsky's criticisms of all the great and respected composers is refreshing in contrast to the timorous insincerity of our everyday critics, who are ready to admire the most pitiful efforts of famous musicians. Bach's choral works he pronounces "great classical bores"; Handel he found "intolerable"; Wagner he regarded as something between a quack and a Quixote; he would allow Schubert and Chopin no more than an "inventive faculty," unsupported by "imagination," and with all his reverence for Beethoven "he sometimes resented the general tendency to an indiscriminate Beethoven worship." The foreign tour, usually one of the dullest episodes in a great musician's life, is made gay by the vagaries of a certain Herr N., a mysterious amateur impresario, half man, half sprite, appearing suddenly from the void, and leading his victim to confusion.

> "I cannot," says Tchaikovsky, "form any just opinion upon this singular man, who remains altogether an enigma to me. I am equally puzzled as to his nationality—he called himself Russian, but spoke the language atrociously—his position in the world, and more especially as to the motive which guided his conduct towards me, now persecuting me with hostile proceedings, now rendering me the most valuable service. In any case, I must acknowledge that it was entirely due to his initiative that I owed my invitations to Leipzig, Prague, and Copenhagen. . . . The concert at Dresden never came off, in consequence of Herr N.'s strange and unpractical management. Nor was it my luck to make the Viennese acquainted with my music, because the day fixed for the concert in Vienna was identical with the date on which I had to be in Paris."

Combatant Politics.

AN INTRODUCTION TO ENGLISH POLITICS, by John M. Robertson (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d.), is pervaded by a spirit which is not so much critical as combative. The writer neatly defines politics as the strife of wills, sympathies, and interests for adjustment in the sphere of legislation and government. Travelling rapidly over the course of history he sketches the general results of this changeful process in Greece, Rome, Italy, Holland, Switzerland, and Portugal, by way of introduction to the story of English political struggles, which he intends to embody in a series of biographical studies dealing with eminent English statesmen. The book shows wide and diligent reading, and is, on the whole, interesting and suggestive. It is by no means free from faults, and those of more than one kind. Too often Mr. Robertson, obedient to the militant instinct which is in him, goes out of his way to criticize authorities with whom he does not agree, the result, of course, being that he mars the effect of his own argument. His attack on Oxford strikes us as singularly injudicious. He is horrified at learning that in a certain Oxford college young men have been advised to read Mr. Kidd's "Social Evolution" and Mr. Mallock's "Social Progress" as a preparation for writing essays on the question "What support does Socialism receive from the Doctrine of Evolution?" One of these books, he considers, is a mere plea for customary irrationalism in religion, the other for commercialist conservatism in politics, and both, he adds, are "paralogisms at that." Mr. Robertson ought to know that a book can no more be a paralogism than it can be a syllogism. "In no Continental or American University probably could two such books be so founded on." Probably not. For all that we do not anticipate a rush to Continental and American Universities, in preference to Balliol, as a result of this alarming disclosure. Such methods, Mr. Robertson gravely adds, "go some little way to explain the singular judgments on modern politics disclosed to us in some of the collected letters of the late Professor Jowett, so perspicacious a mind in the field of his special scholarship." Yet Balliol in Jowett's time sent forth into the world a fair number of men who have attained more or less eminence in political life. One source of the strength of Oxford is that it knows how to teach by indirect methods as well as by direct ones. We are not concerned to defend either the "perspicacity" of Jowett's political judgments and forecasts, contained in his private correspondence, or the wisdom of those who are responsible for giving them to the world. But we must say that we prefer our recollections of his lectures on Thucydides to the wretchedly inadequate pages in which Mr. Robertson purports to sum up and account for the "culture-progress" of ancient Greece.

Surgeon-General Sir Joseph Fayrer's RECOLLECTIONS OF MY LIFE (Blackwood, 21s.) is too long, and less interesting than one would have expected. The autobiographer has no sense of proportion, and has not learnt to eliminate the unessential. Moreover, many of the subjects which he treats at great length—the Prince of Wales' visit to India, for instance—have already been treated at sufficient length in other books. His diary of the defence of Lucknow, however, has the interest which belongs to all personal reminiscences of that memorable feat of arms, though it is written with as little emotion as though it were an official report on hospital management. We assume that Sir Joseph Fayrer's recollections of India are more accurate than his recollections of his tours in Switzerland. In an account of one of these he speaks of the Gorner Grat as "penetrating into the very heart of Monte Rosa," whereas a glance at a map would have shown him that it does nothing of the kind.

A SPORTSWOMAN IN INDIA, by Isabella Savory (Hutchinson, 16s.), is an account of the adventures of a lady who went in for pig-sticking, bear hunting, and tiger shooting with some success. There is a certain amount of mountaineering in the book, and there are also some very fine stories about snakes, elephants, and crocodiles, more particularly the story of a subaltern who for a wager jumped on a crocodile's back and made it take him for a ride, forcing it to go quickly by prodding it in the neck with a carving fork. Still more interesting is the report which Mrs. Savory gives of the life of women in India. She shows us that the Mem Sahib of the nineteenth century is not a languid lady lying on a sofa, but an "energetic tennis, Badminton, calling and riding, sometimes sporting, creation." Among the views of life entertained by the natives of India the following is very characteristic :—

> Natives are exceedingly practical. A sahib accidentally shot a boy one day when he was out in the jungle. The next morning he received a deputation from the man's relatives, who handed him a written document in the form of a valuation of the deceased's life, soliciting payment for the same, to which was appended a receipt for the amount demanded. It ran in this form :—
> To Captain F.
> To one bloody murder committed. Five rupees.
> Contents received on the day of 18 .

Mrs. Savory makes a curious mistake in confusing Mr. Rudyard Kipling with his father, Mr. Lockwood Kipling, and crediting the novelist with the designing of the Lahore Law Courts—"great, airy, massive buildings."

Conversations with Prince Bismarck (Harper, 6s.) is a selection made by Mr. Sidney Whitman from Herr Heinrich von Poschinger's vast collection of Press cuttings relating to the great German Chancellor. In virtue of his position as Privy Councillor in the Reichsamt des Innern, with free access to Prussian official records, Herr von Poschinger was presumably better qualified than most people to distinguish "fake" from authentic record. He gives, as it were, the seal of authoritative sanction to such statements as that "good mutton and brisket of beef were amongst the favourite dishes of the Prince's table," that he was "very fond of hard boiled eggs," and was once "able to eat eleven at one time," and that Count Moltke was "not only a great general but also a talented inventor of new drinks." A great portion of the book is taken up with the Chancellor's sayings and doings during the Franco-German War, though there is nothing to quote, as there is nothing that was not already pretty well known. Nor are many of the anecdotes new—though it will be a convenience to those who crave for crumbs of Bismarckian table talk to find so many of them collected between the covers of a single volume.

The Dual Land (Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d.) is a collection of poems bearing on death and the future state, compiled for "the consolation of the mourner." The verses are drawn from an immense variety of sources. Its success will depend, of course, rather on the mood and temperament of the reader than on his literary taste, so that one need not perhaps regard so well-meaning and industrious a work in too critical a spirit. But surely that gem of religious aspiration, Tennyson's "Eve of St. Agnes," might have found a place.

The Reclamation of Land from Tidal Waters, by Alexander Beazeley (Crosby Lockwood, 10s. 6d. n.), is a handbook for engineers, landed proprietors, and others interested in such works. To a certain extent it is founded on the work of the late Mr. John Wiggins, now out of print, but it is thoroughly well brought into line with present knowledge and practice, there are plenty of diagrams, and there is a chapter on the legal aspects of reclamation.

The address delivered by Mr. Charles Dudley Warner as President of the American Social Science Association last May has been published under the title The Education of the Negro, and forms a remarkable indictment of the accepted system of imposing the "higher education" on the negro. Mr. Warner, a highly competent observer, is of opinion that the system has given the negro a veneer of intellectual training for which he is not prepared, instead of teaching him the thrift and industry and steadiness of character of which he is really in need.

FICTION.

For the War.

The profits on the sale of The Ladysmith Treasury (Sands, 6s.), edited by J. Evelyn Nash, will be devoted to relieving sufferers in the town. The book is a collection of short stories by various authors, arranged alphabetically, from "F. Anstey" to "Zack," and including Messrs. Edgar Fawcett, Francis Gribble, Frankfort Moore, W. E. Norris, Morley Roberts, and Percy White. It has not often happened that so many different styles of workmanship have been brought together between the covers of a single book, and the volume will probably be sought after by collectors in the time to come. In the meanwhile any one who wishes to contribute his mite to a good cause may buy a copy with confidence that he will get good value for his money. All the contributors have supplied their best work, and we will not draw invidious distinctions, or suggest that any one of them has done better than any other.

African Nights.

Morocco and the West Coast alternately supply the local colour for Mr. A. J. Dawson's African Nights' Entertainments (Heinemann, 6s.)—a collection of short stories of more than average merit. They are evidently the work of a man who knows his subject, and they are written always with literary skill, and sometimes with true dramatic power. The adventure seems real in them. We make the acquaintance of strange types and are persuaded that they exist. Yet habent sua fata libelli, and we shall watch the fate of this book with interest, to see whether or not it will support its publisher's [illegible] view, proclaimed in our columns, that the success of a work of fiction in no way depends upon the fashion. It deserves more success than most books, and it may get it despite the fact that the fashion is against short stories, and that North African local colour has not yet "caught on."

A "Feuilleton."

Should She Have Spoken? by Esther Miller (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is a story which we fancy has already served to whet the appetites of the readers of a morning paper. Doubtless they would go on buying that paper until they found out who had really murdered Julian Cromwell's supposed first wife at the Rhone Glacier Hotel. Even if they divined who it was, as it is not difficult to do, there still remained the question why he murdered her, and the unravelling of the [illegible] with a skill of which nothing is wasted in the delineation of character. We are not quite clear who ought to [illegible] to have spoken. If Bertha, whom Julian had married just before the murder, had not spoken as she did at his trial, Miss Esther Miller would have had no story to tell; and on the supposition that the question in the title refers to Bertha, we think well enough of the story to affirm that she certainly should have spoken.

A Religious Novel.

It is no new thing to write a novel dealing with religion, but to carry out the intention with so complete and manful an air as does Mr. John Strange in The Quest of Mr. East (Constable, 6s.) is at least unusual. The problem which absorbed the interest of Mr. Edward St. John, the earnest hero, "was the religious history of our Western world, the solution of which might lead to the practical endeavour towards the restoration of the spiritual unity of that world." With such a problem before him St. John attempts the quest of Mr. East who may aid his spiritual adventures. Mary oneself is concerned. It is "about it, and about it all the time." But the author of "The Quest of Mr. East" writes well, and is only just a little too insistent on the "teaching" he wishes to convey.

A Story of an Estancia (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.), by George Crampton, is a Montagu and Capulet story, with much talk about sheep and cattle farming, the scene being laid in the Argentine Republic. Mr. Crampton evidently knows a little more about sheep-farming than about the construction of a novel. The book is indifferently written, and it is hardly worth speaking about the plot or the characters; but the sheep-farming part is instructive.

Correspondence.

THE ALLEGED DECAY OF FABLE WRITING.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Story will not think me unappreciative of his graceful article in your issue of July 7 if I disagree with him where he says "the fable . . . seems nowadays to be quite despised."

This kind of moral Euclid does not readily pan out—to use a vulgar phrase—to book-form, and I have in my mind's eye a book of modern fables, by a living writer, the figure of which is so slim that it might easily escape notice if sandwiched between good editions of Æsop and La Fontaine.

The author to whom I refer shall not be named in this place lest I stand accused of log-rolling, but I will cite two examples of his work:—

Oblivion.

"We write beautiful things that men may forget them," quoth a poet.

"Yet who keeps count of all the roses?" quoth another.

And again:—

Defect.

A wise man looked at the world and laughed.

And an altruist offered him reproof, saying "There is occasion for tears, one would think!"

"Tears of blood are not to be compassed by all of us," answered the wise man.

It will be obvious that I like my key to be D major, as Beethoven would have said, and to some a lighter manner were preferable. Suffice it to say that my fabulist has an intellectual jocosity of style quite his own, but I surrender to the pleasure of quoting my pet pieces.

Faithfully yours,

W. H. CHESSON.

GRAMMAR v. IDIOM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—To my mind the phrase on which I challenged Mr. Rouse simply means "it is not good to have too many Cæsars." The distinction between this sentence and "too many Cæsars are not good" is a distinction without a difference. If Mr. Rouse's general contention be sound, I cannot understand how an author of such high repute as Sir Thomas More could have written "gold and silver are no part of ourselves." But if I can support myself by a quotation from More, I can also support Mr. Rouse—"Yet thereof is no words made at all"; for these old authors lack one quality needful to make them good witnesses on his behalf—the quality, namely, of consistency. They do not prefer ungrammatical to grammatical forms, but use both indiscriminately. I heartily agree with Mr. Rouse in regretting that many of the words they employed have dropped out of use; but I cannot admit that a true feeling for the meaning of words displays itself in their ungrammatical arrangement. In condemning modern prose, Mr. Rouse generalizes on a single particular quoted from a newspaper. I could have given him a dozen such slip-shod newspaper phrases; with which, however, I think he would have failed to prove that authors like Arnold, Ruskin, Mill, and many more I could mention were unable to write their own language with clearness and vigour. In the matter of poetry, his allusion to Herrick's "Cheat of Cupid" strikes me as peculiarly unhappy. If Mr. Rouse's critic called attention to the bad rhyme while doing justice to the general excellence of the poet his position would be perfectly reasonable; but to deny the poet's merit because of the false rhyme would be as unreasonable as to assert that it was due to the false rhyme. In fact, the critic would, in this case, be in much the same position as Mr. Rouse himself. Mr. Rouse says that modern verse is "polished up to the extreme," that "false sentiment or triviality may pass, but an inexact rhyme never." The "Lamentations" in which "memory" is made to rhyme with "infancy" passes very well; so does "In Memoriam" in spite of "curse" and "horse"; while, for rugged metre, I will pit Browning against any old poet. I think, on the other hand, there would be some difficulty in finding, within the whole range of English poetry, more polished verse than is to be found in, let us say, Ben Jonson's "Hymn to Diana," or the song which is sung to the poisoned Emperor in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Valentinian." Polish and ruggedness, good rhymes and bad, false sentiment and true, are incident to every age: and in dividing our own age from a former one, Mr. Rouse, treating of poetry, has used, for his differentia, properties which are common to both. Again, when he reasons from the proposition that I am ready to sacrifice vigour of thought and expression to mere correctness, I can only say, in reply, that if he will grant to me this same privilege of assuming false premisses from which to deduce conclusions suitable for my own argument I will undertake to prove anything.

I yield to no one in my admiration for our old English classics. At the same time, I still fail to see that great writers (whether old or modern) are great because of their faults rather than in spite of them, even as I fail to see that the force of Mr. Rouse's reasoning is enhanced by the fact of its being logically unsound.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM CAIRNS.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

It scarcely looks as if the experiment of sixpenny books was unsuccessful. Seeing how long a time it took to bring the publishers down from 31s. 6d. to 6s., the unlooked-for descent to 6d. seemed too precipitate to be likely to be permanent. Yet the sixpenny edition increases and multiplies. Last week we had a sixpenny "School for Saints" (Unwin); this week we have a sixpenny "Aylwin" (Hurst and Blackett), and next week we are to have a sixpenny "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" (Harpers), while Mr. Heinemann is giving us Stephen Crane's "Red Badge of Courage." We now have in this form not only the uncopyright classic, not only the new and untried book, which might try cheapness as a means to success, but books both copyright and successful, of which the above afford excellent examples. Perhaps the most interesting thing is the rapidity with which the successful novel published at six shillings is being followed by the sixpenny reprint. Mr. Egerton Castle's "Young April" was only published last year, yet Messrs. Macmillan are about to include it in their sixpenny series. "Aylwin," in its new form, will contain a portrait of the author and some introductory remarks upon Sindi Lovell and other characters of the story. It will be interesting to see how the sixpenny public takes to Mr. Hardy; the publishers have limited the edition to 50,000 copies. It was Mr. Hardy's "Far From the Madding Crowd," it may be remembered, with which Messrs. Harper started their half-crown series last autumn. Experienced observers in the trade have argued that the modern "boom" is apt to lose in length what it has gained in breadth, and that a book which is a great success one season is dead beyond resurrection the next. Can this be the explanation of these disproportionately cheap editions of copyright books so recently in large demand? At all events, it was a happy thought to prepare the way for "Robert Orange" with so cheap a reprint of "The School for Saints," since some readers probably of the earlier book have memories that need refreshing. Messrs. White and Co. have joined the sixpenny publishers this season with a copyright series, which so far has gone well. Three of the books in the series are already out of print—"The Induna's Wife," by Bertram Mitford; "A Valuable Life," by Adeline Sergeant; and "The Bushranger's Sweetheart," by Hume Nisbet.

The list of twenty-five volumes which Messrs. Macmillan pledged themselves to bring out in their new Library of English

Classics is nearing completion, but we understand that the publishers have not yet decided whether they will extend the series or not. The volumes are so handsome and inexpensive, and the texts so complete and accurate, that it would be a pity to let the series drop. This month's volumes are "Mandeville's Travels" and White's "Selborne," the remaining works to be included in the library being Walton's "Lives" and "Complete Angler" in one volume; the De Quincey volume, and Lockhart's "Life of Scott," in five volumes. The text of Mandeville's is that of the Cotton manuscript, now for the first time printed in its entirety. The "illustrative narratives from Hakluyt," which are printed as a supplement, are those of Carpini, Rubruk, and Odoric. The new edition of "Selborne" is reprinted—it is believed for the first time—from the text of the first edition without diminution or "additional notes."

We are promised an English version of the Memoirs of Madame Louise Michel, the well-known French socialist, who, it is said, was converted from a crusade in England by the sight of our English workhouses and the homely efforts of the English poor law. This, it is true, did not satisfy the socialism of Dickens a generation back. But the novelist has to draw a different picture now of workhouse life, and Mr. Pett Ridge does it in the "Son of the State" which we reviewed on August 26, 1899, when it appeared in Messrs. Methuen's Sixpenny Novelist Series, and which is now, we notice, published by the same house at 3s. 6d. Stepniak, Prince Kropotkin, and Madame Louise Michel will help the historian of the future to write a difficult chapter of modern history, that of underground Europe, which has rarely emerged into public view, as it did at the time of the career of the Paris Commune. About that emergence Madame Louise Michel has much to tell at first hand.

Speaking at the Carlyle celebration in December, 1895, Mr. John Morley ventured to doubt whether any one now living had read the whole of "Frederick the Great." Some of his hearers, indeed, appeared astounded at this expression of scepticism, but the mass of the public who care anything about literature long ago came to the conclusion that the work is far too big. As originally issued it was contained in six large volumes (the first two of which appeared almost exactly forty-two years ago), and in cheaper form it has run into ten. Now it is being compressed into three, each costing half-a-crown, and it will be interesting to note whether the public will take more enthusiastically to it as a whole when it looks smaller and costs less. "Frederick" cost the author a multitude of troubles; and Mrs. Carlyle, in one of her moods of dejection, termed it "that tremendous book [which] made prolonged and entire devastation of any satisfactory semblance of home life or home happiness." But it was remarkably successful, pecuniarily and otherwise, and probably no greater compliment could have been paid to its accuracy than the fact that German military students were set to study Frederick's battles in the pages of Carlyle's work.

In the preface to his edition of the "Letters of Samuel Johnson" Dr. Birkbeck Hill spoke of the hope he entertained that he should live to complete the main work of his life as a scholar by a new edition of the "Lives of the Poets." He was turned away from his purpose for the time by a letter from Mr. Leslie Stephen asking him to edit all those writings which have been included under the general title of "Johnsoniana." The task proposed, Dr. Hill has told us, seemed pleasant in itself, and even if it had been irksome he would have hesitated much before he declined a request coming from a man to whom every student of our country was so deeply indebted. The accomplishment of the work Mr. Leslie Stephen suggested was delayed by ill-health, but accomplished it was, and Dr. Hill gave us his two volumes of "Johnsonian Miscellanies" three years ago. And now it is satisfactory to know that life and health have been granted to him to return to his original purpose, and that his edition of the "Lives of the Poets" which is to crown his life-work is well in progress.

Mr. George Moore's forthcoming "Sister Teresa" is not strictly a sequel to "Evelyn Innes," but chiefly the second half of that opus magnum as originally conceived. The book was cut thus into two halves by the publisher, who took fright at the five-hundredth page, and judged that that was enough all Mr. Moore at one mouthful. Perhaps the publisher was right. Even when George Sand was the mode, her readers found it difficult to follow Consuelo into her transformation as the Countess de Rudolstadt, and it is no disrespect to Mr. Moore's painstaking talent to say that his Consuelo is not extraordinarily more interesting than George Sand's. Evelyn Innes becomes not a Countess, nor even her unspeakable Herbert's "Lady," but Sister Teresa; and the second half of her career contains a study of convent life. Mr. Moore is no longer, it must be remembered, a realist, with the realist's methods of becoming curious about "human documents." He has been converted by his Celtic friends, and is now, as we have been told, a mystic, though not "a mystic," it will be understood in the etymological sense of that word, who shuts his mouth. But the veridical attitude of his convent picture is guaranteed by high testimony. When Mr. Moore has finished "Saint Teresa" he means to rewrite "Evelyn Innes." A pious wish may, perhaps, be expressed that the Baronet may be remodelled into some semblance of an English gentleman. The whole work may be ready by next spring, and will contain three hundred thousand words.

Mr. Heinemann is issuing a volume on the Afrikander Bond and its responsibility for the War. The author, Mr. F. W. Reitz, has lived in South Africa for many years. He tells us "The South African Conspiracy, or The Aims of Afrikanderdom."

"Climbing and Exploration in the Bolivian Andes" is the title and subject of Sir W. M. Conway's book for publication this autumn.

The book trade, notwithstanding the depression of the last six or eight months, is more active than it generally is at this season. War books continue to come and go; the Chinese crisis has put a little life into the trade; while the publication of what might be termed normal literature has by no means stopped. Within the next week or so Messrs. Methuen, who have virtually entered upon their new season, will have several volumes ready. One is Mr. Baring Gould's "Devonshire: A Descriptive and Historical Sketch," uniform with his books on Devon and Cornwall, both of which have been popular. Another is a new volume of stories by Mr. Henry James, bearing the enigmatic title of "The Soft Side." About the same time Methuen's series of Little Guides, which so far comprises Oxford, Cambridge, and Shakespeare's country, will receive an addition in a volume on Westminster Abbey by Miss Tomkinson, daughter of the late Canon Tomkinson.

Under the title of "The Early History of [illegible]," an interesting pamphlet of about twenty pages has been printed for private circulation. As a supplement to Mrs. Oliphant's volumes on the House of Blackwood it gives a rough sketch of the history of the ancestors of the publishers. The first known of the family goes back to a certain "Robert Blackwood, a native of Scotland," who had been a prisoner of war in England, and was discharged by the Lord Mayor of London in 1781.

"A Review of Irish History in Relation to the Social Development of Ireland," by John P. Gavan, will shortly be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The author's object is to explain historically some Irish difficulties. Irish outrages he considers are usually given "without regard to historical perspective, not to speak of historical charity." His contention is that, given the circumstances, the actual development of Irish society has been much what one might have expected.

Another book which Mr. Unwin will shortly issue is entitled "My Afterdream," by "Julian West," and is described as a sequel to the late Mr. Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward." "That the facts I communicated to Mr. Bellamy," writes the ingenious "Julian West" in his preface, "did not embrace the whole story must often have occurred to a large proportion of readers. . . . I was not content to take the world into my further confidence, and, since the hand of death has unhappily stricken down the Chronicler to whom I am indebted for celebrity, to continue this narrative myself."

Messrs. Macmillan, besides acquiring from Mr. Nimmo the rights in his illustrated Border edition of the Waverley Novels, have taken over from the same publishers the Lives of Michael Angelo Buonarotti and Benvenuto Cellini, both by the late John Addington Symonds.

Another book referring to the forthcoming Presidential Election in America is being published by Messrs. Harper and Brothers. It is called "Our Presidents and How We Make Them," and is by Colonel A. K. McClure. It contains an illustrated history of the quadrennial struggle for the American throne from the day of George Washington, in 1789, down to the McKinley-Bryan contest in 1896.

The Putnams announce that the first two volumes of their new Top Round Series will appear in the autumn, a series which is to include sketches of the careers of "prominent men and women who have achieved more than ordinary fame in the various walks of life." "Twelve Great Actors" and "Twelve Great Actresses," by Mr. Edward Robins, author of "Echoes of the Playhouse," will be the first two volumes.

There is to be published in the United States this autumn a further series of "Famous Homes of Great Britain"—"Raby," by the Duchess of Cleveland; "Gloddaeth," by Miss Constance Sutcliffe; "Glamis," by Lady Glamis; "Knole," by Lord Sackville; "Blickling," by Rev. A. H. Malan; "Rufford Abbey," by Lord Savile; "Compton Wynyates," by Miss Alice Dryden; and several others. A limited edition of the first series, which was published in the United States last year, will be brought out in London by Messrs. Putnam in the early autumn.

A volume by Mr. W. L. Manson treating of the bagpipe in its relations to Scottish and Highland life is at present in the press, and will be published by Mr. Alexander Gardner, of Paisley. Like a true Scot, Mr. Manson declines to accept the theory that the bagpipe was imported into Scotland from abroad. He holds that the instrument was evolved, from a rude state to its present condition, within the Highlands. The volume will contain traditions as to various pipe tunes, and is to be of a "popular" character.

The firm of Bruckmann in Munich has published a very useful little work on the different methods of art reproduction; the house holds one of the first positions in the whole world for the excellence of its illustrated work. The title of the publication is "Eine moderne Werkstätte für Buchgewerbe und graphische Reproduktion."

Prebendary Harry Jones is about to issue a volume of addresses on current topics entitled "The Tides of To-day." Mr. Elliot Stock will be the publisher.

FICTION.—A good list of new novels for the autumn has been prepared by Messrs. Macmillan. It includes "Richard Yea and Nay," by Maurice Hewlett; "In the Palace of the King," by F. Marion Crawford; "Modern Broods," by Charlotte M. Yonge; "In Bad Company," by Rolf Boldrewood; "Foes in Law," by Rhoda Broughton; "Rue with a Difference," by Rosa N. Carey; and new volumes by Winston Churchill and Egerton Castle.

Mr. William Dudley Foulke, the author of "Slav or Saxon," has abandoned economic questions for historical romance in a new book which the Putnams have in hand. It is a story of the mysterious ruins of Yucatan in Central America, the heroine, Princess Maya, being the last of the kingly line which built the now crumbling palaces. Another announcement in Messrs. Putnam's new list is to the effect that "Love Letters of a Musician," by Myrtle Reed (now in a third edition) is to be followed by a volume of "Later Love Letters," with musical quotations to suit the sentiment of the correspondence.

Mr. Paul Leicester Ford will be represented in the autumn by a new story entitled "Wanted, A Watchmaker."

Tolstoi is said to be engaged on a new book entitled "A New Kind of Slavery," dealing with the wretched lives of the railway employés.

A new sixpenny illustrated weekly, entirely devoted to the great business of Modern Travel and Touring for Health and Pleasure, is announced by George Newnes, Limited. It is to be called The Traveller with the sub-title "For Whom the World is a Playground."

Yet another Clerical Directory is to come into existence in the winter—viz., "The Church Directory and Almanack," to be published from 21, Berners-street, Oxford-street, W. Besides the customary lists it will contain a variety of information (including a series of homiletical hints), and will be published at 2s. net.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish elsewhere a bibliography of modern books bearing on China which are now available. The crisis bids fair to produce almost as many books as did the outbreak of war in South Africa. Messrs. Sampson Low, who have just issued their work on "European Settlements in the Far East" announce "China and the Present Crisis," by Mr. Joseph Walton, the Liberal member for South Leeds, who recently returned from an eight months' journey in the extreme East. Though there has never been anything to compare with the Peking massacre, history has been repeating itself with strange fidelity in the present crisis. This has induced Mr. Murray to announce a reissue of the late Lord Loch's "Personal Narrative of Occurrences during Lord Elgin's Second Embassy to China in 1860" (which has been long out of print), and the book will be ready before the end of the month.

Lord Loch (then Mr. Loch) was attached to the headquarters of the army engaged in China during the war in 1860, and shared with Mr. (afterwards Sir Harry) Parkes the perilous duty of negotiating the surrender of the Taku Forts to the combined French and British forces. During the subsequent march on Peking from Tien-tsin, Loch and Parkes, with a party of Sikhs and a few Europeans (including Mr. Bowlby, The Times correspondent), were treacherously captured by the Chinese and brutally maltreated in Peking. Loch and Parkes were the sole survivors, and in his book the former gives a vivid account of his experiences. Lord Wolseley (then Lieutenant-Colonel), who accompanied the expedition, also wrote a book about the war, which is now out of print, but we understand that there is no present intention of reissuing it.

A melancholy coincidence in connexion with the article is that the death of Mr. Bowlby in 1900 has been followed in the present case by the equally tragic fate of another correspondent of The Times, Dr. Morrison, the brilliant Australian journalist whose telegrams from Peking repeatedly arrived ahead of official information. The number of newspaper correspondents who have fallen at the post of duty within the last twelve months is probably unprecedented, but not since the death of Mr. [illegible] at Ladysmith has such a serious gap been made in the front rank of British journalists. Dr. Morrison's life was full of romance and adventure. He was something of a traveller even in his student days at Melbourne, and was barely of age when after voyages to the South Sea Islands and New Guinea, he undertook his famous journey, on foot and unarmed, across the Australian continent. Then he went again to New Guinea and narrowly escaped death from a spear wound in his side. After taking his M.B. at Edinburgh in 1887, he visited Jamaica, Spain, and Morocco (where he played the part of Court physician), returned to Australia, and allowed another wandering fit to take him overland across China to Burma. In Chinese dress and pigtail, but alone, unarmed, and knowing very little of the language. The sequels to this remarkable journey were his book "An Australian in China," and his first engagement as special correspondent of The Times.

Major Pond has, we understand, secured Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill to deliver a series of lectures this autumn in the United States. It is said that Major Pond proposes to get the American Winston Churchill to introduce the lecturer on his first appearance, which will probably be in New York.

* * * *

At a moment when half London is travelling [illegible] and the other half is wishing it could do so, there comes from Messrs. Newnes a new periodical called the Traveller. It seems, on a perusal of its contents, to be so obvious and necessary a publication that one wonders it has never been done before, though one must not forget that the indefatigable Dr. Lunn has already produced something of the kind under the title "Travel." The Traveller merits a warm welcome, even if in its first number there is just a suggestion of the gleefiel rail and steamboat circular. The photographs are reproduced in a manner worthy of the highest praise—there are among them many of those smudgy amateur snapshots by which articles of travel are too often illustrated—and other resorts besides the Alpine ones are dealt with.

* * * *

We trust, however, that the editor will see his way to expand his scheme. There are, at least, two ways in which he might do so. In the first place, he would [illegible] he would collect information and pictures about the far remaining districts of interest [illegible] experienced travellers are, as a rule, ignorant. The Caucasus, the Sierra Nevada, the Cantabrian Highlands are regions one would recommend to his attention. There is much that is new to be said about them, whereas there is little that is new to be said about Ober-Ammergau and Aix-les-Bains.

It would be good, too, in a publication of this kind, to find popular articles dealing with literary, artistic, and historical associations. There is an attempt in this direction in an article on Barbizon, but it is too short to be satisfactory. And there are many other "reminiscent" articles which cultivated travellers would be glad to read if they were properly written by those who know. The history of the English colony at Boulogne, for instance, should make good reading. The early ascents of the Gross Glockner would be worth writing up, as there is no full account of them in English. And one could suggest as other subjects the Republic of Andorra; a paper on the Tyrol with reference to the peasants' war; the Martin Luther country; the associations of Ferney, of Coppet, of Chambéry. On all these subjects there is much that is interesting to be said, and a magazine devoted to the entertainment of travellers seems the place in which to say it. But everything, of course, cannot be got into a first number, and the editor of the Traveller seems to have enterprise enough to rise to the occasion.

* * * *

Why is Mr. Augustine Birrell like Lord Macaulay? This is not a conundrum, but a question prompted by the description of Mr. Birrell by the headmaster of the Blackheath School for the Sons of Missionaries as "a modern Macaulay." Both, it is true, are or were members of Parliament, both have contributed to our literature, both are or were Liberals, and enthusiasm for Disestablishment is also a common possession. Most of these things are true also of Mr. Gladstone and of Mr. John Morley. Yet the headmaster of the Blackheath School for the Sons of Missionaries would hardly, one supposes, call either of these "a modern Macaulay." This comparison is surely inept. As well might Charles Lamb be bracketed with Gibbon, or any literary light-weight with any other literary heavy-weight. There might be excuse for pointing out some similarities between Lamb and Mr. Birrell. But between Macaulay, the complete exponent of machine-made English, and Mr. Birrell, with his genial whimsies and irresponsible somersaults, are not the differences too wide and deep to need emphasis? The headmaster was doubtless led away by the occasion. Mr. Birrell's "Obiter Dicta" was one of his prize volumes, and so, no doubt, was Macaulay's "Lays," perhaps the Essays, and as Macaulay's books and Mr. Birrell's looked much alike in red and gilt, with mottled edges, the headmaster was moved to his Gilbertian jest.

* * * *

Mr. Birrell's address to the boys was in his familiar happy vein. A good deal of it was not (if we may adopt the phraseology of the Latin grammar) so much "to or for the boys" as "to or for" their elders. But once or twice he "rang the bell" as he seldom fails to do. No doubt the boys greatly relished his allusion to the "sort of stout gentleman who used to come down to his school and give away the prizes. He could remember the contempt with which they listened to him, and how glad they were when he sat down." And both boys—who are not without an appreciation of irony—and elders probably enjoyed his obiter dictum that "for his part he had never yet met the boy, however clever, who could not learn something or other from his teacher." It demands an uncommon equipment to deliver a successful prize distribution address. If it chances to be one's own old school, the atmosphere of awe is a serious handicap. No Englishman is perfectly at his ease in the presence of his old headmaster. Mr. Birrell was not in this distressing situation, and he, therefore, spoke his mind with freedom; and one of his opinions, which is worth recording and with which we are rather inclined to agree, was that the reaction against examinations is in danger of going too far.

It is an old complaint of men of letters that a portion of the Civil List Pensions intended for their benefit is given to persons whose claims on the Royal beneficence by no means rest upon literary, scientific, or artistic services. This year they have not, perhaps, so much as usual to complain of; "other persons," in the shape of the widows of explorers, colonial governors, &c., only getting £201 out of the £1,200. We should, of course, be most reluctant to deny that the services of Sir Henry Barkly, Lieutenant-Colonel Ellis, and Captain John Biscoe merit this kind of recognition; but at the same time we are strongly of opinion that the Civil List is not the fund from which the recompenses for such services should be derived. The fund was not instituted for such purposes, and it ought not to be diverted to them on the strength of an oversight in the drafting of an Act of Parliament.

We are indebted to the Daily News for recalling a curious little item of Stevensonian history. It is apropos of the sale at Sotheby's of the MS. of a short story written by Stevenson for the Pall Mall Gazette fifteen years ago. Asked for a blood-curdling Christmas story he supplied "Markheim." This afterwards appeared elsewhere, but did not satisfy the flesh-creeping instincts of the Pall Mall Gazette. Stevenson then sent "The Bodysnatcher," a story which, he averred, would "freeze the heart of a Grenadier." It dealt with an episode of the Burke and Hare period, and was just the thing for a genial Christmas fire-side. The Pall Mall Gazette set to work to secure a good advertisement for the sensation of its Christmas number:—

> Six plaster skulls were made by a theatrical property man. Six pairs of coffin lids, painted dead black, with white skulls and crossbones in the centre for relief, were supplied by a carpenter. Six long white surplices were purchased from a funeral establishment. Six sandwichmen were hired at double rates. One quiet morning, when all was ready, they were duly attired. With some difficulty they made their way up to Piccadilly, along Regent-street, down Bond-street, everywhere attracting profound and universal interest. The one subject of conversation in the Clubs and the West-end was the mysterious and appalling phenomenon which had suddenly appeared in the metropolis. Amongst those who had been startled in Bond-street was the late Lord Londesborough, who took the usual course of shocked and angry Englishmen—he wrote to the newspapers. The next day every newspaper in the Kingdom had a description, vivid, scathing, denunciatory, according to the humour of the writer. But the objects of this wrath had already been paid off. Scotland Yard and the Law had stepped in. The "Pall Mall" phantoms were certainly the most remarkable advertisements that ever appeared on the London streets. We wonder what Stevenson himself thought about it all. "The Bodysnatcher" went like wildfire.

Stevenson, adds the Daily News, returned part of the honorarium sent him for the story because he thought it excessive. We doubt whether such a proceeding is, as our contemporary suggests, unheard of in the history of letters; but it is certainly exceptional.

In the reprint of "Lavengro" which Messrs. Ward, Lock have added to their Minerva Library Mr. Watts-Dunton gives some very interesting personal notes on Borrow. He raises the question whether Borrow was a "literary amateur," but does not answer it very definitely. His amateurishness shows itself, as it seems to us, now and then in his style in a certain sententiousness and artificiality. Surely it is an amateur who writes—to take an instance from the second chapter of "Lavengro"—"Spirit of old, what a skull was you!" But Mr. Watts-Dunton means that he was an amateur in the sense that he was a man first and a writer afterwards, and that therefore no one criticizes him adequately who did not know him personally. Perhaps Dr. Knapp has done something to equip the critic of the future who will not have had this advantage. Mr. Watts-Dunton gives a delightful account of his first meeting with Borrow. He also foresees a growing interest in "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye," to which the issue of reprints—for Mr. Murray has also just reissued "Lavengro," with other books of Borrow—seems to testify.

The more the features of our "Beautiful England," to use his own phrase, are changed by the multitudinous effects of the railway system, the more attraction will readers find in books which depict her before her beauty was marred—books which depict her in those antediluvian days when there was such a thing as space in the island—when in England there was a sense of distance, that sense without which there can be no romance—when the stage-coach was in its glory—when the only magician who could convey man and his belongings at any rate of speed beyond man's own walking rate was the horse—the beloved horse whose praises Borrow loved to sing, and whose ideal was reached in the mighty "Shales"—when the great high roads were alive, not merely with the bustle of business, but with real adventure for the traveller—days and scenes which Borrow better than any one else could paint. A time will come, I say, when not only books full of descriptive genius like "Lavengro," but even such comparatively tame descriptions of England as the "Gleanings in England and Wales" of the now forgotten East Midlander, Samuel Jackson Pratt, will be read with a new interest.

A committee has been formed in Paris to erect a monument to Arthur Rimbaud, whose strange career both as symbolist poet and explorer, the friend of Verlaine and of Menelek, has been told by M. Paterne Berrichon. The relations of Rimbaud with Verlaine have also been described recently with new details in the "Verlaine Intime" of M. Ch. Donos. Rimbaud was born in 1854 and died in 1891. M. Anatole France is on the committee which is to honour Rimbaud's memory. Times have changed since M. France, as critic of Le Temps, found no epithets too ironic in which to ridicule the utterances of the symbolists. Yet the famous "Sonnet of the Vowels" was the beginning of a school of poetic expression which, now that it has survived M. Anatole France's raillery, he perhaps thinks it generous to recognize. The reader of the following lines will perhaps be able to understand both these attitudes:

VOYELLES.

A noir, E blanc, I rouge, U vert, O bleu, voyelles,
Je dirai quelque jour vos naissances latentes.
A, noir corset velu des mouches éclatantes
Qui bombillent autour des puanteurs cruelles,

Golfe d'ombre; E, candeur des vapeurs et des tentes,
Lance des glaciers froids, rois blancs, frissons d'ombelles;
I, pourpres, sang craché, rire des lèvres belles
Dans la colère ou les ivresses pénitentes;

U, cycles, vibrements divins des mers virides,
Paix des pâtis semés d'animaux, paix des rides
Que l'alchimie imprime aux grands fronts studieux:

O, suprême Clairon plein de strideurs étranges, Silences traversés des Mondes et des Anges:
—O l'Oméga, rayon violet de Ses Yeux!

Our Paris Correspondent writes:

Professor Joseph Texte, of Lyons, whose name Literature has so often had occasion to mention, had obtained in England and Germany a reputation second to none as a student of comparative literature. His fine book "Jean-Jacques Rousseau et le Cosmopolitisme Littéraire," which Mr. Mathews translated into English, gave both his name and his method a vogue, and placed him immediately among the few critics who attempt a scientific system free from the prejudices of nationalism. M. Texte was to have been present this month in Paris at the Congress of Comparative Literature, and to take the lead in its proceedings. Indeed, it was chiefly to him that the original idea of this congress was due. But for a year now he had been gradually failing. On May 6 he was strong enough, however, to write to me as follows: "... Je suis tellement [illegible] de l'humanité depuis [illegible] d'écrire. Figurez-vous que depuis le 1er Janvier j'ai eu deux nouvelles et graves opérations chirurgicales, et je ne sais si j'en ai fini avec le bistouri! Je suis en ce pays, très loin encore d'être rétabli, et incapable d'aucun travail. Il me sera impossible d'aller à notre congrès dont je vous adresse le programme. J'aurais eu ..." M. Joseph Texte died at the very outset of his career. By his death critical studies have lost one of their most conscientious, exact, and talented devotees. Besides the famous book already quoted he had published "Etudes de Littérature Européenne," and numerous monographs, such as "Les Origines de l'Influence d'Alexandre dans la Littérature Française du XIX. Siècle," "Un Montaigne Anglais: La Vie et l'Œuvre de Sir Thomas Browne" (readers of Literature will recall his essay on Sir Thomas Browne in our columns on May 27 last year). Texte looked forward to the day when, in opposition to the narrow-minded nationalist philosophy of so many of his contemporaries, all Europe would have a clearer notion of the intellectual solidarity of the nations, "of the necessity," to use his own words, "for any nation which would obtain a hearing to remain in contact with the thought of all the great nations." In this sense his death is a loss to Europe.

The Shakespeare-loving Germans and Austrians are constantly holding up their hands in pitying amazement at the degeneration of our stage. Prof. Fischer, of Innsbruck, in a leading German periodical, declares that the condition of the modern English theatre is as bad as it can be, but slightly because of its intrinsic badness it is interesting and worthy of study. In all London theatres, we are told, the people in the auditorium are of more significance than the people behind the footlights. Nowhere are manager, dramatists and actors such slaves of the public as in London.

There are about twenty-five theatres, says Prof. Fischer, huddled in or near the Strand, and other theatres in the suburbs where the bourgeoisie witness the "drawing-room" successes of the town. But out of those fifty theatres only one is conserated to opera or to pure tragedy. It is true that opera enjoys an episodical existence in Covent Garden, but it is not an indigenous fruit of British culture, only an exotic importation, a luxury beyond the reach of any but the rich and extravagant, and recent Wagner in London does not imply that there is any real following of Wagner there, but means merely the belated manifestation of English respect for Wagner's conquest of the Continent. Opposed on the other hand, of The Belle of New York type, with its crudities of plot, vulgar absurdities, and light jingling music, agreeable to the native ear and heart, for the Englishman, essentially unmusical though he be, dearly loves music provided it has a tune in it. The mounting of these operettas is gorgeous, but misses in ensemble the chic of Paris and the Viennese individualizing of detail.

English melodrama is "Chauvinistic, brutal, and banal," while the salon-historical play with its pseudo-ideations seems to Fischer for contemptuous comment. That in London, the cradle of romantic tragedy, the happy hunting-ground of its youthful eccentricities, culminating in the masterpieces of Shakespeare, unadulterated Shakespeare should now be caviare to the public draws a cry of anguish from Prof. Fischer. "In no town in the world," he concludes, "are there more theatres than in London, and the public pays more for its theatres than for anything else, and yet aesthetic results are nil. The repertoire is varied. Scenic effects have reached the highest degree of technical perfection. The public loves the theatre, but nevertheless art cuts a beggarly figure on the English stage. A curious sort of decadence is rampant there. For all that it is more interesting for German contemplation than the French. Le Parisien fühlt sich der alten Europäer auch in Theater nur zu Hause, in London kommt er aus den Staunen nicht heraus."

The Novel with a Purpose.

We mentioned last week Mr. W. H. Mallock's article in the Anglo-Saxon Review on "The Limitations of Art." The title does not very accurately describe the real gist of the article. It is an attempt to arrive at some clear notion with regard to the "novel with a purpose," what it means, and how far it is legitimate. The view here put forward deserves careful consideration, because Mr. Mallock, though he is by no means always convincing, is, at any rate where literary subjects are concerned, one of the few critics who sincerely try to think a subject out, and to state their conclusions in a simple and lucid manner. He finds a curious contradiction emerging more and more definitely in the world of present day fiction. On the one hand the novel is growing daily in importance as a vehicle of serious thought. Yet in many quarters the novel with a purpose meets with the utmost obloquy as a form of art. Mr. Mallock discusses in detail one important and obvious qualification to the theory that there can be nothing in a true work of art but the presentation of artistic truth—viz., that in every literary creation the individuality, the tastes, and the moral judgments of the author inevitably find expression. Hence the presence of a purpose—even of that bugbear of the critic, a moral purpose—is to some extent a question of degree. But it is worth while considering whether Mr. Mallock could not go a good deal further than he does in admitting the novel with a purpose into the Temple of Art. He excludes from the inner sanctuary any work of fiction in which "men's lives appear in the light of a presupposed theory of life," or in which we have "the adventures of some theory that is in dispute illustrated by the lives of men which are manipulated for that special end." The writer of such a work of fiction "uses art for an end, and he achieves a result which is essentially not artistic." How about "The Pilgrim's Progress," or "Don Quixote"? Surely this critical and suspicious analysis of the end the artist has in view is a very fallible method of proceeding. We, rightly or wrongly, certainly estimate a work of art much more on a consideration of its style and treatment than of its object. A man's motives are always complex when he engages in any undertaking, and they do not become more simple when he undertakes to write a book. How many books are produced from a pure and single-hearted desire to produce a work of artistic truth and beauty? And if the conscious purpose is to raise and spiritualize the mind, even though that purpose run within the groove of a particular theory, does this necessarily poison the whole? It is often forgotten that the moral sense has its æsthetic side, a fact realized by some of our earlier English moralists whom nobody reads at the present day. Moral degradation displeases because it is ugly; self-sacrifice, on the other hand, provides us with a real æsthetic pleasure. This kind of moral sense is independent of any particular moral code, and must be taken account of in the eternal controversy as to the relation of art and morality. At any rate the whole history of religious art and poetry goes to show that purpose is not essentially destructive of art. The real test of artistic greatness is to be found in the expression of the individual mind—in the power, the tact, the sense of beauty, which shows itself in the way the subject is handled. The artist need not necessarily be devoid of opinions or even of the desire to promulgate them; if he is so, it makes him not a greater, but a lesser man. But whatever he writes, and for whatever purpose, he produces by the law of his being a work of art. The very sincerity of his purpose, the unconsciousness of the artistic quality of the work he is producing, may add immensely to its beauty. Among poets we see it in Milton, or on a lower plane in Keble, both of them true poets writing with a distinct and conscious aim. No one can have more definite an ulterior object than the orator or the pamphleteer, whether his method be the purely rhetorical, the pictorial, or the narrative, yet we do not deny him the art of eloquence. And it is possible that as the novel occupies more and more widely the field of thought we may be too severe in passing an unhesitating condemnation on any work of fiction in which some trace of a purpose is discoverable.

Personal Views.

IBSEN AS IDEALIST.

At a dinner given in celebration of his return to Norway, in 1892, the rare and dreaded emergency of a public speech extorted from Ibsen one of those pregnant bits of self-confession which the less formidable crises of ordinary conversation fail to extract from men of his resolute taciturnity. Previous speakers—warm-hearted old friends and enthusiastic young disciples—had celebrated the definitive triumph of his work, the European fame which had crowned his long up-hill struggle with antagonists and detractors at home and abroad—more particularly at home. The little square-built spectacled figure stood nervously grasping his chair as he uttered the incisive sentences:—"Every field of victory is strewn with corpses. On the field of my triumph lies the corpse of my happiness!"

However we may interpret these words (which I had from the lips of the friend at whose table they were spoken), their Ibsenian flavour is unmistakable. Triumph, in the world's sense, is always, with Ibsen, attended by something sinister and disastrous, some fulfilment of a tragic omen, or some omen to be tragically fulfilled. If there is any sound and well-omened exultation to be found in Ibsen, it is among the people whose success is, in the world's eyes, unmitigated disaster.

It is clear that this recurring burden of the Ibsenian drama—this ewige Gesang continually resounding through the troubled air—is due less to any definite teaching of experience than to a fundamental psychical bent, an inner core of asceticism and idealism, which has shaped all his thinking, and of which all that presents itself to him as experience has taken the hue. Ibsen has dealt so largely with ugly and sordid materials, with the sensual dross and the soulless débris of humanity, that such terms as idealism and asceticism, applied to him, will seem to many readers, even now, strangely out of place. But he is not the first in whom an iron grip upon actuality has gone along with a no less inflexible disparagement of it. It is the paradox of Ibsen's nature that, while impelled by his own fanatical criticism into a fierce estrangement from the phenomenal world, he has yet been held to it by bonds which grew only more rigid and despotic with years; so that while his criticism of society has remained as implacable as ever, his solutions and remedies have grown vaguer and more hesitating, and the famous "Third Kingdom" itself, in which the author of "Cæsar and Galilean" saw the future crown and culmination of Paganism and Christianity, has become a forlorn and discredited myth.

It is, of course, to the earlier plays, and, above all, to the early poems, that we have to turn if we would appreciate the idealism and the asceticism of Ibsen at their full value. One remembers the subtle significance which attaches, in this early verse, to the ideas of light and darkness. Helena Alving, in Ghosts, complains that the world, haunted by the phantoms of the past, is yet "afraid of the light," before which they would vanish. Twenty years earlier his charge against the mass of men was that they were "afraid of darkness." The two complaints, under different symbols, meant much the same thing—the aversion to the realm of ideal truth which the light of common day, the glamour of current conventions and easy self-content, obscures or obliterates. "When I was a boy," he tells us in the verses called "Afraid of the Light" (Lysrædd), "I shuddered when the sun went down behind the crags, and trembled all night before imaginary goblins." But with manhood there came a change:—

Now it is Noonday's goblins,
Now it is Life's unrest,
That dart the freezing horror
Into my beating breast.

I hide me under the cover
Of Darkness's sable train,
And my soul puts on her armour
Of eagle-boldness again.

Then, fearless of flames or of surges,
Like a falcon I cleave the sky,
Forgetting my anguish of terror—
Till the morrow's dawn I descry.

But when Night denies her mantle,
I drift on a rudderless bark;
If ever I win me glory,
'Twill be by a deed of the dark!

The "Darkness" whose raven plumes exercised so strong a spell upon Ibsen was obviously not that which appeals to the self-protective instincts of obscurants and ostriches. It was rather (to use another fine image of his own) the darkness of the mine, where the dazzling delusions of day are unknown, and precious ores are laid up, to be had only by the lonely toil of the delver's hammer. It was the darkness which shrouds the fearless explorer, seeking the answer to life's endless enigmas in the deep, "where alone is peace, peace and desolation from everlasting." From the standpoint of ordinary biography Ibsen cannot by any means be said to have led a lonely or friendless life; but no more lonely nature ever existed, nor one that drew richer inspiration from loneliness. The glory of friendship and of love begins for him when the faces of friend and lover are transfigured in the soul-light of memory. The glory of the hero begins when his last ally deserts him.

Had this romantic estrangement from society exhausted the possibilities of Ibsen's nature, he might have been remembered as a poignant lyric poet, but certainly not as a dramatist. He might have reminded us, more often than he does, of Shelley—a Norwegian Shelley, uttering a like passion for freedom with the hard and rigorous temper of the North. But Shelley's repudiation of the despotisms of society remained lyric—a radiant bubble of eloquent anger against kings and priests. Of the actual processes by which society exercised its despotic sway, he had but the most elementary idea. His animus never transformed itself into vision. Ibsen, on the other hand, has, almost from the first, showed an extraordinary insight into the facts which bore out his elementary hostilities. The vague platitudes which satisfy most of us about the contagion of the moral atmosphere, the constraining influence of environment, he translates into concrete living example delineated with the analytic precision of a medical illustrator. A whole world of facts, on the other hand, for which his elementary bias suggested no interpretation escape him altogether. His environment is habitually insidious and corrupting; the subtle filaments of society transmit an influence which is only malign, its parts work together only for ill. That the life of a community can be healthy, and can stimulate the healthy energies of those who conform to its usages and share its life, Ibsen would probably not deny. But these are not for him the normal conditions; he fastens rather upon the diseased organism, the corrupt community, the hollow marriage, and shows us the moral malaria which such an organism diffuses among its healthy members, if they submit to it, and the disabilities which they suffer if they do not.

It is easy to understand the mood in which a mind with such preoccupations as these approached the problems of tragedy. The conflict of the individual with [illegible], which he in some sense the standing topic of tragedy, was not, for him, a motif which as a dramatic [illegible] he might take or leave, but the form which any dramatic [illegible] of life by him must inevitably assume. Personality, full of [illegible], is perpetually threatened by the drooping grip of circumstance; this traditional antithesis of the tragic stage is how Ibsen the pervading problem of life. No doubt in his later plays this problem is no longer [illegible] with the same simplicity as before. Personality is less vividly distinguished from its environment; a man cannot free himself, like Brand, by sheer force of will from the obsession of circumstance; the past claims its part in him, and its ghosts struggle with the pageantry of his brain. But the more composite men and women of the later plays are not less clearly individualized, their mental profiles are more intricate and subtle, but not less precise; they compel us to face the same problems of psychology and ethics, though the solution is no longer written in Roman letters on the page. Ibsen may be called a poet of revolution, if we will; but it is this revolutionary poet beyond all others, who has taught us in art the power of the past, and its [illegible]. If any man may claim to have [illegible] to modern [illegible] the essential tragedy of Œdipus the King it is the author of Ghosts. And he may be called, if we will, a poet of "Naturalism"; but it is this "Naturalistic" poet who has done more than any other to rescue the European theatre from the worst abuses of what goes by that name, to redeem it from the spiritual and moral insignificance which is often, in ethics as well as in art, a graver crime than indecorum, to restore under formal conditions by the severest realism the inner play of thought, the [illegible] of ideas, the mortal struggle of wills affirming opposite [illegible] of life and of good. Ibsen has been called a "Symbolist"; and so he is in the sense that he habitually [illegible] what he says; but he differs from the school of M. Maeterlinck in using as "symbol" not the most fantastic and visionary, but the most human and vernacular, element of his thought. M. Maeterlinck brings Poetry visible and fully arrayed, upon the stage, and we cannot be too grateful; but from such [illegible] domesticities to which Ibsen [illegible] confines us the interpreting mind has glimpses into the [illegible] of Nature, and becomes aware of the Titan [illegible] at the whirring loom of Time, and of the [illegible] of which the most trivial human story is the [illegible].

FRANCE.

THE NEW SCHOOL OF FRENCH FICTION.

During the last twenty years [illegible] and strong school of fiction has arisen in France. One cannot help wondering if the group of writers which includes Anatole France, Marcel Prévost, Pierre Loti, Bourget, Lavedan, and Hervieu will live in French literature as do those of their predecessors who flourished in the thirties and forties, and among whom will stand out for all time Châteaubriand, Balzac, George Sand, and de Musset—to say nothing of the two Dumas. The younger of whom may be said to have introduced Marcel Prévost to the French reading world by means of the preface written by him to one of Marcel Prévost's first novels, "La Confession d'un Amant." Brilliant as is the modern group, we look in vain for a Balzac, and even more for a George Sand. Indeed, considering the great interest which the woman movement has aroused among French writers, it is surprising that there should be no modern French woman writer able to claim even an equal place with the sounder minor novelists and essayists who form, as it were, a solid background to their more brilliant confrères. Zola and Daudet occupied a place apart. At one time the critics hailed a coming Balzac in the youthful Zola, but, monumental as has been the task he has achieved, he cannot be said to have justified the promise of the earlier volumes of the Rougon-Macquart series. This at all events is what one feels on turning from "La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret" to "Dr. Pascal." The books on which Daudet's legitimate fame was based all came out between the year 1868, when "Le Petit Chose" was published, and 1885, when "Sapho" appeared. During the last ten years of his life the state of his health compelled him to leave the field almost entirely to his younger rivals, who found in him even to the end their most ardent admirer and their shrewdest critic.

The dominant note of modern French fiction is the direct appeal to the intelligence, with as little dependence as possible on that love of story-telling and story-hearing which is as old as humanity itself. It would be hard to say who was the first to set up this new method; but, whoever he was, his example was quickly followed. Anatole France has more than once admitted that he originally began writing fiction in order that he might place certain philosophical ideas and theories before the widest reading public. Himself the son of a publisher, he was aware that for one reader of a brilliant philosophical treatise a thousand will be found for even a poor novel. What he would perhaps be less frank in admitting is the fact that, through the medium of fiction, he has been able to make use of some of his extraordinary erudition. There are pages in "Thaïs" and in "La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pedauque" which must delight and instruct even those who have made a life-long study of the two widely different historical periods with which these wonderful stories deal. The world owes Anatole France the story-teller, as contrasted with Anatole France the poet, the historian, and the scholar, to Renan, who persuaded him to make his first attempt in fiction, and who actually suggested to him the plot of "Le Procurateur de Judée." He has in a literary sense travelled far since "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard" was crowned by the Academy as being not only a work of art, but peculiarly fitted for family reading. M. France might well exclaim "Le style, c'est moi!" It is to his style and to his erudition combined that he owes his seat in the French Academy. But his style, remarkable as it is, would not attract much attention in the land of style were it not that he possesses also in a rare degree the power of telling a story. Of him a fellow writer once observed, "His work is full of genuine surprises, and that without his desiring in any sense to produce any but legitimate effects. As a writer he is innocent and perverted, ironical and sentimental, infinitely credulous while full of scepticism." In one matter M. France is singularly fortunate—he has no imitators, and but few disciples. The realists naturally fear him, for, while producing, as few of them can do, an atmosphere of reality, he deprecates any attempt really to reconstitute even fragments of real life, his only aim being that of giving a poetical aperçu of what has been or might be. He is, according to his own account, a follower of Pascal; it is his aim to preach tolerance and charity; and, while admiring asceticism, and having a certain sympathy with it, he has a horror of the cruel virtues—above all, of a distorted "justice."

Marcel Prevost and his work should attract special attention in England and in America, if only because his methods and ideals are curiously English. He frankly sets out to write problem novels, and, as time goes on, he becomes more and more of a teacher, eager to bring the world round to his way of thinking. Although his first novel appeared as recently as 1887, he published seven volumes before he made his first popular success with "Demi-Vierges"; and his experience certainly shows that the wider reading public is much the same all the world over. Though "Scorpion" attracted instant attention from the critics, and is in point of style, in the opinion of many, by far the best book he has ever written; and, though he published successively "La Confession d'un Amant," "L'Automne d'une Femme," and that astounding literary tour de force, "Lettres de Femmes," it was not till "Demi-Vierges" made its appearance that M. Prévost could call himself successful. Of this book—said by the author to be written in the interests of French mothers, though the title alone banished it from most ordinary French libraries, and still more from the average French drawing-room—50,000 copies were sold in a few months. To M. Prévost's honour, be it said, he did not follow up this succès de scandale with another book of the same type. Probably to the disappointment of those who had appreciated "Demi-Vierges," he turned the whole of his attention to the feminist movement. His first book dealing with the subject, though in a tentative and hardly definite fashion, was the volume entitled "Notre Compagne," and having the sub-title of "Provinciales et Parisiennes." In "Frédérique" he shows his strong sympathy with the advocates of women's rights, and the fact that he has chosen to place the action of his story in London shows that M. Prévost has made a thorough study of the subject. Of the innumerable writers who have attempted to describe London under its many aspects few have succeeded in interpreting the gloomy middle-class working life of the city as M. Prévost has done; and this is the more remarkable when it is considered that M. Prévost's three heroines—Romaine Pernitz, the ardent mystical Slav, and the two French girls, sisters, whom she completely dominates by her ardent love of humanity—only mix with London life, as it were, from the outside. "Frédérique" is to be followed by a continuation and conclusion, "Léa," now on the eve of publication. One asks oneself with some wonder how far M. Prévost's studies in féminisme will lead him. An account of the French beginnings of a movement which has made the publication of such a paper as La Fronde not only possible but financially successful would be welcome from many points of view.

Of M. Lavedan, in some ways perhaps the most brilliant and the least cosmopolitan of the younger writers of French fiction, foreign critics have as yet made little account. Perhaps his literary style and methods of work may be best explained by saying that he has completely routed "Gyp" on her own ground—"Gyp," that is, at her best, the Gyp of "P'tit Bob" and of "Autour du Mariage." "Nouveau Jeu," M. Lavedan's most popular volume, is likely to remain for a long time to come the most pitiless indictment of that frivolous irresponsible section of society which has its counterpart in every European capital. Unfortunately he has found play writing preferable to novel writing. "Le Prince d'Aurec" proved that the last word concerning modern comedy had not been said by Dumas fils, still less by any of his clever disciples. The dramatization by the author of "Nouveau Jeu" was also, though a very different, revelation of what could be achieved in this way of literary farce, and the great success of "Le Vieux Marcheur" is not likely to deter the inventor of this novel genre from offering the most critical audience in the world—that gathered from the many-tongued world of the boulevards—the lure of which they seem incapable of palling. But while M. Lavedan is apparently absorbed in turning out the most risqué as well as the most polished dramatic work ever seen in the boulevards theatres he is being rapidly overtaken, if not distanced, by a comparatively new writer, Paul Hervieu, perhaps best known till now as the author of two stories of modern French life, "Peints par Eux-mêmes" and "L'Armature." Doubtless because he takes so seriously to heart the vices and follies of his fashionable fellow countrymen and countrywomen, his writing is almost entirely unrelieved by humour, and he completely lacks the sharp and sometimes almost impish satire which seems to inspire much of what is written by M. Lavedan. M. Hervieu is grimly conscious of what underlies the irresponsible lives he sets himself out to analyse and describe. He never leaves his reader in any doubt as to how he himself regards his characters, he has no sympathy with their foibles, and his understanding is not of the type that begets pity. His meaning is always clear, and "L'Armature" might well have served as a writing on the wall to those who, in the one camp and in the other, made social, financial, and racial capital out of the Dreyfus case, caring little for the honour, and even less for the prestige, of their unfortunate country. A MODERN BIBLIOGRAPHY OF CHINA.

[Compiled by E. A. REYNOLDS-BALL.]

The following popular bibliography of China is mainly confined to topographical, historical, and political works on China published in England and France within the last two years. For convenience of reference some of the standard works also are appended.

The impossibility of giving anything like a complete bibliography, even of recent works on the Chinese Empire within the limits of an article, may be better understood when it is remembered that the standard French bibliography of works relating to China (published in 1885) consists of over 700 octavo pages of small type.

Beresford, Lord Charles.—"The Break-Up of China." Maps. 12s. Harper. 1899. A study of China mainly from a commercial point of view.

Bishop, Mrs. (Isabella L. Bird).—"The Yangtse Valley and Beyond." 574pp. 116 illust. Maps. 21s. net. Murray. 1899. Still a standard book of travel, though an account of exploration in 1896. The remote provinces of China are so unchanging that the record is almost as valuable as if it described present-day travel.

Bradshaw.—"The Overland Guide to India and the East." 346pp. Maps. 5s. Adams. 1898.

Colquhoun, A. R.—"The 'Overland' to China." 478 pp. Illust. Maps. 16s. Harper. 1900. Written by one of the leading authorities on China. Contains an enormous amount of political information.

Colquhoun, A. R.—"China in Transformation." Maps. 16s. Harper. 1899. A standard authority. Till recently the last word on the China problem.

Cumming, C. F. Gordon.—"Wanderings in China." Illust. 6s. New edition. Blackwood. 1900. One of the most informing books on China ever written.

Douglas, R. K.—"China." 470 pp. Illust. 5s. Fisher Unwin. 1900. One of the "Story of the Nations" Series. Gives an admirable outline of the history of China.

Halcombe, C. J. H.—"The Mystic Flowery Land." 238 pp. 7s. 6d. Luzac. 1899. A revised edition of a popular book of travel.

Hedin, Sven.—"Through Asia." 1,261 pp. 261 illust. Maps. 2 Vols. £1 16s. net. Methuen. 1898. Emphatically a monumental work.

Johnston, J.—"China and its Future." 192 pp. 3s. 6d. E. Stock. 1900. A well-digested study of the political, social, and religious conditions of the Chinese Empire.

Krausse, Alexis.—"China in Decay." 412 pp. 6 maps. 21 illust. 12s. net. Chapman. 1899. A useful contribution to the problem of the Far East.

Little, Archibald.—"Through the Yangtse Gorges." 310 pp. Map. 32 illust. 6s. New edition. 1900. Low. A cheap edition of a well-known book of travel with the topographical information carefully brought up to date.

Little, Archibald.—"The Far East." Maps. One of "The World in 1900" Series. Heinemann. 1900.

Little, Mrs. Archibald.—"Intimate China: The Chinese as I have seen them." Hutchinson. 1899.

Morrison, G. E.—"An Australian in China." 300 pp. 30 illust. 10s. 6d. Horace Cox. 1895.

Norman, Henry.—"Peoples and Politics of the Far East." 624 pp. 63 illust. 4 maps. 7s. 6d. New edition. 1900. Fisher Unwin. A well-known work of reference of considerable value.

Orleans, Prince Henry of.—"From Tonkin to India." 420 pp. 92 illust. Maps. Methuen. 1900.

Plaschut, E.—"China and the Chinese." 282 pp. 38 illust. 2s. 6d. Trans. by Mrs. Arthur Bell. New edition. 1900. Hurst.

Sedgwick, Miss E. R.—"China: The Long-Lived Empire." 350 Illust. 8s. 6d. net. Macmillan. 1900. His most remarkable chapters on the decadence of the alien rulers, the Manchus.

Smith, A. H.—"Village Life in China: A Study in Sociology." 390 pp. 31 illust. 7s. 6d. 2nd edition. Oliphant. 1900. A truthful and well-written account of the inner life of the lower caste Chinese.

RECENT EXCAVATIONS IN CRETE.

"Creta rediviva" is in a special sense becoming a reality of great interest to the growing world which loves Hellenism and all its ways. Mr. Arthur Evans, the Keeper of the new Ashmolean at Oxford, has recently described to the Hellenic Society his recent excavations in that now tranquil island. Not the least remarkable feature of his discoveries lies in the vivid colouring displayed on the walls and reliefs which he has rescued from the dust of perhaps some thirty-three centuries. This valuable addition to the evidence demonstrating the colour-treatment of Greek architecture even in its origins received a pointed emphasis from Sir W. Richmond, R.A., who at once offered his personal services upon the island for next autumn. The Society is generously subsidizing Mr. Evans' own zealous and generous labours, and their work, apart from accomplished facts, may prove of prime value in this branch of science.

Mr. Evans, partly no doubt by reason of the security brought to unhappy Crete by Britain and the other Powers, has been able to succeed where Schliemann and Dr. Dorpfeld have failed. Anxious to dig out the civilization to which certain gems he had found could be attributed, he attacked the hill of Kephala, lying to the south of the historic town of Knossos, while Mr. Hogarth, of the British School of Archæology in Athens, made parallel excavations under Mount Dicte. Put shortly, the result has been to lay bare a "Mycenæan" Palace, the site probably of the court of "King Minos"; the extensive and highly decorated suite of buildings at present uncovered belong clearly to the "Mycenæan" age (say 1800-1100 B.C.). The frescoes are as vigorous and, in parts, as fresh as those of Pompeii which they may anticipate by fourteen centuries. Mr. Evans described a large paved area ("perhaps the original dancing ground of Ariadne!"), girt with vast gypsum blocks, and entered by a double doorway. Here, as well as in a great corridor running round the edge of the terrace excavated, were found well-kept fragments of fresco work—e.g., pieces of a great bull (the Minotaur?) and of life-sized human figures; one of the latter wears an armlet in which was set an agate gem like those previously found. Those interested in classical architecture and its early forms will (when plans and photographs are published) notice with interest a large system of magazines and galleries which fill a great part of the plateau, and which everywhere show signs of some vast catastrophe, since the date of which the site has evidently been undisturbed.

But wonder will be chiefly roused at the building in the north-east corner, which Mr. Evans styled "The Throne Room." Here the frescoes have been found particularly brilliant; a river with fish, water-plants, decorative griffins and the like are to be seen, but also crowds, literally, of men and women; the latter, who are seen in animated conversation, are gaily dressed and exhibit the most elaborate coiffures of one uniform and therefore presumably fashionable kind! These paintings appear also in an ante-room and in the women's quarters, which Mr. Evans felt justified in styling "harem," by reason of the fair white complexions of the ladies in contrast with those of the men. In the throne room itself were found part of a shrine, like one found by Schliemann at Mycenæ, and a remarkable carved throne of gypsum, exhibiting "crockets" and other "gothic" detail! In the "harem," too, there came to light the head and other pieces of a great bull of painted gesso duro, decorative work of this kind having evidently formed a feature of the palace.

These remains in themselves will prove an admirable illustration of the social life of the early Greek world described in the Homeric poems; but much new light, we may well guess, will be thrown by the interpretation of the new "alphabet" of seventy different characters or syllables, a copious supply of which has been found in the course of the excavations. They are likely to spell out an indigenous and primitive form of Cretan Greek and should tell us news of this civilization of thirty and more centuries ago, of the relative height of which the buildings alone are sufficient indications. Both Mr. Evans and his fellow-workers and the Society are to be congratulated upon the present results of their labours, which redound greatly to the credit of British archæological research.

THE DRAMA.

"LES THÉATRES DE LA FOIRE."

Meeting Mr. H. D. Traill only a week or two before his death I complained to him that books of theatrical gossip, of which a particularly tiresome specimen had just then appeared, were as dull as entomological records. He replied, with a sly smile, "Are they not very often the same thing?" The remark was just. When Johnson was asked to compare the merits of two minor poets, he said, "Sir, I cannot pretend to distinguish between a louse and a flea." The distinction between this and that small actor of a past generation seems equally minute and futile. Whether it was Hart or Mohun, Quin or Mossop, who played this or that part in this or that way, who cares? What does it matter to "the great mundane movement?" Yet questions of that sort are the staple of our theatrical memoirs. We have no history on anything like a scientific basis of the stage as an organism, showing the causal relationships of things, giving a rational account of its growth, determining the law of its evolution. And the history of the literary drama is studied in the printed page, without reference to the variations in the mechanical conditions of the playhouse which have influenced its form; that is to say, it is wrongly studied. Thus a recent editor of Congreve accounted for the décousu of his plots and other peculiarities upon some fantastic theory of a purely literary kind, without apparently the slightest suspicion that the explanation was really to be sought in the mechanical disposition of the Restoration Theatre. I have seen a book, used, I believe, by innocent schoolmasters, wherein Shakespeare's plots are dealt with in the same misleading way, with their structural peculiarities explained by the text alone. Not a hint that the arrangements of the Elizabethan playhouse were concerned in the matter. If we had given to our own scenic history one tithe of the study bestowed by German scholars on the structural peculiarities of the Greek theatre absurdities of this kind would have been impossible.

The French are far ahead of us here. They have produced innumerable monographs dealing intelligently with their various dramatic species as conditioned by the varying circumstances of their presentation. Such a monograph is "Les Théâtres de la Foire," by M. Maurice Albert (Paris, Hachette), a compact little book giving the history of the theatres which, between 1660 and the Revolution, grew up outside the orthodox Comédie Française and Académie de Musique, successfully fought their privileged rivals, and in the course of the fight developed new forms of theatrical art. Never was necessity a more prolific mother of invention. The tumblers, rope-dancers, "strong men," conjurers, ballad singers, and drolls who had long entertained the crowd at the two great Paris fairs—that of St. Germain on the left hand of the Seine, and that of St. Laurent on the right—found in mid-seventeenth century their entertainment more popular when thrown into a dramatic framework. Gradually the dramatic came to preponderate over what we should now call the "variety" element, till the entertainments at the fairs were to all intents and purposes stage-plays. This development, as a barefaced infringement of the exclusive privilege held by the "Comédiens du Roi," led to protest and for a time to the closure of the unlicensed booths. But the demand for drama, for a connected story more or less an imitation of life, proved in the end too strong for privilege. If the Court had its theatre, the crowd insisted on having its theatre, too. And the history of the century (say, 1680 to 1780) is a history of the ingenious devices by which the prohibitions against stage-plays outside the Court were evaded and ultimately set at naught. A play is in essence continuous action carried on by dialogue. Dialogue being forbidden to the unlicensed players they adopted monologue, and for continuous action they substituted a series of scenes, each purporting to be complete in itself. Deprived of "cumulative interest," they were driven to give each scene an interest of its own by amplifying the stage "business" and spectacle. Hence the birth of a freer, more flexible, more various form of drama than that of orthodox comedy, tragedy, and farce; vaudeville, burlesque, pantomime, "revue," came into being. As to the monologues, they were only dialogues under another name. The speaking actor addressed mute figures, and then delivered their replies for them. Or speaking actor A would leave the stage, to be succeeded by another speaking actor B; A and B being thus in reality interlocutors. Thereupon outraged authority condemned the actors to silence. Not to be beaten, the players took to miming their parts, while scrolls of dialogue, in rapid succession, were held above their heads. And they had the luck to enlist some peculiarly able writers on their side—notably, Lesage, Piron and Favart. They had many ups and downs—all to be found meticulously but not tediously recorded by M. Albert—and in the end they triumphantly vindicated their right to play what they pleased, where they pleased, and how they pleased. The vindication of their right is an interesting historical fact; what is more important is their invention, in the course of this vindication, of new forms of theatrical art.

Something of the sort might be traced by the curious in the history of the English stage. We, too, had our unlicensed players fighting and ultimately overcoming the privileges of the old Patent Houses. But with us the story is not so significant; partly, no doubt, because our unlicensed players never had their Lesage, and so never produced anything which could count as literature, but still more, I think, because, if I may speak like the electricians, our dramatic "potential" was lower. Nothing is more remarkable in the story of these French booth-theatres than the persistent energy of the dramatic idea, the tendency of every kind of entertainment to take on, as far as it could, the form of a play, a story in dialogue. It seems to us that drama were the necessity of a Frenchman's being. We English were more content to take over tumblers and merry-andrews merely for what they were. It is significant on this point to note that, while France has provided the rest of the world with actors, England has on the other hand provided the spectator. And that has been true for at least two centuries. M. Albert points out that "it is not only the political ideas of England and her philosophers and Shakespeare which prepare us in the eighteenth century, it is also her popular singers for vaudeville and clowns." Another contrast: the history of the "théâtres de la foire" is, roughly, the story of "[illegible] taking to the regular stage; whereas the interesting thing about the London stage to-day is the frequency with which regular dramatic artists are taking to the music-halls.

WATERLOO.

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1815. By W. O'Connor Morris. (Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. n.)

The Literature of Waterloo still continues to grow; four or five good English and French narratives of action on the [illegible] have come to light during the last two years, of which Fitz's long-suppressed diary is the most important. And in adhering to original authorities, the military reader has just before him the best French commentary on the campaign which has ever appeared—the "1815" of M. Henri Houssaye, a work which, if it does not attain to complete impartiality, makes a far nearer approach to that ideal than any earlier book written beyond the Channel. We have now to notice an English history which endeavours to sum up the results of the researches of the last ten years very much on the same lines that M. Houssaye has followed. Judge O'Connor Morris is to be congratulated on his production; it is clear, readable, and interesting. He has used all the important English sources, and has turned to excellent use French authorities than any of his predecessors who wrote from our side. M. Houssaye's [illegible] have undoubtedly helped him in this point; a considerable number of valuable materials for history have become public property since their author discovered them. The reader, therefore, who wishes to acquaint himself with the main lines of the Waterloo campaign by reading a single book will for the future have to go to Judge Morris for his instruction; he is distinctly to be preferred to Ropes, Dorsey Gardner, Hooper, Houssaye, or any other English narrator of the present generation. There are, of course, points upon which some critics will differ from him, and we are inclined to think that, on the whole, he is a little given to underestimating Wellington's and overestimating Napoleon's strategy. But every writer is entitled to his own views when he has fully mastered all the available evidence, and this it cannot be denied that Judge Morris has done.

The main objection which is made to Wellington's strategy is founded on his dispositions made on the 15th of June—the eve of Quatre Bras and Ligny—for the concentration of his army. Following M. Houssaye, Judge Morris holds that the English commander erred gravely in not drawing his centre more eastward the moment that the French crossed the frontier in the direction of Charleroi. The whole question turns on a matter of hours. Wellington, it is alleged, might have given, in the early morning of June 15, the orders to concentrate on Nivelles and Quatre Bras, which, as a matter of fact, he did not issue till after midnight. A careful examination of the facts enables us to think that his delay was justifiable. A general is dependent on the reports sent to him from his outposts; he is like the Kriegsspiel player waiting for the information dealt out to him by the umpire. Till he has a clear indication of the state of affairs he must act so as to be able to face any one of the possible developments of the game. Now on June 15 it was known that the French were not far from the frontier in the direction of the Sambre. There were two fronts on either (or both) of which Napoleon's attack might be delivered. On the English front Dornberg with one German and four Belgian cavalry regiments was watching the frontier from Tournay to Binche: on the Prussian the division of Steinmetz lay touching Dornberg's left, and extending as far as Marchiennes; beyond him, eastward, lay another Prussian division—that of Pirch, from Charleroi to Châtelet. Till Wellington knew which of these three sections of the Belgian frontier was assailed he could not make a decisive move. Unfortunately for him, he was very badly served, both by his own brigadier and by his allies. Early in the day both the Prussian divisions were furiously attacked by numerous French columns advancing on every available road. Dornberg's front, on the other hand, was not the least molested. But Wellington received no news till 3 in the afternoon, when he got a single despatch from Ziethen, to whom Steinmetz's and Pirch's divisions belonged, to the effect that he was heavily assailed by the enemy. The English commander refused to move his whole army till he had more information, and more especially till he should have heard from Dornberg what was going on in front of Mons. It was not till 9 at night that he learnt from that officer that all was quiet in his direction; about the same hour he received a second Prussian despatch, in which Blücher told him how Ziethen's corps had been chased and harried all day by the advancing columns of Napoleon. Having at last the necessary data in his hands, Wellington issued orders for the march at dawn on Quatre Bras—the correct move, but one which would have been more effective if it had been made before noon on the 15th instead of at 4 a.m. on the 16th June. With our present knowledge of what had been happening all through the long summer day we can see that the whole French plan of campaign would have been frustrated if the Anglo-Dutch army had begun to concentrate eighteen hours earlier. But Wellington was dependent on his informants, and they had failed him. Ziethen should have sent him not one tardy aide-de-camp, but a string of messengers with hourly news. Dornberg, as the direct subordinate of the Duke, was even more to blame. The moment that he heard the cannonade beginning a mile or two to the east of his flank he should have commenced to hurry off news to his commander. But Ziethen's despatch did not arrive till 4 in the afternoon, nor Dornberg's till 9 at night. Wellington had been ill-treated by the chance of war and the stupidity of the generals at the outposts, and lost a day's march thereby. Now, when Napoleon suffered in a similar way, as he did more than once during the campaign, all the blame is laid on his subordinate—Ney, D'Erlon, Grouchy, Soult, or whoever it may be. It seems to us only fair that Wellington should be treated in the same fashion. His adversary certainly committed one fault far more serious than any made on the English side—the inexplicable halt of eight hours which he made on the morning of June 17, during which he lost all the advantages that he had won at Ligny. Nor can this halt be ascribed entirely to physical ill-health, as Judge Morris would wish; the Emperor was well enough to ride all round the field of Ligny, and to engage in a long and unnecessary conversation on Parisian politics with his staff when he should have been marching hard on Quatre Bras with all his reserves at his back.

In his criticism of the details of the actual fighting Judge Morris seems to us very sound. He exposes several mistakes of M. Houssaye, notably his overstatement of the effect on the English squares of Ney's great cavalry charges at Quatre Bras and his allegation that Napoleon pressed hard on the retreating English between Quatre Bras and Genappe on the 17th. The list of casualties—under 130 men—shows that the pursuit can not have been very desperate. We have only found one point where we should prefer to accept M. Houssaye's statement rather than Judge Morris' correction of it—viz., the view that La Haye Sainte fell into the hands of the French at 6 rather than at 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 18th of June. The balance of evidence, we think, is clearly in favour of the later hour. A more undoubted slip is the assertion, on p. 83, that the General Steinmetz who commanded one of Ziethen's divisions was the same officer who served at Speicheren and Gravelotte in 1870. They were, we believe, uncle and nephew; the divisional general of 1815 would have been 102 if he had survived till 1870; the Steinmetz of Speicheren was only seventy-four.

SANSKRIT LITERATURE.

A History of Sanskrit Literature, by Arthur A. Macdonell, Boden Professor of Sanskrit and Fellow of Balliol. (Heinemann, 6s.)

Before this volume was published there existed no history of Sanskrit literature as a whole in English. Professor Max Müller dealt only with the Vedic period, and his book has long been out of print. Considering the intense interest belonging to the oldest Aryan poetry, and remembering the indefatigable labours of Max Müller himself in introducing Sanskrit research to English readers, this deficiency is not a little surprising. But one is apt to forget how very modern the study of Sanskrit really is. The beginning of the systematic study of ancient Indian literature dates very little further back than Champollion's first discoveries in Egyptian hieroglyphics. Warren Hastings, whose prodigious services to India are only now beginning to be adequately appreciated, gave the first impulse by ordering a digest of ancient Indian law to be drawn up by certain Brahmans and to be translated into Persian and English. This was in 1776. That extraordinarily brilliant Orientalist Sir William Jones, who crowded such original and prolific energy into a life that did not attain fifty years, printed a Sanskrit text for the first time in 1792. Then came the solid, judicious, comprehensive works of H. T. Colebrooke, and after him Sanskrit became the study not of Englishmen only, but of Continental scholars. Schlegel introduced the comparative method, followed up by Bopp, Kuhn, and Max Müller; and Roth, after publishing his inspiring essay on the "Literature and History of the Veda" in 1846, combined with Böhtlingk to produce their monumental Sanskrit-German dictionary (7 vols., 1852-75), which is perhaps the most perfect lexicon hitherto completed of any language. It is seen how very modern the development of Sanskrit interpretation is. And when we remember that the bulk of these ancient Indian writings exceeds that of classical Greece and Rome put together, that the language is difficult enough to daunt all but resolute students, and that, in spite of the wide range, the difficulty, and the small number of Sanskrit scholars, almost the whole of this large literature has been edited, and the greater part translated, by competent authorities, we must admit that there is no ground for complaining of the energy or the perseverance of Sanskrit students.

The work of the pioneer, editor, and collector is now almost completed, and the task of the encyclopædist and synthesist begins. A comprehensive view of the results of all Sanskrit research is now being presented by about thirty specialists of various nations in the great "Encyclopedia of Indo-Aryan Research," edited first by the late Dr. Bühler and now by Professor Kielhorn. And in a more limited field Professor Macdonell, of Oxford, has just collected in a convenient volume the chief results of a century's investigation of the history and characteristics of Sanskrit literature. So clear and thorough an exposition of the subject should attract more students to what is one of the most fascinating studies in the world. Professor Macdonell maintains rightly that "among all the ancient literatures that of India is undoubtedly in intrinsic value and æsthetic merit second only to that of Greece." Indeed, as a document in the history of human evolution,

Its earliest period, being much older than any product of Greek literature, presents a more primitive form of belief, and therefore gives a clearer picture of the development of religious ideas than any other literary monument of the world. Hence it comes that, just as the discovery of the Sanskrit language led to the foundation of the science of Comparative Philology, an acquaintance with the literature of the Vedas resulted in the foundation of the science of Comparative Mythology.

As every one knows, religion and philosophy have always exercised a supreme attraction for the Indian mind. Meditation, so hard to attain in our modern busy life, was the main occupation and delight of hundreds of thousands of the dwellers in the vast forest solitudes of India, where the struggle for life was simplified by frugal habits and the bounty of nature. Hence Indian literature is dominantly religious and philosophical, and to what heights and depths of speculation these ancient philosophers attained those who read Professor Max Müller's sketches of the "Six Systems" are aware. Science, mathematics, law, medicine, grammar, all have their place in Sanskrit writings—the greatest lack is in history—but none can compare in importance or originality of treatment with the evolution of religion and metaphysics.

Originality is the first characteristic of ancient (we wish we could add modern) Indian thought.

Naturally isolated by its gigantic mountain barrier in the north, the Indian peninsula has ever since the Aryan invasion formed a world apart, over which a unique form of Aryan civilization rapidly spread and has ever since prevailed. When the Greeks, towards the end of the fourth century B.C., invaded the North-West, the Indians had already fully worked out a national culture of their own, unaffected by foreign influences. And, in spite of successive waves of invasion and conquest by Persians, Greeks, Scythians, Mahomedans, the national development of the life and literature of the Indo-Aryan race remained practically unchecked and unmodified from without down to the era of British occupation. No other branch of the Indo-European stock has experienced an isolated evolution like this. No other country, except China, can trace back its language and literature, its religious beliefs and rites, its domestic and social customs, through an uninterrupted development of more than three thousand years.

This is, of course, perfectly true. Sanskrit is still the tongue of the learned Brahmans as it was in the days of Alexander the Great. The Vedas are still committed to memory as they were at the epoch of the Trojan War. The same Vishnu who was worshipped a thousand—or perhaps two thousand—years before Christ is still adored all over India. The modern Hindu is married with the same ceremonies as his ancestor of the age of Pericles. Never was there so continuous and unchanged a national life. The history and growth of the writings which embody this life—the thought and civilization of India—are set forth with much perspicacity in Professor Macdonell's valuable work. It is a book for the student rather than the general reader, who will find it somewhat technical, though even the uninitiated cannot fail to be interested in the chapters on the Vedic Age, the Rigveda, the Epics, and Fairy Tales. These are subjects already familiar to all readers of popular books on mythology and early religion, though the writer is able in many cases to cast fresh light or put old ideas in new and instructive forms. To the systematic student the book will be of the greatest use, first as a comprehensive and consecutive survey of the whole subject of Sanskrit literature, and, secondly, as an invaluable guide to the bibliography. What he cannot fully understand in the text he will be able to follow up in the ample bibliographical notes which form an important and meritorious feature in the series to which the volume belongs. We congratulate the Boden Professor on a very real service to Indian studies, performed with learning, skill, and commendable fairness to others' labours.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Side Lights on Old France.

Side Lights on the Reign of Terror, being the Memoirs of Mademoiselle des Echerolles, translated from the French by Marie Clothilde Balfour (Lane, 12s. 6d.), are authentic memoirs, admirably translated, and handsomely brought out. Their author, Mlle. des Echerolles, was but fourteen when the Revolution burst, and was living at Moulins with her [illegible] took the place of mother to her. Her father, [illegible] the populace as an "aristocrat," also [illegible] he managed to evade the sentence of [illegible] less fortunate, was seized, thrown into prison, and promptly guillotined in spite of the desperate and courageous efforts which the child made to obtain justice for her. This book, that deals with the old story of hateful vengeance for memories of wrong, wreaked usually on the innocent, where no harm could be done before, and yet which is of eternal interest. But there are many side lights, as the title promises, both humorous and grim.

Very humorous is the whole account of the old lady, a cousin of des Echerolles, who offered the young girl a home after the execution of her aunt, and while her future was still in hiding. Mlle. Melon was over eighty, and in her youth, her fortune, and her habits was essentially a member of the ancien régime. She refused to move to any way with the times, and endeavoured, indeed, to make time itself move only in accordance with her caprice, [illegible] in order that she alone should set the [illegible] in the house in order that she alone should set the hour. She was not a beautiful old lady, despite very white [illegible] crimped and dressed high on the top of her head; but she had a large forehead, round and red-lined eyes, a big nose with wide open nostrils, enormous hands and feet, and a figure a little askew. However, such as she was, life, and her hands and her money, appeared highly desirable possessions to a certain peasant, who, calling one day when [illegible] asked to see her without delay:

Mlle. Melon sent word that she could receive him, but once in her presence the man, whether through embarrassment or stupidity, could not very clearly explain the object of his visit. After being repeatedly told to speak out, he at last took courage: "Now that we are all equal," he said, "I have come to 'requisition' you." "What do you mean?" returned Mlle. Melon, who did not understand. "I say that now we are all free to exercise our rights, I put you in requisition." "And what does that mean?" she asked, somewhat impatiently. "Why, it means that you must marry me!" (The translator tells us in a note that in several departments the Jacobins forced [illegible] such marriages.) To hear this, to rise from her chair, to seize her cane and let fall a rain of blows upon this astonishing (and astonished) suitor was the work of a moment. He stepped back, but she followed him saying: "Ah, you want to marry me? Ah, ah! here is a wedding for you—here, for this, and this, and this. . . ." The [illegible] downwards, utterly stupefied by this reception. "But, Citoyenne! I thought—" "Ah, I am a Citoyenne, am I? Wait a little, wait a little. That's for the Citoyenne." . . . Here he fairly took to his heels. "Citoyenne is a fine [illegible] simple hen." Mlle. Melon took a long while to come [illegible].

But what a delightful scene, straight from Millet—the dull-witted peasant, full of cupidity, but more stupid than the ox he drove, and the ugly, proud, little, old aristocratic lady, who, doubtless, in her youth had often known of noble to be being flogged to death for trifling offences or displacements to warm his seigneur's chilled feet. The whole history of the Revolution lies in a proper appreciation of the difference between these two.

Two Epoch-makers.

Mr. F. J. Snell's contribution to "The World's Epoch Makers"—Wesley and Methodism (T. and T. Clark, 7s.)—gives a picture, ably drawn, of the man John Wesley. It is not a full life, for it skips rather lightly over Wesley's outgoing travels and over the details of his organisation. Mr. Snell writes rather as the psychologist than as the religious historian, and would have done well, we think, to have entered a little more fully into the comparative study of the Puritan spirit and its previous history in the Brownists, the Quakers, and others. He gives us instead a good deal of analysis of the Wesleyan temperament in which ingenuity is sometimes strained to breaking point, as in the discussion of the Methodist view of earthly pleasures. Mr. Snell illustrates this by a long quotation from M. Max O'Rell's account of Renan's philosophy of life, and commits himself to the statement that though there yawns a gulf between Wesley and Renan, yet between Renan and the Methodism of to-day "there exists no antagonism—outside theology." Mr. Snell's research is not commended to us by his account of the connexion between the Wesleys and the Wellesleys. He tells us that a Mr. Garrett Wesley, of the Irish family, was willing to adopt Charles Wesley, who declined the offer. Afterwards Mr. Wesley "chose in his stead a scion of the house of Colley and a maternal relation of his own," who afterwards became "Barron Mornington." As a matter of fact Lord Mornington succeeded to the estates of Garrett Wesley, who was his cousin, and died without issue. In his old age Charles Wesley became a friend of the second Lord Mornington. There is not much in the way of relationship in all this, though Mr. Snell says "even this coincidence does not exhaust the network of relationships," and further adds a reference to the correspondence between John Wesley and "a Mrs. Delany," who was Lord Mornington's godmother. The real coincidences were quite different. There seems to have been no original connexion between the Devonshire family of Westley from which sprang John Wesley, and the Irish family of Wellesley or Wesley, of Dangan, which in the early part of the eighteenth century merged into the family of Colley, of Carbury. The first Colley-Wellesley was the Duke of Wellington's grandfather. By a curious coincidence, however, the Devonshire Westleys intermarried between 1550 and 1620, first with the Wellesleys, and then with the Colleys, so that there was a link between the two families of Wesley—both of them spelt it so at various times—but not one that accounts for the similarity of name. We may add that Mr. Snell's book deserves praise for the knowledge it shows of Wesley's character and writings, and also for its style, which is thoughtful and interesting.

It might well be thought that there is nothing new to be said about Luther, especially in a little book such as LUTHER AND THE GERMAN REFORMATION, by Thomas M. Lindsay, D.D. (T. and T. Clark, 3s.), which belongs to the same series as Mr. Snell's book. But Dr. Lindsay, by addressing himself particularly to the task of showing the great Reformer as he lived among the people of his day, has succeeded in writing a most interesting, fresh, and to some extent, original book. He writes from a strongly Protestant point of view, and in his discussion of doctrinal questions—notably, the history of the doctrine of indulgences and the Eucharistic controversy between Luther and Zwingli—he will certainly not win the approval of the majority of professed theologians. He is a little inclined, too, to go out of the way to express his own opinions on doctrinal points as if they were final, even when they differ from the accredited interpretations of schools of which he is writing—thus in his chronological summary he states that in the English XXXIX. Articles the doctrines of Predestination and of the Lord's Supper are Calvinist—a view hard to reconcile with the teaching of Anglican divines or of Calvin himself. He is also frankly and quaintly Scots, and seems to write entirely for a northern audience. Certainly English folk, and foreigners, will be puzzled, if not by Mohra being translated "Muirtown," at least by Hapsburg being rendered "Gled's Tower," and by Luther's being made to say "My conscience is thirled to the Word of God." More curious still is the contrast that Dr. Lindsay is fond of drawing between "the Medieval Church" and the Church of other days. He repeatedly speaks strangely of the men of those times as recognizing that they belonged to the "Medieval Church"—as though one wrote of the Greeks rejoicing in the consciousness of living in such or such a century B.C. He dwells at length on the monastic life, forgetting that Luther cannot accurately be described as a monk at all. But with all these curiosities the book is very pleasant reading, and it is clearly a work of genuine labour, and, on the whole, of accuracy and of vivid portraiture.

Cromwell.

Mr. Firth's OLIVER CROMWELL AND THE RULE OF THE PURITANS IN ENGLAND (Heroes of the Nations, Putnam, 5s.), though the last, is assuredly not the least of the series of biographies called forth by the recent tercentenary. The author possesses so exhaustive an acquaintance with the history of the period that his latest contribution to it has been waited for with much interest. He may be congratulated on the restraint and dispassionateness which he has shown in this review of his hero's career. Without attempting to disguise his sympathy with the Puritan cause and its leader, he has avoided the biographer's besetting sin of indiscriminate eulogy; and if his narrative in some particulars, as in the account of Strafford's trial, is not exactly impartial, he is never bitter or deliberately unfair in judging the defeated party.

Perhaps the most disputable thesis maintained in the book is that Cromwell deserves to be honoured not only as a great soldier, but also as a great statesman. In proof of this Mr. Firth cites the many ordinances of the Protector, which were nearly all confirmed by his second Parliament, and adds that "if Cromwell's reforming zeal has left no trace on the statute book the reason is that all the laws passed during the Protectorate were annulled at the Restoration." We may freely accept this explanation of the lack of permanence in Cromwell's work, and yet hesitate to credit him with any higher merit than that of a capable administrator. Even Mr. J. R. Green, as fervent an admirer as Mr. Firth, denies Cromwell's title to statesmanship. It has been well said of Cromwell that "he was a successful governor prospectively and hypothetically, not actually; he mastered the mechanism of government, but he could not get possession of men's hearts and minds." This, it might be urged, was his misfortune, not his fault; but the excuse will not serve. Had he been a statesman, and not a fanatic, he would not have regarded himself as the minister of divine vengeance in the execution of the King, and in the massacres of the rebel Irish. At the time, as indeed ever since, he was regarded as mainly responsible for the first of these grievous errors of policy; and Mr. Firth's suggestions that even in December, 1648, he "doubted the policy" of it and that he was "one of the last of his party to believe in its necessity" stand in much need of proof. As to the second error, it is curious that Mr. Firth is entirely at issue with Mr. John Morley in his article in the June "Century." Mr. Firth says that the massacres succeeded for a time "as Cromwell hoped, in saving further effusion of blood"; Mr. Morley, we think with good reason, points to the rest of the campaign as absolutely disproving this view. Cromwell could crush men; he could not win them; and it is surely the first quality of statesmanship to lead men's wills and not to force them. In the very able characterization of his hero in the "Epilogue" Mr. Firth himself supplies the reason for Cromwell's failure, viz., that he lacked patience; he wanted to go too fast, and would not stop to weigh the results of his own action. A statesman would have foreseen that by allowing the army to wreak its vengeance on the King he would ruin "the Cause" in the eyes of all moderate men, and leave no room for any but a personal government founded on militarism. Cromwell's enemies have not seldom averred that he foresaw the consequences to himself of getting the King out of the way; his friends should remember that, in denying him this foresight, they thereby impeach his title to the higher statesmanship.

Mr. Firth has given much attention to military questions connected with the Civil War; and in this work he publishes plans of the fights at Marston Moor, Naseby, Preston, Dunbar, and Worcester, which, together with his own admirable descriptions, will be of the utmost help to students of the campaigns. There are also a number of excellent illustrations, including one of the much-discussed statue at Westminster.

Byzantium.

A discursive essay on BYZANTINE HISTORY IN THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES (Macmillan, 2s. 6d. n.), wide in scope, furnished with references to the more obvious modern books on the subject, is Mr. Frederic Harrison's contribution to the distinguished series of Rede lectures. It may serve excellently for its purpose, which is to direct English scholars towards some detailed work at the fruitful history of the new Rome. Perhaps intentionally, Mr. Harrison seems to undervalue the work that has been done; in architecture, for instance, he hardly does justice to the investigations of English writers, and he seems, indeed, still to be under the rule of Ferguson, beyond whom we have travelled far. But he is certainly fully justified in calling attention to the fact that "the learning on the Greeco-Roman law between Justinian and the School of Bologna is entirely confined to foreign scholars . . . It is a virgin soil that lies open to the plough of any inquiring student of law." The codes of Leo III. and Constantine V. and the great legal work of the Basilian dynasty would fully repay that elaborate investigation which they demand at the hands of English scholars. In points such as these Mr. Harrison's index finger will do useful service. There are passages in his lecture which are very eloquently expressed, and the general idea (which is that long ago emphasized by Mr. Freeman) is happily illustrated. But the sketch is necessarily too slight to be of service to any but beginners in historical investigation, and the notes will be chiefly useful because they should lead to further research. In the treatment of the subject, which shows Mr. Harrison's familiar ease and literary skill, two points only strike us as unsatisfactory. While the excellence of the administration is dwelt on with the necessary force, hardly enough attention, we think, is paid to the power of individual achievement in the maintenance of the Empire; and thus there is a loss of proportion in the historical presentment as well as in picturesqueness. Again the curious contrast that Mr. Harrison seems to desire to make between the Eastern Churches and the rest of Europe in religious matters is expressed in the title which he always gives to the Western Church, as it seems by contradistinction, of "the Church Catholic," a phrase which obscures the historical relation between East and West, and unduly magnifies the earlier history of the great Western patriarchate.

Mr. Harrison in his conclusion does not doubt that the civilization of the new Rome as compared with that of the West from the times of Charles and Otto was "a lower type," and "that neither in State nor in Church, neither in policy nor in arms, in morals, in literature, or in art, did it in the sum equal or even approach the Catholic Feudalism of the West." We confess that we think that in his own eloquent lecture he has himself refuted this view.

Guide-books.

Week-Ends in Holland (Homeland Association, 1s.) is the title of the first of a new series of guide-books intended apparently to instruct bicyclists who run out of town from Saturday to Monday. It deals with the road to Tunbridge, and is small, and rounded at the corners so that it can readily be slipped into the pocket. The text is satisfactory and so are the pictures, though we do not know whether they were specially drawn for the book.

A new and extensively revised edition has been sent to us of Bradshaw's Directory of Bathing Places, Climatical Health Resorts, Mineral Waters, Sea Baths, and Hydropathic Establishments (2s. 6d.). It directs our attention to a large number of places, but the information given is in many instances too scanty to be of much use. In particular we should like to know more about the nature of the accommodation at the out-of-the-way bathing establishments in such countries as Spain. Nor is the book quite free from mistakes. The statement, for example, that Martigny is 5,000 feet above the level of the sea is incorrect. According to Baedeker the altitude of Martigny is only 1,560 feet.

Messrs. Black have sent us a new 11th edition of their guide-book to Manchester (1s.), a useful little volume.

Volunteer Soldiers (Kegan Paul, 1s.), by Captain M. H. Hale, is a new and revised edition of a book published some fourteen years ago under the title of "Amateur Soldiers." It includes an historical sketch of the Volunteer Movement, an account of the organization of the force, and some general remarks on various aspects of the subject. We shall be glad if it stimulates recruiting; but we are not sanguine that it will.

The Handbook of Jamaica (Stanford, 7s. 6d.) naturally confines for the most part of financial information such subjects as the conditions of education in the Jamaican Civil Service, the Debt of Jamaica, its education, agriculture, and industries, but it might also be used to serve many of the purposes of a guide book. It contains, for example, lists of hotels, railway time-tables, particulars of coach and steam services, and a description of the itinerary to the summit of Blue Mountain Peak. This excursion, we gather, takes two days; a pony for the purpose can be hired for £1, and it is owing to the generosity of Sir Henry Norman, who paid for the making of a road, that the ascent can now be accomplished without discomfort.

EDUCATIONAL.

Side by side with the Oxford Text of Xenophon, which we noticed on July 7, comes A Commentary on the Hellenica of Xenophon, with Introduction and appendix, by G. E. Underhill (Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d.). Mr. Underhill has studied the textual problems of Xenophon at first hand, and has earned a hearing on the criticism of his author; but this book is mainly exegetical. We can cordially recommend it; the book seems to us the very thing a historical student would want. The introduction deals with the composition of the work, its chronology and MSS., and the author's life; there are 300 pages of notes; and finally, a series of excursus on more important historical points, with full indices. The difficult questions of Xenophon's object in writing the book, its divisions, omissions, peculiarities, are treated with admirable lucidity and sense. We are never in doubt what Mr. Underhill is driving at, and he is not too ready to call a case proven. In citing authorities he uses great care, and he has checked and illustrated the historians by the inscriptions. There is an essay on the state of Sparta in this period, which is new in treatment if not in matter, and the Athenian attempt to recover a maritime empire during the Corinthian war is brought into clearer light by two of inscriptions recently discovered.

The Rector of Lincoln publishes another play in his school edition of Aristophanes, the Peace (by W. W. Merry; Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.). The editor's manner is sufficiently well known to teachers, and the Peace has been edited with the same taste, humour, and good sense as the others. The translations are often racy, if they do smack of slang a trifle too much. This edition gives, we think, overmuch help for a school-book, but indeed the Peace is not altogether suited for school work. There is one illustration, a vase-painting of cottabos (p. 79); it is a pity there are no more. Do people read Don Quixote nowadays? It would have been worth while to compare Trygaeus's aerial flight with Sancho Panza's.

The Andromache of Euripides, edited by Mr. A. E. F. Hyslop, added to Macmillan's Classical Series (2s. 6d.), comes not long after Mr. G. Murray's interesting sketch-play on the same subject which we lately reviewed in these columns. Mr. Hyslop has not made many alterations in the received text. His introduction frankly points out the faults of the play (which is indeed not first-rate), but insists on its pathos and human feeling; it also contains a few judicious remarks on the characters. A few stage-directions are interspersed, which will be a help to schoolboys. The notes are scholarly, and not too long.

Mr. W. J. Woodhouse, author of an able work on Aetolia, has produced a capital edition of Isocrates ad Nicoclem (Clive, 2s. 6d.), in the University Tutorial Series. There is no other edition of this speech with English notes, so far as we are aware, and the speech will be a novelty for schools. The style of Isocrates has something of the obviousness of the Latin classics, and it may help the schoolboy to understand what is meant by literary form. The introduction gives a sketch of Isocrates' life, works, and influence, and of Athenian and of the circumstances which are assumed by the speech. The notes are just what they should be. The Epitaphios and Against Eratosthenes of Lysias are edited in the same series by Mr. J. Thompson and Mr. T. R. Mills. Lysias is well suited for school reading by his simplicity and dramatic interest. We think that more might have been made of the latter point in the introduction; the ethos which is so characteristic of him might have been brought out by a few examples. Otherwise the introduction is clear and good; it deals with the history of the period, the life of Lysias, Attic oratory and law procedure, and the speeches in hand. The notes are too elementary, and chances are missed of setting intelligent minds at work; the word ὅσιον is one instance (iii. 1)—why should it mean both "holy" and "profane?"

The Satires of Horace, edited by H. J. Hayes and F. G. Plaistowe, does not differ from most others of the University Tutorial Series (Clive, 4s. 6d.). There is the usual introduction, with a very short sketch of Horace's life, a page or two on philosophical sects, and metrical notes which will be useful for reference. The best part of it is a few paragraphs on Lucilius, with specimens of his remains (translated), and on the satire as treated by Horace. The notes, as usual, give elementary help; where there is a real difficulty, as in i. 3, 120, the discussion is not adequate.

Mr. A. F. Hort has added yet another to the editions of Livy, Book V., in Rivington's Middle Form Classics (2s.). There is nothing to note in it save the brevity of the introduction and the simplicity of the notes. We think an introduction ought to contain something about Livy's sources and his value as a historian; and the notes seem to give too much help. They are, however, quite good in themselves, and the translations are idiomatic.

An edition of Cicero in Catilinam, I.-IV. (Blackwood's Classical Texts, 1s. 6d., illustrated), is an odd production. Mr. H. W. Auden, the editor, is consumed with a desire for clearness, which leads him to number, tabulate, compress, and summarize, until his paragraphs look like jottings from a note-book. There is no sense of literary style in the introductory part, which contains a large number of notes which are not even complete sentences. This does not inspire us with confidence when we are offered "Six Hints on Translating," one of which is to "avoid the word thing," and substitute various flowery paraphrases. Mr. Auden's ideal of sentence-structure seems to be Macaulay's pop-gun style; we cannot admit that "Clearness is everything," though it is certainly the chief thing. The editor's own example may, we fear, lead boys to drop out their definite articles and verbs. The sections of the introduction are not properly arranged. The notes, however, are good, and there are some useful hints in an appendix for the practice of "précis-prose" in middle forms. The book contains a number of interesting pictures and plans—Cicero, the Forum, the Appian Way, and (a novelty) Prof. Maccari's vigorous fresco of Catiline in the Senate. Catiline's figure is repeated on a larger scale opposite p. xx., and is a fine study, which will certainly help readers to realize his character. The restoration of the Forum (p. 32) has the Arx and the Temple of Jupiter on the wrong peaks of the Capitoline.

We can recommend an edition of Eutropius, I.-II., by W. C. Luming (Blackie's Latin Series, 1s. 6d.), as well suited to young boys, except that it has no vocabulary (we believe an edition with vocabulary is procurable). It is printed in large clear type, and has a number of effective pictures and plans. Most of these are from monuments, but some are imaginary; and we should like to learn more about the School of the Vestals (frontispiece), which contains a round dozen of novices.

Bell's Illustrated Classics has been increased by Ovid, Tristia, III. (H. R. Woolrych), Cæsar, Gallic War, Book V. (A. Reynolds), and Selections from Virgil's Æneid, VII.-XII. (W. G. Coast), 1s. 6d. each, with introductions, notes, and vocabularies. We have already called attention to the chief fault of this series, its small page and somewhat small print. It would be a great improvement even to double the margin. Otherwise they are nice books; the editing is well done, and the pictures are really illustrative. The "Tristia" has a number of outline cuts, and several good process plates—Theatre of Marcellus, the Forum, the House of the Vestals, and Dædalus with Icarus. Mr. Woolrych does his editing with taste and skill; but he might have said something about the elegiac metre. The "Cæsar" contains a bust of the Dictator, a number of cuts illustrating things warlike, and a very clear map of Gaul, which, however, is no help towards understanding the natural features of the country. Here Mr. Liddell's account of the Roman army is reprinted. Mr. Coast has provided a series of extracts which tell the latter half of the story of the "Æneid" with the help of interspersed summaries. It would have been convenient had the lines of the whole selection been numbered continuously. Extracts are given in the preface from the translations of Dryden, Conington, Rowen, and Mackail, which will certainly be useful as models. A fine statue of Juno is the frontispiece.

FICTION.

Mrs. Craigie's New Book.

In Robert Orange, by John Oliver Hobbes (Unwin, 6s.), we have the sequel to "The School for Saints," and the further history of Orange and Brigit. As one of the characters in the book observes, Orange was born to be a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, and, although some four hundred pages are devoted to putting obstacles in his way, although he is driven to commit bigamy—of course, unintentionally—and murder—in the form of the duel—as he goes along, nevertheless he reaches the goal at last, and we leave him at peace and a Monsignore. For as an addendum omitted from the concluding chapter remarks "The passion of love invariably drives men and women to an extreme step in one direction or another. It will send some to the cloister, some to the tribune, some to the stage, some to heroism, some to crime, and all to their natural calling." And their natural calling seems, if we may judge from the story of Orange and of Brigit, to be that which is marked out for them by our old friend heredity. Mrs. Craigie devotes immense pains to the painting of Orange; she admires and loves him, and seeks diligently to make the reader love and admire him too. Admirable he certainly is, since he possesses every virtue, and most of the talents, but as the French proverb has it: "Ce n'est rien d'être admiré, le fait est de se faire aimé." We cannot say that we felt any particular affection for Orange, it is difficult even to keep up an interest in him; and one wonders why Brigit was so immensely in love with him, until one remembers that Brigit was but seventeen. Hers is the best drawn of the characters. Her curious beauty, her indefinable charm are conveyed to the reader subtly as they should be, without too much analysis. There is too much analysis of the minds and motives of everybody else; of the tiresome but carefully drawn young peer Reckage, who is engaged to Agnes Carillon, but is in love with Lady Sara; of Agnes, who is in love with the painter Rennes, with whom she presently elopes; of Pensée, the friend of all, and still the sweetest figure in the entourage of the two books; and of Lady Sara herself, the red and brown gipsy beauty, who is in love with Orange, and becomes a Carmelite nun after he has joined the priesthood. Nevertheless, it is a thoroughly able book, full of careful characterization and fine touches of comedy. The real ability of Mrs. Craigie's earlier work was somewhat lost sight of perhaps in its brilliancy. Brilliancy no longer predominates, although there are epigrammatic phrases which stick in the mind. There is also a French phrase which we wish did not stick in the mind, as it is the French of Stratford-atte-Bowe. "A l'outrance," says Castrillon, the wicked young French nobleman, whom Robert kills for the crime of having acted in private theatricals with Brigit; and "A l'outrance" assents Robert, although he is half French at least, and representative of one of the finest families in France. It seems impossible to teach the characters of fiction either to avoid foreign tongues, or to use them correctly, but this solecism is the one and only blot upon the otherwise adorable impeccability of Robert Orange's career. Mrs. Craigie introduces Disraeli. She gives two letters from the great man, one to Orange concerning his unfortunate position as bigamist, and one about him which serves as epilogue to the book. Both are felicitous and full of admirably characteristic touches, but we can hardly "see" Disraeli in Charles Wyndham's favourite part, and it is difficult to shake off a feeling of unreality as we listen to Mrs. Craigie speaking in the guise of the Conservative Premier.

For the War.

For Britain's Soldiers (Methuen, 6s.) is on the same lines as "The Ladysmith Treasury," which we reviewed last week. That is to say, it is a collection of short stories by various authors, the financial proceeds of which will be given to the War Fund. We shall not institute invidious comparisons between two meritorious productions, but will recommend every one to buy them both. The editor, in this case, is Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne, who also contributes a story entitled "The Renegade." The other contributors are Sir Walter Besant, and Messrs. W. L. Alden, S. R. Crockett, B. M. Croker, E. W. Hornung, Rudyard Kipling, A. E. W. Mason, Frankfort Moore, Max Pemberton, Pett Ridge, Morley Roberts, H. G. Wells, Percy White, and Walter Wood. It should be added that it is not only the authors but also the publishers who contribute their profits to the good cause, and that the booksellers are cordially invited in the preface to do the same. How, in the circumstances, can a mere member of the outside public do less than buy the book?

An Historical Novel.

You should be somewhat versed in venerie, and not unacquainted with the days of King Edward I., to taste the full flavour of Sir Herbert Maxwell's new book THE CHEVALIER OF THE SELENDIB CHRIST (Blackwood, 6s.). And, in parenthesis, you should never have read Dumas, for the historical novels of that wonderful man spoil your palate for the historical novels of everybody else. To be sure, "The Chevalier" is one of the best of its kind, and does not disappoint the expectations naturally raised when so skilful a writer as Sir Herbert Maxwell diverges into the fields of fiction. We hardly think, though, that the spirit of illusion is helped by constant assurances that this is true, that the other is drawn from authentic documents, by frequent foot-notes, and by the insertion of maps.

Good Novels for the Holidays.

In BLACK HEART AND WHITE HEART (Longmans, 6s.), Mr. Rider Haggard mounts once more those trusty steeds of his, the nobility of the savage and the rascality of the civilized white. He rides, too, with all his old dexterity, and the three stories concerning Zulus, witches, battles, sacrifices, and traitors, of which this volume consists, will give the old pleasure to his friends.

Although THE CHICAMON STONE (Smith, 6s.) is simply an old story retold—that of the search for gold, this time up in Alaska—it takes on, at the hands of Mr. Clive Phillips-Wolley, an entirely new dress. For the author, a Canadian, knows thoroughly the country of which he writes; he knows the Indian, and he knows the Uitlander, and he uses his knowledge to give an air of reality to the sensational incidents which he recounts. The result is a book which even the reviewer was unable to read without delightful thrills and a sense of fearful joy.

ENOCH WILLOUGHBY (Downey, 6s.), by Mr. James A. Wickersham, is a rather curious novel of unfamiliar American life. The history of the Quaker Willoughbys and of their spirituality and spiritualism will not we fancy be very generally popular, but it is a carefully and cleverly written book, and will well repay perusal.

THE COMPLEAT BACHELOR, by Oliver Onions (Murray, 2s. 6d.), belongs to the same literary category as the "Dolly Dialogues," to which work it is not visibly inferior. The episodes are in the main plausible and entertaining, and readers of the fair sex will be relieved to learn that the bachelor meets with the common fate of bachelors, and is safely and painlessly trapped on the last page.

Mr. Morgan Robertson's SPUN YARN (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a collection of stories of sea life. He knows the life of the mercantile marine and Navy, and he has, we think, dipped three times in Robert Louis Stevenson—much to the advantage of his readers. For those who like a book to taste of brine "Spun-Yarn" will serve to mitigate the longueurs of the South-Eastern Railway.

The secrets of THE PRISON-HOUSE (Blackwood, 6s.) which are divulged to us by Miss Jane Jones are not all agreeable, but they are interesting. We do not recollect the name of the authoress of this book as that of a novelist, but her characterisation of men and women is clear and convincing, her descriptions of manners show intuition, but lack something of observation. The hero who inherits a large fortune, and is a man of exquisite taste, constantly smokes "cheroots," and on the occasion when he does light a cigar he at once goes to sleep under a tree in Regent's-park—a thing a gentleman of fashion does so rarely as to be rather too much for a story. Much is made of incident in it. Nevertheless, the humour, the subdued tragedy, the clever development of the plot in "The Prison-House," will keep the reader interested throughout the 340 pages, and if this be a first book Miss Jones is to be congratulated.

> Pleasant the trade of carriages, supposing the moment and carriage;
> But the colt who is wise will shrink from the terrible thought of marriage quotes Miss Dorothea Conyers, but it is not all the pleasures and snaffle but of THE THORN BIT (Hutchinson, 6s.) that she writes in an unusually interesting and vivid fashion. Mr. Dene Grey and his cousin Nancy are well-drawn studies of character.

THE PHYLOSOPHIES OF PASSING THINGS, by Lilias Rowlands, is one of the little three-and-sixpenny novels brought out by the New Century Press. It is a handy volume as to size and print for carrying about on a journey, and in this case the story is worth reading. The peasant folk, with their sordid little tragedies and quaint views, are sympathetically done. Martha, with her illegitimate child, is terribly true to her type. "Did yur love him, Mahal? Do yur yase in yur hart fur him yet?" asks her idealistic old deluded father. "No," she answers, "I canna say as I heeds him noo." It is depressing, perhaps, but good, sincere work from first to last.

At the time when Miss Annie Thomas (Mrs. Pender Cudlip) opens her story, COMRADES TRUE (Chatto, 6s.), the characters are thus described: "They were all young, handsome, healthy, happy, and poor. Two of them were clerks in the Admiralty, and the third was a fine fox terrier." When an agreeable dog plays a leading part in a novel you may be sure there will be a breezy simplicity about the other actors, and you will not be disappointed here. Such clerks in the Admiralty as we happen to know are quite unlike Miss Thomas' friends, but she tells a very good tale ending on the note of "All's Well" with the weddings of the right people.

The author of "Twixt the Devil and the Deep Sea" gives the rather flippant title THE DERELICT AND TOMMY (Greening, 2s.) to a short story which tells, lightly enough, an affair of tragic issues. Her pictures of life at Sea Reach (for, though it is anonymous, the book solves for itself the "sex problem" which so often puzzles the critic) and her sketch of the lassie in love with the derelict show no small skill. The heroine is prepared, we are told, to forgive anything in the man she loves, and, as far as the super-subtlety of the author permits us to judge, she would have to forgive a great deal.

Major Arthur Griffiths.

FAST AND LOOSE (Macqueen, 6s.) is one of a couple of those pleasant, rather exciting, rather old-fashioned books that Major Arthur Griffiths puts together with so much skill and apparent facility. We begin with an elaborate bank robbery and end with a simple marriage. But many and strange are the adventures which lie between. The author's official connection with criminal life has shown him that melodrama is nearer akin to every-day affairs than many novel readers suppose, and in "Fast and Loose" he does not hesitate to give us full measure of clues and French complications and the general tangled skein of crime. The story is exciting, but the characters rather wooden. The Major's other book is IN TIGHT PLACES (Jarrold, 6s.), which contains sixteen detective stories of a well-known type—e.g., that of the Yankee card-swindler, who takes a big house in London, to hold the bank and swindle at baccarat; that of the wonderful Indian jewel, worn by a fair young English girl, for the sake of which Kam Das commits a murder; and that of the tracking-down of the victim of a Russian secret society.

If it had not been for Mr. Anthony Hope's imaginary kingdom stories Mr. F. M. Allen would never have written MR. BOYTON (Downey, 3s. 6d.). In this case a certain Patrick Caesar Boyton, of Chicago, becomes King of Poland. The imitation is not very happy, as, indeed, few imitations are. The author has not displayed his humour so well as in his former stories, and the absence of all love interest will prevent the book from being popular with women.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The Shakespeare Memorial Library in the reference department of the Birmingham Free Libraries is perhaps the most important collection of Shakespeariana extant. The first part of an index to it has just been issued, giving the English editions of the plays, selections, separate editions of single plays, and the poems, sonnets, and songs. This index, when completed, will have considerable literary value.

From West Ham we have a novel and useful publication issued at an appropriate time—viz., a hand-list of books in the public libraries which relate to holiday resorts, arranged alphabetically under names of places. The separate cataloguing of topographical works will doubtless suggest the provision of later editions of some of the guide-books for present-day tourists.

We have received annual reports from the Cambridge University Library and the Richmond (Surrey) Public Library. An appendix to the Cambridge report gives an account of the valuable work done in deciphering the Taylor-Schechter collection of Hebrew documents and manuscripts discovered in Cairo. The late Dr. Wright's catalogue of Syriac manuscripts has been completed under the supervision of Professor Bevan, while Mr. Sayle's catalogue of English books printed not later than 1640 makes good progress. Mr. H. G. Aldis was chosen as Secretary to the Library last June, and Mr. E. G. Browne, M.A., was appointed Curator in Oriental Literature, to hold office for one year.

The provision of books for the blind, and the want of such works in the ordinary public library, has recently attracted attention. It would be a truly philanthropic work if some provision could be made, but the two great drawbacks are cost and bulk. Few libraries could afford the space which the Braille volumes require or lightly incur the expense of a large stock. A good plan would be the establishment in London of a central library for the blind, combined with branches or delivery stations if necessary. Such an institution could deal with the question of selecting a better and more entertaining kind of literature than has hitherto been provided for those whose affliction has not quenched a love for good reading.

The recent Stuckey-Lean bequest of £50,000 for the establishment of a central reference library at Bristol is to be augmented by a gift of about one thousand volumes, many of them valuable and all interesting, from Mr. Stuckey-Lean's own library, which, with the exception of certain books diverted by will to the British Museum, the executors have decided to present to the Bristol Corporation to be "enshrined" in the new library.

Some strictures passed by the editor of the Library Association Record on "the criminal side of book-plate collecting" have raised quite a storm. An editorial in the Ex-Libris Journal attacks him in uncompromising fashion for his assertion that book-plate collecting was a pernicious craze and the threat that possession of the Rylands Library book-plate would be regarded as criminal. Many people are of the opinion once expressed by Mr. Edmund Gosse that the only proper place for a book-plate is in the owner's books. But it is not often such thefts take place as the one at Harvard. Each public institution possessing a book-plate offers some temptation to thief and forger, but there are thousands of opportunities for dishonesty to be met with elsewhere every day, and no one would suggest that all business and professional life should be abandoned on that account.

Visitors to Lynton will shortly find another attraction added to that charming village. Sir George Newnes has presented it with a town-hall combined with a public library at a cost of several thousand pounds. Almost every week is chronicled an instance of this form of philanthropy. Mr. Andrew Carnegie is rapidly reducing the benighted parishes of his native land, and his latest promised gift is a sum of £2,000 to erect a public library to Lockerbie, where the Acts have been adopted.

Too great thoroughness may sometimes be a drawback. The catalogue of books in the reference department of the Wigan Public Library promises to be an almost monumental work. The latest part issued deals with the letter L, and reaches page 1,758 of the catalogue. A quarto with much small type, it is evidence of great care and labour on the part of the compiler. Yet as Mr. Folkard, the librarian, is presumably issuing his catalogue less for future bibliographers than for present readers, the work suffers from trop de zèle. The library has existed for more than twenty years, and, at the present rate, probably another ten or fifteen will pass before it is provided with a complete list of books. Is this delay in the interests of readers? The volumes added during the time in which the printing has "dragged its slow length along" will be numerous enough to demand a supplement, and the catalogue will necessarily be always much behind the accessions. To give an instance of the abundance of detail more than three pages are devoted to the contents of Walter Savage Landor's works. Eight volumes—three quarto pages!—a glance over the books themselves would just as readily convey the information. A reference library so rich and important demands a good catalogue, and, except for its over elaboration, it is pleasing to recognize the many excellent features of the Wigan catalogue.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Messrs. George Newnes announce a new work on China to be completed in several sixpenny weekly parts. The work will depict China as it is to-day, and give photographs of the Chinese leaders as well as of the commanders of the British and Allied Forces, and of scenes in Peking and Hong-Kong, Shanghai, &c. There will also be a concise history of the present revolution in China, with a map.

Mr. Walter Scott's announcement of a reissue of his series of translations of Ibsen's Prose Dramas may serve as a reminder how definite a hold Ibsen, about whom Professor Herford writes in another column, has now got on English readers. Nor is England before, but rather behind, the rest of literary Europe in the matter. There has been the usual battle "with confused noise" between the Ibsenites and anti-Ibsenites, but the upshot is that, for the time at all events, Ibsen is part of the stock intellectual furniture of contemporary Europe. The result is remarkable when it is considered how few writers are really widely read and familiar in translations. The ancient classics must be left out of consideration because they have been the text-books of European education. There is Shakespeare, of course, but Molière, in spite of a few too hackneyed quotations, has never been familiar in English. Besides Shakespeare, the other possible English instances that occur to one are Byron and Scott and Dickens. Of the French writers Rabelais, Montaigne, Hugo, and Dumas are world classics. The Spanish Don Quixote is another instance. Goethe's "Faust" is perhaps an instance, though the Faust of popular knowledge is the Faust of opera, and that is really not Goethe's "Faust." Dante has now established this position, and Tasso and Ariosto once enjoyed it. Whether Ibsen will hold Dante's position when he is of Dante's antiquity is another question. Mr. Archer is revising the translations for the reissue and will contribute an introduction to the plays. Each play will have a volume to itself.

Although in the course of his career, Mr. Leonard Courtney has written extensively for the Press, the little volume on the English Constitution, which he has in hand for Messrs. Dent's "Temple Cyclopædic Primers," is, we believe, his first book in the strict sense of the term. This honour should properly have fallen to another work. About twenty years ago the announcement was made that Mr. Courtney had in preparation a monograph on Adam Smith for the "English Men of Letters" Series. As it has never appeared we suppose it must be relegated to the ever-lengthening list of books projected but never written.

Mr. Courtney, however, is not the only member of the present House of Commons who has thus disappointed the student's expectations. The like default is to be imputed to the leader of the House, Mr. A. J. Balfour, who, also about twenty years ago, was stated to have in preparation a volume on Mill for Messrs. Blackwood's series of "Philosophical Classics," but it, too, has never appeared, and we suppose never will. A complete catalogue of such "books" would be interesting.

Messrs. Macmillan announce an "edition de luxe" of Pater's works, similar in style to the Tennyson, Lamb, and Kipling published by the same house. The current editions of the works were uniform and satisfactory, but this additional honour is well deserved, and is quite appropriate. Not that with Pater form is everything. The heresy still seems to obtain that Pater is to be read for his manner and not for his matter. The manner, about which he took infinite pains, was not faultless; and his trick of long clauses in parentheses and apposition grew on him, partly from an almost painfully conscientious effort to limit and qualify his propositions to the point of personal psychological accuracy. Nevertheless, his style at his best (and the rhetorical passages, which alone Mr. Stephen Gwynn admires, were not quite his best) was curiously well adapted to convey his delicate æsthetic impressions and subtle interpretative ideas. But always, or nearly always, behind the style there was knowledge and thought—"fundamental brain work"; and Mr. Mallock, whose caricature in the "New Republic" in spite of its one-sided cleverness was a cruel libel, was at least right in selecting Pater as one of the distinct influences of his epoch. Pater's readers may not have been numerous, but they influenced a wider circle. Writing on subjects in which scholarship has recently made rapid advances, Pater did not escape mistakes. With Shelley he still accepted the Medusa of the Uffizi for a genuine work of Leonardo, and he based much of his fine reading of the lessons of Giorgione upon a picture now generally held to be an early Titian. But it is possible to make too much of new ascriptions in art. Scholarship cumbered with much serving sometimes misses a gift more needful. In the coming edition "Gaston Latour" will be included in the volume of "Imaginary Portraits." The edition will be limited to 775 copies, 250 of which have been subscribed for an American house. The first volume—there will be eight in all—will appear in September, and the publication will continue at the rate of one volume a month in the following order:—Vol. I., "Studies in the History of the Renaissance"; II. and III., "Marius the Epicurean"; IV., "Imaginary Portraits and Gaston de Latour"; V., "Appreciations"; VI., "Plato and Platonism"; VII., "Greek Studies"; VIII., "Miscellaneous Studies."

"White" and "Selborne" will ever be profitable names to conjure with. The first classic of its kind, it is still being constantly reprinted, notwithstanding the fact that it has already appeared in more editions than any other book on natural history. At the present moment, besides the second volume of Dr. Bowdler Sharpe's library edition (due in September), we are receiving the work as one of the volumes of Macmillan's Library of English Classics, reprinted, as stated in Literature last week, from the text of the original edition. Messrs. Constable have also promised to publish in full the daily diary kept by White for more than twenty-five years; and now Mr. Murray announces a life of the naturalist by the present head of the White family, Mr. Rashleigh Holt-White. The biography will include much unpublished matter in the shape of letters, journals, and other documents in the possession of the family, and a journal kept during a visit to Selborne in the summer of 1763, by one of the "Miss Batties," to whom the verses on "Selborne Hanger—a Winterpiece" were addressed by Gilbert White in the autumn of that year.

Sociologists have now at their disposal the third annual volume entitled "L'Année Sociologique," which Professor Durkheim, of Bordeaux, assisted by Professors Ratzel, of Leipzig, Sigel, of Versoix, Steinmetz, of Utrecht, Lapie, of Rennes, Levy, of Aix, &c., edits regularly for M. Alcan. The work represents the best critical product of Europe in this particular sphere. The "Année Sociologique" is divided into two divisions. The first part contains original memoirs by specialists. Thus this year's volume includes three memoirs—one by the geographer Herr Ratzel, on the relations of the soil with society, family, and the State; a second by M. Richard, on the connexion between social crises and criminality; and a third, by M. Steinmetz, on the classification of social types. In the second portion of this work we have a critical bibliography of all the important sociological books of the year.

Mr. Murray is evidently sanguine as to the prospects of the book trade. His new list of forthcoming works is, perhaps, the most important that he has ever issued at this time of year. South Africa is represented by only one item, but the prominent translation of Yves Guyot's "Boer Politics: An Answer to Some Pro-Boer Statements, based on Facts and Documents," marks an interesting development of the literature of the war. We have had pamphlets by Swiss champions of England's policy; now we have a benediction by the editor of Le Siècle. The translation will be ready early next month. Another Imperialist book is "The Growth of the Empire," and is written by A. W. Jose. Two books about Afghanistan are also included in Mr. Murray's list, both by writers who have been intimately associated with the Ameer. "The Constitution and Laws of Afghanistan" (to be published next month) is by the Ameer's private Secretary of State, Mir Munshi, Sultan Mahammad Khan, barrister and advanced student at Christ's College, Cambridge. The other book is a study of Afghan life in story form entitled "A Vizier's Daughter," by Lillias Hamilton, M.D., for several years medical adviser to the Ameer. It is no secret that the Ameer was dangerously ill when Miss Hamilton was sent for, and she virtually took her life in her hand when she journeyed to Kabul. Every character in the story is said to be drawn from life, and, as Dr. Hamilton explains in her preface, "should, therefore, so far as it goes, give an accurate description of one phase at any rate of Afghan life."

Since the completion of his history of the Hudson Bay Company, Mr. Beckles Willson has been engaged upon a somewhat similar work dealing with its great Oriental rival, the East India Company. Much hitherto unused material has been placed in Mr. Willson's hands; and the letters and diaries of the Company's servants will be largely drawn upon. "The period of the first hundred years in the life of the Company," says Mr. Cawston, in his review of the Old Chartered Companies, "is generally neglected, or dealt with in a very summary way, by Indian historians, so that no clear idea is conveyed to the reader of the early growth and development of this great association." This omission Mr. Willson undertakes to rectify. It is hoped that Lord Curzon of Kedleston will contribute an introduction.

Messrs. Longmans announce a number of important new books and new editions. An eighth and cheaper and revised edition of Canon MacColl's volume on "The Reformation Settlement" is in preparation. Sir Wm. Harcourt's introductory letter has been omitted, but two additional chapters have been added, one containing an exhaustive examination of the Lambeth decisions on Incense and Reservation, and of Mr. Dibdin's speeches, the other a reply to the criticism of Professor Maitland in the Fortnightly Review of last December. "The Things Beyond the Tomb, in a Catholic Light," by the Rev. T. H. Passmore, "Religion, a Plain Essay," by R. Russell, and "Holy Matrimony," by Canon Knox Little, are among the other theological announcements. Three biographies are included in the list—"Sir James Nicholas Douglass," formerly engineer-in-chief to the Trinity House, by Thomas Williams; "James Martineau," by A. W. Williams, and "Father Goreh," by the Rev. Richard Meux Benson. There will be volumes on "Sport and Travel, East and West," by Mr. F. C. Selous, and "The Forward Policy, and its Results," by Mr. Richard Bosworth Smith, C.I.E., who gives his experiences of thirty-five years' work as Commissioner and Political Agent among the tribes on our North-West Frontier of India. Messrs. Longmans also have in the press a new and cheaper edition of the Life of Queen Victoria, by the Queen's librarian, Mr. Richard Holmes, with a supplementary chapter bringing the narrative to her Majesty's recent visit to Ireland.

The chaplain of Greenwich Hospital and of the Royal Hospital School, the Rev. G. Goodenough, R.N., has written a volume on "The Handy Man Afloat and Ashore," which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish in the autumn. Besides describing the life of our marines and bluejackets the book includes naval yarns and songs, ancient and modern. The same publisher has a work in hand on "The Canadian Contingent," written by W. Sanford Evans. This book shows the sacrifices which Canada is making in the cause of Empire (only this week the son of the Canadian Minister of Defence was killed in action), and deals with the recruiting and despatching of the soldiers to the front, the distinguished services of the contingent in the field, and the effect of the war in Canada.

Two important travel books are also announced by Mr. Unwin. One is an account of two seasons passed "In the Ice World of Himalaya," by Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman, two adventurous travellers who are already known by their books on Algiers and Spain. Mrs. Bullock Workman, who is said to be the first woman to undertake a long mountaineering expedition in high Asia, made three "pioneer world record" ascents of peaks varying from 18,600 to 21,000 feet in height. The second book "Among the Berbers of Algeria," by Anthony Wilkin, records and illustrates the wanderings of two anthropologists among the Berber tribes of modern Algeria—the Chawia and the Kabyles. The purely scientific results of the journey are to be published elsewhere, but the life of the Berbers, their arts and crafts, are described by Mr. Wilkin in the present volume. A few words have been added on the subject of the Algerian Jews and Anti-Semitism. Another author has written for Mr. Unwin a book on "The Jew in London," especially touching on recent immigrations from Eastern Europe, Germany, Poland, and Russia. The book will contain an introduction by Canon Barnett and a preface by Mr. James Bryce.

The new editor of the Argosy, Mr. Herbert Morrah, is improving that magazine. The summer number has a short and somewhat lurid sketch from the pen of the late Mr. Stephen Crane, a paper by Mr. George Gissing, an illustrated article on Siena by Mr. Augustus Hare, and other contributions of interest. In the future, pictures and drawings will be reproduced in preference to photographs, and, being published by Messrs. Allen, the Argosy should do well in the matter of illustration.

Messrs. Putnam have a book coming out shortly entitled "The Representative Significance of Form; An Essay in Comparative Æsthetics," by George Lansing Raymond, Professor of Æsthetics in Princetown University. Professor Raymond is the author of several volumes on art subjects, including "Art in Theory," and "Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture as Representative Arts." His new book is illustrated with quotations from poetry and references to masterpieces in all the other arts.

FICTION.—Mr. Heinemann is publishing a volume of stories by General Baden-Powell, entitled "Sport in War." The stories appeared originally in the Badminton Magazine. The General is his own illustrator.

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. are publishing the new novel by Anna Katharine Green (Mrs. Charles Rohlfs), entitled "Agatha Webb," which Messrs. Putnams recently brought out in America. It is worth noting that there is still a steady demand for Mrs. Rohlfs' "Leavenworth Case"—though hundreds of other detective stories must have been published since it originally appeared in 1878—and the Putnams are preparing a special edition, from new plates, bringing the total number printed up to one hundred thousand. Two other novels are now being published by Messrs. Ward, Lock—"A Prince of Swindlers," by Guy Boothby, and "Between Two Fires; a Story of the Boer War," both of which have appeared in serial form. Within the next month the same publishers will add Emerson's complete Prose Works to their Minerva Library, and "The Queen's Maries" to their uniform edition of Whyte-Melville's works. There will also be new novels by Florence Warden ("The Love that Lasts"), C. J. Wills ("The Dean's Apron," and Evelyn Everett-Green ("Monica"). "Monica" was published some ten or twelve years ago by Ward and Downey in three volumes, but it has been entirely revised and virtually amounts to a new novel in its present form.

Mr. Clement Scott is about to become an editor. It is announced that he is preparing a new weekly society paper, the first number of which is expected in September. Messrs. Greening will be the publishers.

Mr. Frank T. Addyman, of St. George's Hospital, has in hand for publication a volume on "Practical X-Ray Work," to be issued by Messrs. Scott, Greenwood, and Co.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Colonel Schiel, the well-known German officer of the Boer army, now an exile with Cronje at St. Helena, has written a book giving his experiences both as a Boer officer and a prisoner in British hands. Messrs. Methuen are his publishers.

* * * *

The announcement suggests all manner of interesting possibilities. Cronje's reminiscences would make a fascinating volume, and there must be many other Boer prisoners who have thrilling stories to tell. Colonel Schiel, it will be remembered, was captured at Elandslaagte in the first stage of the war, and has evidently written his book in the leisure moments snatched from his fruitless attempts to devise some means of escape. He was a lieutenant of Prussian hussars about thirty years, and quitted the service to seek employment in South Africa. The Transvaal Government engaged his services shortly after the London Convention was signed, and subsequently sent him to Berlin to learn the latest gunnery improvements, buy artillery, and draw plans for forts. The results of that mission have been severely felt by us in the present campaign.

Visitors to the Lake District have now a fresh place of pilgrimage provided for them in the Ruskin Exhibition at Coniston. Both the artistic and the literary sides of the master's career are well represented there. Among the books are his first published writing in London's Magazine of Natural History, 1831; his first published poem, 1835; his Newdigate prize poem; first editions of "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," "The Stones of Venice," "Modern Painters," "Time and Tide," and "Elements of Drawing"; and there are also the manuscripts of some of his unpublished writings, a Greek Psalter of 1396, which Ruskin annotated, the original MS. of Sir Walter Scott's "The Black Dwarf," and a presentation copy of the first edition of Rogers' "Italy." The exhibition will be interesting to all, and useful to students of Ruskiniana, as all the relics are trustworthily dated.

Once again the cry of "Ireland for the Irish" has arisen and a new weekly review, to be called the Leader, is to appear in Dublin on Saturday, 1st September, having for its aim "the de-Anglicization of Ireland." Every newspaper in Ireland is avowedly political, being either Nationalist or Unionist; but the Leader is to preach the doctrine that out of politics no good can come for Ireland. "It will face facts as they are, however humiliating; and the actual Ireland, and not the Ireland of dreamers and romancers, will be always kept in view. Though convinced that no real Ireland can exist until Irish is reinstated as the national language, this review, being practical, will be almost wholly written in English, for the promoters recognise the fact that Ireland has allowed herself to become almost completely English, and must proceed from what is to what ought to be." The editor is to be Mr. D. P. Moran, a journalist who, during the past two years, has been contributing to the New Ireland Review a series of scathing attacks on phases of the nationalist agitation, the Irish literary movement, the Irish theatre, and what is called "the Celtic note" in Irish literature, all of which he thinks are huge shams. The price of the Leader will be one penny.

* * * *

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Tree proposes, like Salvini, to represent Othello not as a black Moor, but as a copper-coloured Moor. That this was not Shakespeare's intention seems clear from the text. "I am black," says Othello himself: and another personage in the play speaks derisively of his "thick lips." Against a "black man," however, there is a prejudice, as was made abundantly clear on the memorable occasion when Lord Salisbury applied the words to a fellow-citizen of Parsee origin.

* * * *

The announcements made by Mr. Tree on Saturday night as to his future plans at Her Majesty's Theatre contained a surprise. This was the fact that he had just purchased a poetic play by Mr. Stephen Phillips. It is called The King of the Jews, and the King in question is Herod the Great. The subject offers material for many tragedies. Which one of the dark episodes of the Idumean tyrant has Mr. Phillips chosen? In all probability that which ended in the death of the beautiful Mariamne. Soon after he married Mariamne, Herod slew her brother, fearing his popularity. For this he was summoned, through the efforts of the young man's mother, aided by Cleopatra, to appear before Antony. Before he started on his journey he committed Mariamne to the charge of a trusted friend, ordering that, if any evil fate befel himself, she should also be put to death. He came back safely, but shortly afterwards he had to visit Antony once more, and made the same arrangement. This time Mariamne heard of his savage injunction, and on his return she taxed him with cruelty and declared her hatred of him. Herod, beside himself with rage, ordered her to be killed. The shock was great that his mind lost its balance. Byron in one of his "Hebrew melodies" made Herod lament for Mariamne.

> Oh! Mariamne! now for thee
> The heart for which thou bleed'st is bleeding;
> Revenge is lost in agony
> And wild remorse to rage succeeding.

Herod's relations with Rome might also furnish a drama of stirring possibilities; the crafty manner in which he played with the Roman generals—Cæsar, Antony, Augustus, were each his good friends—the contrast between the outward success of his life and the inward remorse of his old age. Mr. Phillips has certainly selected a fine protagonist for his tragedy. The only wonder is that no great play has ever been written upon Herod's career. Salome was a remarkable effort of imagination, but hardly a great drama. Let us hope we shall not have to wait as long for The King of the Jews as we seem likely to wait for Paolo and Francesca.

It appears that the booksellers are memorialising the publishers in the hope of getting more books published at net prices. Their point is that, in the case of net books, they can make a profit by ordering a single copy at a time, whereas in the case of other books their profit is only appreciable when they are able to pay for twelve and get thirteen. Whether this argument will appeal to the publishers remains to be seen. They may reasonably hold that, as the bookseller is under no statutory or other obligation to allow his customers twenty-five per cent. discount on his goods, his business is so to fix his prices that profit will result; and we believe that this is how a good many publishers do argue. On the face of it there certainly does not seem to be any reason to expect that enduring advantage will result from interference with the competitive tendencies of human nature in the book trade any more than in the trade in bicycles, or boots, or patent medicines, or any other commodities.

An appreciation of Samuel Richardson written on the actual day of his death, and evidently by a friend, possesses real interest. On the opening leaves of a copy of the first of the seven volumes which form the editio princeps of "Clarissa," the following unpublished note appears. It is in the handwriting of a man, and suggests, one is bound to confess, that Richardson, as here represented, might well be stuffed and canonized because his good qualities have no complementary shadows. It was Paine who held that Sir Charles Grandison, with his wearisome superiorities, should be so lifted out of the human pale.

> July 4, 1761. This morning died in the 72nd year of his age, at his house in Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, Mr. Samuel Richardson, an eminent printer, and the celebrated author of the Histories of Pamela, Clarissa, and Sir Charles Grandison—as these excellent Performances, which do honour to our country, will be a lasting proof of his original, extensive, and lively genius: so many of his friends and acquaintances, among whom are some of the most reputable characters of the age, will deeply regret his loss and long remember him for the amiable and engaging good qualities by which his private life was adorned. Indefatigable in business, his unwearied application found means to perform in the literary way what might well be supposed to be the sole employment of his life; and amidst the cares of providing for a numerous family his humane and compassionate disposition was constantly displayed in various acts of benevolence and uncommon generosity. Having been afflicted with a nervous disorder, he was obliged to live not only with temperance but abstemiously; yet did not the infirm state of his health, which was such as commonly incapacitates the sufferer from going through the ordinary duties of his life, in the least abate the flow of his genius, the liveliness of his fancy, or the ardour of his industry—a rare example how much may be performed by a single person when a large share of natural sagacity, joined to an active, well-disposed mind, is exerted to the utmost.

When allowance be made for the formal phraseology of the day, the sincerity of the writer cannot be questioned. One of the quaintest touches is the assurance that the novelist had as friend or acquaintance some of the most "reputable characters" of his day; its very superfluity is its charm.

By the way, Richardson is commonly held to have died, not in Salisbury Court, but in Parson's Green, whither he removed from North End in 1755. Can it be that his biographers are in error, and that the stroke of apoplexy to which he succumbed found him in Salisbury Court, in the house of which years before Mrs. Richardson had disapproved? A person writing on the day of his death would not be likely to confuse the vicinity of Fleet Street with Parson's Green, then practically a country place. Those who visit on Sunday afternoons the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones' studio at North End may be reminded that in a little summer-house or grotto in the middle of the garden, Richardson wrote much of "Pamela," "Clarissa," and "Sir Charles Grandison." It was here "he lived in a kind of flower-garden of ladies," and after his death Mrs. Barbauld kissed the ink horn in which the novelist was wont to dip his pen.

If it be true that we are to see further journals of Marie Bashkirtseff, lovers of the morbid may look forward to some interesting pages in the autumn. This neurotic young woman's diaries caused a sensation among all kinds of people when they appeared some ten years ago. Mr. Gladstone was drawn into discussing them, and Marie Bashkirtseff at once became a decadent classic. Her egoism had a certain fascination about it, and the pathos of her brilliant young life, cut short by consumption, added perhaps a sentimental interest to her views of the world and art and her place in both. The new journals are said to be those of her last year, and to include a romantic correspondence which she kept up with Guy de Maupassant.

A setting of Milton's "Blest Pair of Sirens" is one of the most popular compositions of the new Professor of Music at Oxford, and no one is more enamoured of these two sirens, literature and song, than the Professor himself. His "Evolution of the Art of Music" ranks high in musical literature, and he was an assiduous contributor to Grove's Dictionary. Poets, too, owe him a debt of gratitude. He is a pioneer in the movement for showing greater respect for metre than the song-writers of old. As fine examples of his tact in finding the musical equivalents for verse rhythms we can recommend our more songful readers to attempt Sir Hubert's setting of Tennyson's "The Poet," Suckling's "Why so pale and wan, fond lover," or the Anacreontic ode, "Fill me, boy, as deep a draught." It is natural that the Professor, who lays so much stress on the artistic fitness of music to its end, should have chosen "Style in Musical Art" for the subject of his inaugural lecture, which has reached us from the Clarendon Press. A musician, as he says, must keep rigidly to the form and character of the particular style of composition he has selected. The same holds good in literature. The writer who pens a lyric in the spirit of "Paradise Lost" is as demented as the composer who writes operatic music for the Church. Sir Hubert has an eye for style everywhere, even in nature—e.g., the style of an apple-tree, the style of an orange-tree—as different as an opera from a sonata. The poets of the "orange-tree" and the "apple-tree"!—what an opportunity for a critic weary of the "languorous South," the "virile North," and the other well-worn clichés of the historians of poetry!

It is not wholly to the credit of French publishers that Sienkiewicz's "Quo Vadis," so popular in all English-speaking countries, as well as in Germany and Italy, has only just appeared in Paris. But for the Revue Blanche and the Mercure de France most of the best that is thought and said outside of France would have little chance of appearing in a French dress. The French version of "Quo Vadis," which we owe to two Poles, is published by the Revue Blanche, and forms a volume of 645 pages, as bulky as the biggest of M. Zola's novels. The form and manner are not such as to recommend the book to the French. But it comes out so well advertised with reports of the prodigious figures representing the sale in other languages—1,000,000 copies in the United States, 40,000 in Italy, 150,000 in Germany—that the boulevard bookshops are noting a "run" on the book. The religious reviews, moreover, are now taking Sienkiewicz up. The Quinzaine publishes a curious study of American life by him, entitled "The Comedy of Errors," remarking that if this tale has never before been translated into French it has appeared in volapuk! It may be stated, by the way, that the popular subscription organized in Poland to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of Sienkiewicz's literary début has been so successful that he is to receive from his admirers the gift of an ancestral château belonging to his family, with an immense parkland surrounding it. This is the domain of Oblegorek at Kielce, where the novelist spent his childhood, and which passed out of his family during the reverses of fortune. The fête at Warsaw in the autumn, when the château will formally be offered to Sienkiewicz, will be in every sense of the word national.

The suggestion that Oliver Goldsmith was a "married citizen" and that some of his descendants are living in the United States is so persistently made from time to time that it becomes almost a matter of necessity to trace the origin of the legend. That Goldsmith was never married—at least not to the knowledge of his most intimate friends—is evident, since the Letters of Administration, to be seen at Somerset House, describe him as "Bachelor," and were granted to Maurice Goldsmith, "the natural and lawful brother and next-of-kin of the said deceased." Notwithstanding this word "Bachelor," it is stated and believed in many quarters even yet that one Mary Olivia Goldsmith, whose name is found in the parish books of Islington, was none other than the poet's daughter, and that she lived with him in the turret of Canonbury-house when he went there to lodge in 1767.

* * * *

This, however, is merely an incident affecting the story and not the origin of it. In 1834 one Oliver Goldsmith published at St. John, New Brunswick, a small volume of verse called "The Rising Village, and other Poems," a copy of which was sold the other day in a "parcel" by auction in London. This Oliver Goldsmith used to say that he was related to his greater namesake, and so it happens that whenever the book appears in a dealer's catalogue the author is invariably described as "Goldsmith (Oliver, a descendant of the author of 'The Deserted Village')." It was the publication of this book, combined with its author's assertion at the time, that gave currency to an improbable, if not impossible, story, and the booksellers' "common form" of description has perpetuated it to our own day.

Messrs. Sotheby's sale last week included some good copies of notable English books, the principal being a long Shakespeare series, comprising the Second Folio, a very poor copy—£31; the Third Folio, imperfect—£20 10s.; the Fourth Folio, a fine copy in excellent condition—£18 10s.; and the rare quartos, Love's Labour's Lost, 1631—£41; Pericles, 1635—£21 10s.; Romeo and Juliet, 1637—£30; Henry the Fourth, 1639—£20 10s.; Othello, 1655—£20. Johnson.—"The Vanity of Human Wishes," first edition, in original paper covers—£16 5s.; "Dictionary of the English Language," first edition, in exceptionally fine condition—£13. Spenser.—"The Faerie Queene," first three books, 1590, [illegible] copy—£26. Turberville—"Epitaphs, Epigrams," &c., 1570—£10. Wordsworth.—"Lyrical Ballads," first edition, 1798, [illegible]—£4. Prior.—"Poems on Several Occasions," 1707—£17 10s. Scott.—"The Cenci," first edition, presentation copy—£11; "St. Irvyne," first edition—£10 5s. Tennyson.—"[illegible]," the privately-printed edition of 1887—£20. Swinburne.—"Atalanta in Calydon," first edition—£2 18s. Stevenson.—Original MS. of "The Body Snatcher"—£11 10s. FitzGerald.—"Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam," the rare 1859 edition—£[illegible], and a presentation copy of the Kelmscott "Chaucer"—£72.

The Irish Language.

There is something pathetically naïve, if not absolutely disingenuous, in the outcry raised by Irish patriots in the House of Commons and [illegible] letters in the columns of The Times for the organized teaching of the Erse language in Irish schools. That their clamour represents any deeply felt desire on the part of the Irish people is incredible, for the number of them who know more than a few words of Irish is very small and is steadily diminishing, and the natural desire of the average man—to say nothing of the average boy—is not to transform his educational curriculum into an obstacle race. Nor can the talk be believed to express any really profound sentiment in the breasts of the agitators. Otherwise, Mr. George Moore, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and those who think with them, would have taken the trouble to learn the language themselves instead of seeking a vicarious satisfaction by trying to compel others to do so. The sentiment, in short, which keeps alive such languages as Flemish, Wallon, Welsh, and Breton does not exist in the case of Erse; and the arguments for preserving it artificially by Act of Parliament are the purely baneful arguments of literary men who have nothing in common with the unfortunate children who would have the trouble of passing examinations in a subject which would be of no practical use to them in after life. "Our desire," says Mr. Moore, "is to use English as a universal language and to save our own as a medium for some future literature." But, surely, Mr. Moore, whose books have sometimes circulated by tens of thousands, must sometimes feel the advantage of being able to express himself through a medium as nearly universal as possible, and does not always wish to be in the position of a painter exhibiting pictures to the colour-blind, or a musician playing to the deaf. The most that could conceivably be done by teaching Erse in Irish schools would be to give the language a vogue [illegible] to, but probably rather less than, that of Wallon, Flemish, Breton, or Welsh. And what is the literary position in the countries in which these languages are spoken by the common people, and known by the educated, and could be used as literary media if necessary? The fact is that, with very few exceptions, they are not used as literary media at all; but that their men of letters prefer to interpret the genius of their nationality through the medium of some language that is more widely understood. The chief exception is furnished by the case of Mistral, the Provençal poet; but the case is balanced by that of Daudet, who, for no other reason than that he wrote in French, has done far more than Mistral to interpret Provence to the rest of the world. In the case of Flemish, French is also the language in which the greatest writers—such writers as Maeterlinck and the author of "Bruges-la-Morte"—have given literary expression to the characteristic genius of Flanders. The great Russians, again, write in French, and the great Welshmen write in English; and an even more startling instance of the tendency is found in the case of the great Dutch novelist, Maarten Maartens, who, though he writes of Dutch subjects and from the Dutch point of view, prefers the language of Milton to the language of Vondel, because, in that language he can address a wider audience. Whence it seems to follow that Mr. Moore's idea of teaching the Irish language in the National Schools in order that works of genius may be written in it is even more chimerical than most of the ideas that Mr. Moore propounds from time to time.

Personal Views.

THE MODERN NOVEL.

No other artistic or would-be artistic product gets such scant courtesy of treatment as the novel. We go to a play and give it our attention, without any further distraction than the interludes; and even these we spend largely in discussion of the play. The author has not to contend with half-a-dozen conflicting atmospheres when he tries to impress us. He holds us to the end of his effort, and then, and not till then, abides by our verdict. The same with the musician. We hear the song through; we sit out the symphony to the end—the first in silence, for fear of offence, the second in comparative silence, for fear of detection as a person of poor taste, one who will "roar bestial loud complaints against the music of the spheres." But the novel, the work perhaps of patient years, the pitiful "sustained effort" that has taken a man's best energies out of him, and exhausted him as the bee is exhausted by putting forth its sting—how do we treat it? First of all, we read it with shame and apology and a sense of waste of time. We talk over its head of wars and rumours of wars, of gossip and of plans for the day. We leave it for hours at a time, just when its atmosphere was beginning to make itself felt. Some of us begin it at the end, which is like holding a picture upside down. Others break into it with a course of half-a-dozen rival books, calculated between them to kill its effect. Others avowedly take it as a sleeping-draught, avoiding it with their clear brain and insulting it by their fuddled one. And all these will give you their seathing opinion of it with all the grace in the world. Yet another class will read it attentively, devouringly, propping it against the milk-jug at breakfast, and the soup-tureen at dinner, never looking up from it until the last page; and then putting it down with a heart-felt "Well! Of all the dreary twaddle I ever came across. . . . !"

Having put in a word for the most cruelly treated product of the age, I admit that it sometimes has uncommonly ludicrous features. First it was perhaps silly of our great-aunts to make Angelina as beautiful as the day, with golden hair down to her feet, though for my own part I liked it. It gave me a pleasing sense of what young decadent writers, I believe, call "volupey." It probably was foolish. But why, in the name of all that is funny, do we prefer Angelina nowadays so portentously repulsive? Thus:—"The dun hair lay in wisps, each side of her haggard face. The slightly gross lips protruded, showing the characteristic, uneven teeth. All her being suggested allurement. Oswald felt the strange, penetrating charm that she exhaled. It was palpable, like a vapour. He shuddered. . . ." And we shuddered with him—at first. Then we perceived the subtle flattery that lies in giving the reader a particularly loathsome young person to adore. It implies that his imagination is so powerful and ingenious that it needs no coarse, material aids. He will listen and reflect and swallow his loathing, and say, "I see what you mean."

When the golden-haired angel left the ordinary novel, the effusively manly hero left it too, and took refuge in the historical one. Ah, the historical one, what a visitation for sin it can be! How well we know its dialogue! This is the way it is done. First the author writes, "Do you know that Mrs. Brown, the draper's wife, has broken her arm?" Now, this will not do at all. But only put it "Wot ye that Mistress Brown, the mercer's lady, hath fractured a limb?" There you have it—historical!

Then the strength of the hero! The ease with which he picks up the five-foot-eight heroine "like an infant!" "She resisted a while, but then, methinks, it pleased her well to be thus held against my heart." The swordsmanship of him, when he disarms, one after another, a roomful of "the best blades in Europe!" Except in some half-a-dozen cases which do not need quoting, I give up the historical novel. It is only in its artless pages that the ferociously virile being is met with. In the casual novel of genuinely "modern" type the hero has more often the personnel of the average City clerk. He is anæmic, spectacled, round-shouldered. He appeals to every subtle sense and disdains the coalheaver's recommendation of brute force. The lady makes up for him. She is a modest and muscular type of young gentlemanhood. She is usually a little affronted at the notion of marriage with the hero, but regards him as a field for delicate experiment, finally leaving him a sadder and a wiser man, after marrying somebody else and beating him in a cricket match and the London Tripos. All of which shows a sound grasp of the tendency of the age.

There are sides to the modern novel which I have no room to touch on here. But the particular crimes alleged against it by veterans of both sexes, who read no fiction but popular biography and the newspapers, are all to be found to this day. Only you must look for them in the yearly output of certain men and women (more frequently the latter) who once delighted the world with the mild love-affairs of some preposterous but engaging young people, and go on, year after year, trading on an ancient "name," in pathetic oblivion of the facts that the marriage begins the misunderstandings now, instead of ending them; that Angelina should be a lecturer on biology and a little repulsive-looking, if she is to attract; that the feudal peasant, with his "the squire's little lady—bless her kind heart! She never forgets old Giles," has given place to the slightly indelicate humorous rustic as comic relief—and many other facts. In short, these writers can hardly be called "modern" at all.

To every age its own folly and a little more accuracy—especially in criticism.

ALICE HERBERT.

WALTER PATER.

At last we are to have an édition de luxe of Walter Pater. The six years which have passed since his too early death have not been careful of his memory. He stands outside the ordinary categories of classification. A critic, yes; but not in the deliberate, didactic fashion in which Matthew Arnold instructed the children of this world in the counsels of the children of light. He forbore Arnold's privilege of judgment. He was less judge than interpreter. His was the faculty of disengaging the evidence till the witnesses expressed themselves in the logical order of their thought. He brought elusive facts to utterance, labouring at them, detail by detail, point after point. One after another they emerged from the mists, shining in their divers colours, but harmoniously informed with the common light that reveals them.

It follows that Pater can never be a popular critic. The current jargon of criticism offended his fastidious taste. His vocabulary was full of curiously arresting words, terms which stretch into the distance, and awake a feeling of perspective. He mixed his palette with half-shades, a purple at once red and blue, a grey in preference to black or white, a primrose neither green nor yellow. And in token of this suspended judgment and subtle extension of phrase, Pater especially chose for study the periods indicating transition. The dawn of Christianity in Pagan Rome, the birth of Giordano Bruno in medieval Europe, the speculations of Plato—so Attic, yet so Pauline—the links between classicism and romanticism, these mark the affinities of Pater's mind, which dwelt in less arduous hours on kindred tasks of interpretation—the poems of Coleridge or Rossetti, the myths of Dionysus or Demeter.

Pater, then, is hard to read. Page after page may be turned, and nothing gained by the exercise. He has "atmosphere"—that not definable quantity which Macaulay, for instance, eliminated from his model tenements kind of style—each sentence a compact receptacle for the sentiment it contained. Pater was not compact. The rich cadence of his meaning swells through his pages like valse-music, till the reader is mazed with melody, and loses the time in the tune. Yet this sensitive faculty for the shifting hues of the thing seen, this power to express—or, rather, to impress—the shadows of the field and sea, as the sun and wind and clouds pass over them, which Pater possessed so eminently, has dowered literature with a treasure-house of phrases. Well nigh a new language was coined by Pater in his careful selection of epithets. The "discreet and scrupulous simplicity" of Aurelius; the "wistful tolerance" of Montaigne; the "gracious unction" of medieval Latin psalmody; the "tumultuous richness" of Goethe's culture; the "great meekness of the graceful, wild creature, tamed at last," of Shakespeare's Richard II.; Lamb's readiness "to teach the little arts of happiness"; Coleridge, with his "passion for the absolute, his faintness, his broken memory, his intellectual disquiet"; Ronsard's poetry, in which things become at once "more deeply sensuous and more deeply ideal"; Wordsworth's "sudden passage from lowly thoughts and places to the majestic forms of philosophical imagination, the play of those forms over a world so different, enlarging so strangely the bounds of its humble churchyards, and breaking such a wild light on the graves of christened children"—there is an individuality, an unconventionality, in those descriptive passages which stamps Pater's criticism as unique. The critic's supreme function—to help us to read well—is fulfilled.

Add to this skilful impressionism Pater's use of imaginative language. We read of Gaston de Latour:

> In the sudden tremor of an aged voice, the handling of a forgotten toy, a childish drawing, in the tacit observance of a day, he became aware suddenly of the great stream of human tears falling always through the shadows of the world.

We are told of Botticelli that his character was the > result of a blending in him of a sympathy for humanity in its uncertain condition, its attractiveness, its investiture at rarer moments in a character of loveliness and energy, with his consciousness of the shadow upon it of the great things from which it shrinks.

Or, as a last random illustration, take this sentence from the essay on Sir Thomas Browne—

> The really stirring poetry of science is not in guesses or facile divinations about it, but in its large ascertained truths—the order of infinite space, the slow methods and vast results of infinite time.

Is there not in these phrases a trace of what Pater defined as the perfection of lyrical style, depending, in part, on "a certain suppression or vagueness of mere subject, so that the meaning reaches us through ways not distinctly traceable by the understanding"?

Pater, the imaginative impressionist, has many explicit precepts for the guidance of inquirers. A few of them may be collected here:—

> To discriminate schools of art, of literature, is, of course, part of the obvious business of literary criticism; but . . . in truth, the legitimate contention is, not of one age or school of literary art against another, but of all successive schools alike against the stupidity which is dead to the substance, and the vulgarity which is dead to the form.

> The basis of all artistic genius lies in the power of conceiving humanity in a new and striking way, of putting a happy world of its own creation in place of the meaner world of our common days . . . selecting, transposing, recombining the images it transmits.

> Not to discriminate every moment some passionate attitude in those about us is, in this short day of frost and sun, to sleep before evening.

This review of Pater's claims on our gratitude may be concluded by a brief examination of his method. His essay on Wordsworth, in the "Appreciations," will be found best suited to this purpose. Pater opens by mentioning Wordsworth's essential distinction between Fancy and Imagination, but, discarding the metaphysical cant, he identifies it directly with the distinction "between higher and lower moods of intensity in the poet's perception of his subject, and in his concentrating of himself upon his work." A couple of pages are then devoted to "the duality between higher and lower moods, and the work done in them," of which Wordsworth was so shining an example. Thus Pater struck on the very threshold of his task the epitome of Wordsworth's influence. Those who undergo it, he tells us, "are like people who have passed through some initiation, a disciplina arcani, by submitting to which they become constantly able to distinguish in art, speech, feeling, manners that which is organic, animated, expressive from that which is only derivative, conventional, inexpressive." Next come the subtleties of Wordsworth's mind and art. There was in his character, we are told, in the flawless Pateresque style, "a certain contentment, a sort of inborn religious placidity," which, combined with the "somewhat monotonous spaces" of his life to nurture a "quite unusual sensibility, really innate in him, to the sights and sounds of the natural world—the flower and its shadow on the stone, the cuckoo and its echo." Through nature, the critic went on, Wordsworth approached the spectacle of human life: "by raising nature to the level of human thought, he gives it power and expression; he subdues man to the level of nature, and gives him thereby a certain breadth, and coolness, and solemnity." The last six words will again be recognised as, characteristically, Pater's. They are pictorial, allusive, scholarly, recalling to a full mind the greeting pleasances of literature from Virgil's "latis otia fundis" to Tennyson's "English home . . . a haunt of ancient peace." Pater's method is of no use for "cram." His students must bring to their task a sympathetic comprehension. Like the disciples of Socrates they must be willing την λογικωτέραν πορεύεσθαι, to take the longer road in the pursuit of the idea. And, taking it under Pater's guidance, we reach the tablelands of purpose. Who that has not stood on the critics' Pisgah could have written the following words:

> Contemplation—impassioned contemplation—that is with Wordsworth the end in itself, the perfect end. We see the majority of mankind going most often to definite ends, lower or higher ends, as their own instincts may determine. . . . Meantime . . . they move too often with something of a sad countenance . . . it being possible for people, in the pursuit of even great ends, to become themselves thin and impoverished in spirit and temper, thus diminishing the sum of perfection in the world, at its very sources. . . . Against this predominance of machinery in our existence, Wordsworth's poetry . . . is a continued protest. Justify rather the end by the means, it seems to say; whatever may become of the fruit, make sure of the flowers and the leaves. . . . That the end of life is not action but contemplation, being as distinct from doing, a certain disposition of the mind, is, in some shape or other, the principle of all the higher morality. . . . To treat life in the spirit of art is to make life a thing in which means and ends are identified; to encourage such treatment, the true moral significance of art and poetry.

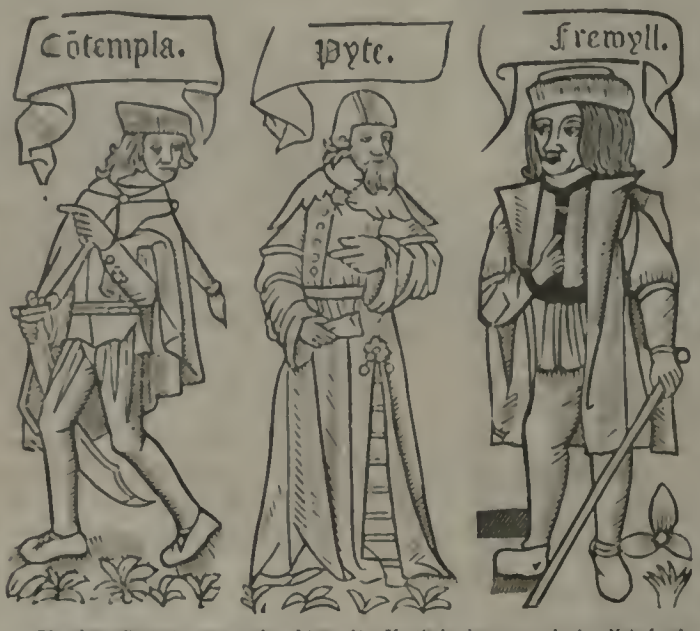
Five-and-twenty years or more have passed since the first appearance of this essay. Wordsworth has been edited, reviewed, epitomized, patronized, and taught. Studies as illuminating as M. Legouis' volume on the "Prelude," labours as tireless as Mr. Knight's, have been expended on the poet. Yet, I venture to doubt, writing from no mean acquaintance with the literature of the subject, if anything quite as subtle and complete has been published as this holiday task of the Brasenose recluse.

The "Wordsworth" is but one essay in a volume of eleven "Appreciations"; the "Appreciations" but one of five volumes of equally valuable criticism, and to these are to be added the two romances of the beginning and the end of Pater's life. Surely it is now full time that the welcome édition de luxe should be followed by a handy volume of selections.

LAURIE MAGNUS.

THE STORY OF THE CLARENDON PRESS.

A SERVICE has been rendered to the student of typography, as well as to Oxford University, by Mr. Horace Hart's industrious researches among the records of the Clarendon Press, and the compilation of his catalogue of the ancient printing material belonging to that institution. When, in 1883, Mr. Hart was appointed printer to the University—or architypographus, as he would have been called in earlier days—he found the old types, matrices, and punches resting from their labours in a melancholy condition of rust and confusion. He took them in hand, arranged, classified, and cleansed every part, and adopted means to preserve them from further damage, the result being that the most interesting typographical collection we possess is now kept in a manner worthy alike of the University and the oldest foundry of which the country can boast. To put the collection in order much research was necessary and some record desirable. "The record having been made," writes Mr. Hart, "it seemed a pity to leave it in a rough state, partly manuscript and partly print"; and so, in the end, he prepared a volume of "Notes on a Century of Typography at the University Press, Oxford, 1693-1794," which he has just produced with annotations and appendixes. In many cases the old types themselves have been used to reproduce the Press "Specimens" issued during the period under review, and a rare assortment of devices and ornaments, ancient music types and initial letters, is included among the illustrations. The reason why the "Century of Oxford Printing" begins at 1693 and ends at 1794 is that no printed Specimen was issued by the Oxford Press before the earlier, and none, apparently, after the later date. In those days, as in these (explains Mr. Hart in his prefatory notes), a printing house issued type specimens in order that authors might be able to choose suitable characters in which their works could be printed; while a type foundry issued impressions from types to show what characters it had to sell. The Oxford Press has been from early times both printing house and type foundry, but its specimens were probably printed for the first reason only.



The large illustration reproduced from Mr. Hart's book was made for Vol. I. of "The Origin of the English Drama," by Thomas Hawkins, printed at the Clarendon Press in 1773. In Hawkins volumes three full pages were printed from wood blocks; only two blocks remain in the Press to-day. They are copies of those found on the verso of the title of Wynkyn de Worde's edition of the play of Hyckescorner.

The Press began its work at Oxford, however, more than two centuries before the earliest date of Mr. Hart's record. The story is extremely interesting. Oxford, with a press from Cologne, was Caxton's first typographical rival in England, and, indeed, produced a book bearing a date, which, on the face of it, was printed nine years before Caxton's "Dictes of the Philosophers." The battle which has been waged about the date of the "1468" volume (the treatise of Tyrannius Rufinus on the Apostles' Creed, here ascribed to St. Jerome) is an oft-told tale, and has led to almost as many arguments as have been put forward in the older controversy as to whether printing was "invented" in Holland or Germany. The opinion of most authorities, including Bradshaw and Blades, is that 1468 is an error for 1478 (an X having dropped out of "MCCCCLXXVIII."). M. Madan, writing in 1895, sums up the position as follows:—

> Caxton, who began to print in England in 1477, nowhere claims to have introduced printing into England. Is it still conceivable that Oxford preceded Westminster by nine years? The answer is that it is still conceivable, but not probable. The ground has been slowly and surely giving way beneath the defenders of the Oxford date, in proportion to the advance of our knowledge of early printing, and all that can be said is that it has not yet entirely slipped away.

Caxton's Oxford rival did not trouble him long, for the Press in the University town suddenly ceased operations in 1486, about the same time that the printing by the mysterious schoolmaster at St. Alban's came to an end.

Leicester, Laud, and Fell.

Twenty-one years ensued and then, for a period of about fourteen months, printers from abroad were again at work at Oxford, though the fact is virtually ignored by the registers of the University. The suppression of the Oxford Press by Wolsey led to another long interval of inactivity; it was not until 1585 that the Press was permanently established. "Late in the reign of Elizabeth," writes Ingram in his "Memorials of Oxford," "the Earl of Leicester, being then Chancellor of the University, had the good sense and spirit to revive and reorganize its typography. Its sole expense, a new press, was erected; a fit person was specially appointed printer to the University; and in 1585 came forth [in Latin] the first fruits of the establishment, 'Moral Questions upon Aristotle's Ethics,' by John Case, Fellow of St. John's; dedicated, with great propriety, to the Chancellor." From that date the press was kept in constant work, and before the close of the sixteenth century Joseph Barnes, the "fit person" referred to, had published between seventy and eighty books, "many of them of high character and most of them respectable in their style of execution." The charter of privileges in 1632 gave the University direct control of the printing, but as yet there are few signs of actual academical interest or interference, and the various printers were still left to exercise their trade in hired buildings. The great patron of the Press at this period was Archbishop Laud, who was virtually the first to encourage the University to raise the establishment into a great national institution. With the downfall of Laud came the Rebellion, with its numbing influence upon learning; and the Oxford Press had some difficulty in holding its ground. Then Bishop Fell, the hero of the immortal epigram, came to the rescue, and, taking up the work begun by Laud, checked every attempt which was made by its rivals to reduce its importance. In the Civil Wars

Dr. Fell bore arms for the King in the garrison of Oxford, and, receiving ecclesiastical promotion after the Restoration, became Vice-Chancellor of the University in 1666. It was in 1668 that he presented some of the sets of types which, with the generous gifts of Junius, laid the foundation of the Oxford University Foundry as it exists to-day. Fell worked hard and gave large sums of money for the development of the Press, both in improving its mechanical resources and providing it with scholarly editions of classical and other works. The business prospered, and after being carried on for some years in the old House of Congregation in St. Mary's Church was removed to the floor of the Sheldonian, where it had its home until 1713.

Mr. Hart's Book.

This brings us to the period dealt with by Mr. Horace Hart in his "Century of Typography." It is well known that the earliest Oxford printing was executed from characters brought from Cologne, and when Fell and Junius were seeking for types in the seventeenth century they sent, according to Fell's own statement, to Germany, France, and Holland for them. By a happy discovery Mr. Hart is able to dispose of all conjectures as to where most of the Fell types were purchased. He has recently had his attention directed to a number of letters and other documents in the Rawlinson collection in the Bodleian Library bearing directly on the subject. For the most part the correspondence consists of letters written by Dr. Marshall, then preacher to the English merchants in Holland (afterwards Dean of Gloucester), whom Dr. Fell entrusted with a special commission to buy punches—or "punctions," as Marshall calls them—matrices, and type for the University. The letters are written to his "worthily-honoured" master, and bound up with them are certain drafts which appear to be rough outlines of Dr. Fell's own letters in reply. The correspondence describes Marshall's troubles with the Dutch punch-cutters and type-founders, and the Dean's efforts to induce a letter-founder and several compositors to come to Oxford. In one letter he declares that it it would hasten matters he "would take up with the Dutch height." This, as Mr. Hart observes, accounts for the un-English "height" of the Clarendon Press type, which has been a source of trouble ever since its introduction. Several letters to Samuel Clarke, the first Architypographus to the University, are added to illustrate the difficulties which Fell experienced regarding type bought in London. The punches and matrices remaining in the Oxford Type Foundry are for the most part kept in the original oak boxes, forty-six of which were "discreetly" repaired in 1891. Mr. Hart undertook a formidable task when he decided to put the whole collection of the foundry in order. He tells us that in addition to tracing, classifying, and arranging alphabetically (so far as was practicable) more than 7,000 matrices, all the corresponding punches still in existence have been identified by fitting them into the matrices. Everybody will echo Mr. Hart's sentiments in hoping that these relics of early Oxford benefactors, or survivals of University purchases in past centuries, "will never again be degraded by neglect to the deplorable condition from which they have at length been rescued." In all there are 7,632 matrices and 2,906 punches. What their original cost was is not known with certainty, but Dr. Fell gives some idea of the amount when he says that, between 1672 and 1679 the "imprimery" had been "furnisht at the expence of above four thousand pound."

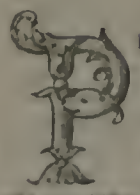
The Clarendon Buildings.



ONE OF SEVERAL SMALL BLEMISHES (SEE INITIALS C BUTCH BLOOMSBURY) WILL BE FOUND IN EARLY BOOKS AT THE PRESS

PERHAPS the most important chapter in the story of the Oxford Press begins with Clarendon's gift of the copyright of his "History of the Rebellion." It was mainly with the profits arising from the sale of this classic that the University was provided with the first building erected for the specific purpose of carrying on its printing business, under the name of the Clarendon Press. The removal from the Sheldonian took place in 1713, and the new printing house began its operations in October of that year. The first Clarendon Building, in Broad-street, was designed by Vanbrugh; everybody familiar with Oxford knows it by sight. Another period of stagnation settled upon the institution in the eighteenth century, and it was left to the administrative zeal and judgment of Sir William Blackstone to put fresh life into the work. The eighteenth century is little but progress and prosperity to record, and in 1830, the business increasing beyond the capacities of the Broad-street house, a move was made to the present fine building in Walton-street.

THE OLD CLARENDON PRESS

Oxford Bibles and India Paper.

The name of the Oxford Press is, of course, inseparably connected with the trade in Bibles. As most people are aware, the Revised Version is the joint property of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which vested £20,000 to the expenses of publication, but the copyrights of the Authorized Version and of the Book of Common Prayer are vested in the Crown, authority to print them in England being granted by charter to Oxford and Cambridge Universities and by licence to the Queen's printer. The statistics of the trade in Oxford Bibles alone are remarkable. The output now averages about a million complete copies a year, besides large numbers of New Testaments, separate portions, and Welsh Bibles. There is a shipment of between five and six tons every week to the United States, where privateering publishers show their appreciation of the Oxford edition by bringing out copies reproduced page by page by photo-lithography. A few weeks ago, however, the University obtained an injunction to prevent the publication of these pirated editions under the name of Oxford Bibles. So proud are the authorities of the accuracy of their printing that they give a guinea to the first person who points out a printer's error in any edition of the Authorized Version of the Oxford Bible. The bill for these errors only amounts to four or five guineas a year, though there are over seventy editions of the Oxford Bible altogether, and the mistakes are rarely more serious than a dropped letter. The archaisms, "bewray" and "entendeth," have involved world-wide correspondence with applicants who seek in vain for the guinea reward. The Oxford India paper has revolutionised the Bible and Prayer-book trade, and is the special pride of the Clarendon Press. The story of its discovery is just now of topical interest, as on August 21 the mysterious paper will be a quarter of a century old. Sixty odd years ago an Oxford graduate returned from India with a small fold of paper, remarkably thin, but at the same time opaque and tough. He presented the paper to the University Press, and a few Bibles, half the usual thickness, were printed from it. As much as £20 each was offered for them, but no copies were sold. One was presented to the Queen. Futile efforts were made to trace the paper to its source. Even Mr. Gladstone was asked if he could throw any light on the matter, and he suggested a search in Japan; but though a paper thin and tough enough was found there, it was too transparent to permit of printing on both sides. The search was gradually abandoned and the paper lost sight of until a copy of the book reached the hands of Mr. Frowde. This was in 1874; Mr. Frowde had only taken over the management of the London business of the Clarendon Press at the close of the preceding year; and experiments were at once started at the Wolvercote Mills, two miles away on the river from Oxford, with the object of manufacturing a similar paper. After several failures came success, and on August 25th, 1875, an edition of the Bible was published similar in every respect to the two dozen copies printed in 1842. A quarter of a million copies were sold within a few weeks. No workman at the Wolvercote Mills is allowed to understand more than one stage of the process of manufacture. The paper remains a mechanical mystery. The mills themselves, it should be added, have a history. They date back to the period of Dr. Fell, who encouraged the fitting up of the place by Mr. George Edwards, a "cutter in wood of the great letters, who engraved many other things made use of in the printing of books, and had a talent in maps, although done with his left hand." "Some of the best paper made in England is made at Wolvercote Mill," wrote Hearne, as far back as 1728; and its reputation stands higher than ever to-day.

THE WOLVERCOTE PAPER MILL.

A Self-Contained Institution.

Besides being the University Press and mindful of its dignity as such, the house is a vast business concern which easily succeeds in keeping itself abreast of the times. It rivals the Imprimerie Nationale of Paris and the Reichsdruckerei of Berlin, without having their support from Government. Apart from employing its own binders, engravers, and the like, and manufacturing its paper, the Oxford Press does its own ink-making, type-founding, electrotyping, lithographic, and all kinds of "fancy printing and bookbinding." In other words it makes its books from the raw material; and it prints them in something like sixty different tongues—each requiring a separate kind of type—without reckoning the countless languages and dialects for which Roman type serves. In London the publishing business is conducted by Mr. Frowde, who also controls the bindery in Aldersgate-street, where the skins of upwards of 100,000 animals are used every year to cover Oxford Bibles alone. To letter the backs of the volumes 400,000 sheets of gold-leaf are needed, and a much larger quantity is used in gilding the edges. Mr. Frowde was appointed "Publisher to the University" in 1880, when the Delegates of the Press transferred their classical and learned publications—before that date issued by Messrs. Macmillan—to their own warehouse in London. The following official note in the "Literary Year Book" is worth quoting:—"The curious in bibliographical matters are often struck by the three different imprints under which the different works of the Press appear: 'Oxford: Printed at the University Press,' 'London: Henry Frowde,' and 'London: Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press Warehouse,' and again, 'Oxford: At the Clarendon Press Warehouse.' The first imprint is that found on the title pages of Bibles, Prayer-books, and other works issued and authorized by the delegates; the second marks all such works (the 'Imitatio' for instance) issued by Mr. Frowde with the sanction but not necessarily with the authorization of the delegates; and the third comprises specially erudite works, such as Skeat's 'Etymological Dictionary'; Skeat's 'Chaucer'; the 'Oxford English Dictionary'; and the 'Sacred Books of the East,' edited by Max Müller, &c." At the last Paris Exhibition the Oxford Press received the Grand Prix, and on the present occasion it has three separate exhibits, besides sharing in the collective display made by the British Publishers' Association. Some of the bindings exhibited have cost as much as £60 each, and it has been announced that important purchases have been made by representatives of a considerable number of science and art museums to add to their collections.

The Delegates and the Dictionary.

The present delegates of the Press with their official descriptions are as follows:—Dr. Thomas Fowler, President of Corpus (Vice-Chancellor); Ingram Bywater, Student of Christ Church; Sir William Markby, D.C.L., Fellow of All Souls and Balliol; William Stubbs, D.D., Lord Bishop of Oxford; David B. Monro, Provost of Oriel; and F. York Powell, Fellow of Oriel (perpetual delegates); Henry P. Gerrans, Fellow of Worcester; William Sanday, D.D., Canon of Christ Church; John R. Magrath, D.D., Provost of Queen's; Charles L. Shadwell, D.C.L., Hon. Fellow of Oriel (appointed for seven years). The secretary is Mr. Charles Cannan, Trinity. It is to the lasting credit of the delegates that they publish, for the benefit of the language and literature of the country, many books which cannot possibly prove remunerative; where profits occur the surplus is contributed to the University chest for the general purposes of the University. The "New English Dictionary," the last volume of which Dr. Murray hopes to publish in 1908, is undoubtedly the greatest enterprise ever undertaken by the Clarendon Press; and, in conclusion, we cannot do better than quote the following passage from the leading article which The Times devoted to the Dictionary Dinner given at Oxford in 1897:

> Such a work could not, indeed, have been well undertaken by any private individual, however long his purse or however ardent his zeal. . . . But this is just the service which a great University can and, we think, ought to do for science and learning. It has the requisite prestige in the world of letters; it can command, as in this case it has commanded, the services of willing and qualified workers, who ask for little reward beyond the honour of taking part in a great work. And when it has also at command, as the University of Oxford has in the Clarendon Press, a highly-equipped and well-managed printing and publishing establishment, it is master of the situation. The liberal and enlightened management, with an eye to the best interests of learning as well as to commercial profit, that has now for many years marked the administration of the Clarendon Press, is signally illustrated by the encouragement given and the facilities provided for carrying out the work of compiling this great dictionary. . . . The apologists of Universities are entitled, we think, to point to such a work as the "Oxford English Dictionary" in answer to the question, What are you doing to encourage learning and research? . . . Such encouragement of solid labour and genuine research as the University can give by subsidizing the production of unremunerative works of permanent value may after all be, not perhaps the only, but at present the more excellent way.

THACKERAY AND THE STAGE.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

Mrs. Fiske, the American actress, has been playing Becky Sharp, and it is stated that there is some probability of Miss Marie Tempest following her example. Thackeray, so far, has not made the fortune of any theatrical managers. Mr. J. M. Barrie's one-act setting of "Vanity Fair" was produced some years ago, but is now forgotten. "Esmond" has been seen on the stage, and Mr. F. C. Burnand has put "Mr. Jeames de la Pluche" on the boards and a version of "The Rose and the Ring" ran for about a month at the Prince of Wales' some years ago. But the works of Thackeray, unlike those of Dickens, do not apparently lend themselves to this form of adaptation. Although the stage, with its environment, is not unfrequently introduced in his stories, Thackeray's dramatic instinct was not strongly developed, though he himself believed that proof would be found in his posthumous works that he could write tragedy. Dickens has to his credit some half-dozen plays (farcical in character), which met with a certain degree of success, while Thackeray's attempts in this direction were even more limited. The little one-act burlesque King Glumpus was reproduced in facsimile in 1898 by Mr. W. T. Spencer. Mr. Melville, in his life of Thackeray, records the discovery made by Mr. C. P. Johnson of a little sketch called Reading a Play, which appeared in the Britannia for May, 1841, and which was reproduced in 1891. Thackeray's only serious dramatic effort was The Wolves and the Lamb. A writer in these columns (June 4, 1898) records the interesting fact that on a particular occasion when, as a boy, he accompanied Thackeray and Herman C. Merivale to the Bower Saloon and other transpontine theatres, he expressed to Thackeray his surprise that he had never written a play, to which the Novelist replied that he had written one at the special request of Webster, who, after reading it, refused to have anything to do with it, and no other manager to whom he offered it would put it on the stage. The writer (Mr. Herbert A. Hill) imagined this play must have been the comedy of The Wolves and the Lamb, to which he refers as being an adaptation of "Lovel the Widower"; the late Dutton Cook, however, asserted that The Wolves and The Lamb was "the foundation and first cause" of the novel of "Lovel the Widower," in which case it resembles Dickens' unacted farce The Lamplighter, afterwards converted by him into "The Lamplighter's Story" for "The Pic Nic Papers." Dutton Cook, who refers to Thackeray's little comedy as the Novelist's "only contribution to the literature of the Stage," states that it was written presumably about the year 1851, and posthumously published; it contained allusions to the Crimean War and to Mrs. Gaskell's novel of "Ruth," then recently issued. The Wolves and the Lamb was several times played by amateurs in London. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that "Lovel the Widower" appeared as a serial in the first six numbers of the Cornhill Magazine, 1860.

While the adaptations of Thackeray's novels may be counted on the fingers of one hand, those of Dickens' are exceedingly numerous, the late Mr. W. R. Hughes' collection of Dickensiana including no less than fifty-seven. That Thackeray's interest in the Drama, if not so pronounced as that of his famous contemporary, was at least unmistakable is indicated not only by the numerous references to theatrical matters in his novels, but also by the fact that many of his drawings and caricatures bear upon the subject, while a number of dramatic criticisms came from his pen. His first attempt at independent authorship consisted of a series of eight lithographic plates, published in 1836 under the title of "Flore et Zephyr"—a mythological ballet; four years later he wrote a chapter on "French Drama and Melodrama" for the second volume of "The Paris Sketch Book," and in Punch, March 3, 1849, we discover a critical article by him on "Two or Three Theatres in Paris." Perhaps his most interesting essay in this direction is the paper in Fraser's Magazine, March, 1842, entitled "Dickens in France," where he unmercifully ridicules a French rendering of "Nicholas Nickleby" as performed at the Ambigu Theatre, Paris. It was the friendly tone adopted by Thackeray in his allusions here to Dickens and his novel that undoubtedly inspired the parenthetical portion of the inscription written by Dickens in the copy of "A Christmas Carol" presented by him to the author of "Vanity Fair," which reads as follows: "W. M. Thackeray, from Charles Dickens (whom he made very happy once a long way from home). Seventeenth December, 1843." Dickens, it will be remembered, was in the United States when Thackeray's article appeared in Fraser's.

A recently-discovered pamphlet recording the "Proceedings at the Thirteenth Anniversary Festival of the Royal General Theatrical Fund," held at the Freemasons' Tavern, March 29, 1838, discloses the fact that Thackeray occupied the chair and made a long speech on that occasion, thus proving his interest in the theatrical profession. Until this pamphlet was unearthed it was not known that he ever attended a festival at Freemasons' Tavern in any public capacity.

Reviews.

A BOOK FOR THE CRISIS.

When the writer of a new book upon China begins by saying that the Rev. Arthur Smith's "Chinese Characteristics" is the keenest study of the Chinese human being yet made, we may be fairly sure that the writer's own book will be a good one. In Miss Scidmore's case (CHINA, THE LONG-LIVED EMPIRE. New York: the Century Co.) this is certainly so; she has not, of course, the profound personal knowledge of China possessed by Mr. Smith, but she has seen not a little of the Chinese, and she evidently has that most important gift of a travelling student—a judicial ability to weigh evidence and accept information from the right person. In this respect she differs widely from one or two other lady writers upon China. And she shows welcome wisdom, too, in offering us no careful and exact analysis of the Chinese character. We make no apology for a long quotation from the concluding chapter, for on the one hand it is a fair specimen of Miss Scidmore's frank and convincing method, and on the other it contains opinions which cannot be too often read by the British public to-day:—

> When I asked one long in Government employ if his thirty years in their midst led him to believe that the Chinese could be regenerated, awakened, or galvanized to some semblance of modern life, he exclaimed:—"No, never! It is not possible to regenerate China as China. It cannot be effected from within by the Chinese. The motive power is not there. They do not want to be regenerated. They do not see that there is anything the matter. It would not disturb the Pekingese to have France seize all Kwangtung, nor excite the Cantonese to have Russia seize all north of the Yangtsze. They are indifferent to it all. They do not realize that China the nation was whipped by Japan. It was only Li Hung Chang and those Manchus up north who 'lost face.'" . . . A taipan, the head of a great foreign firm, owned to weariness at his colleagues' eternal conventional laudations of the high standard of Chinese commercial honesty, the cut-and-dried "never-knew-a-Chinaman-to-break-his-word" panegyrics. . . . Chinese sense of responsibility is strong, the saving virtue of the race, all that holds the rotten old empire together; but all of commercial honour and morality is not centred here any more than in England or America—it only averages up. As there is no official honesty, no standard there whatever, the merchant class shine by contrast. The Chinese are credited with the greatest intellectual capacity of any race, and what use do they make of it? For two thousand years the Chinese have only learned by heart, committed to memory, poetry and metaphysical essays, the mechanical education of a parrot. Look at their rulers in Peking throughout the whole nineteenth century! not a man among them. Look at the present Emperor! Every coolie grins at the way his step-mother locks him up and bullies him. . . . "Can China be regenerated?" repeated another old resident. "Only by immersion for forty days forty fathoms deep. The fresh start must be a clean start. Soap and carbolic will do more than diplomacy or gunpowder. They are the first necessary factors in any regeneration of this country. If they burn the classics and behead the literati, they might make some start without soap and water."
> All replies to such questions were equally discouraging, equally biased, vague, or flippant, and the Chinese in the present and the future remain problems more baffling and unsatisfactory each time one attempts them.

This is the exact truth. There is nothing whatever to be hoped for from "China." But what China is, so far as there is such a thing as "China" at all, what the Chinese do and say and think, and how they appear to clear and cool Western eyes, may be learned from Miss Scidmore's book as well as anywhere else we know. She covers a wide field, touching upon most of the aspects of Chinese life, and describing with a charming touch her own travel experiences. But at this moment one cannot but pay chief attention to anything throwing light upon the circumstances in which so many of our fellow countrymen and women have, in all human probability, lost their lives. Here, then, is a picture of the foreign diplomatists' position in Peking:—

> A little community of foreign diplomats, shut like rats in a trap in a double-walled city of an estimated million three hundred thousand fanatic, foreign-hating Chinese, with a more hostile and lawless army of sixty thousand vicious Chinese soldiers without the walls and scattered over the country towards Tien-tsin.

This was in 1898, but in 1900 it was worse. As for the official relations between the foreign Ministers and the Tsung-li Yamên, they are thus:—

> "I go to the Yamên by appointment at a certain hour," said one diplomat, "and while I am waiting my usual wait in those dirty, cold rooms the ash-shifter comes in and wants to know if I think there will be war between this and that European Power, because, mind you, some very peculiar telegrams have just arrived for those Legations. Every Legation telegram is read and discussed at the Yamên, you know, before it is delivered to us, and the cipher codes give them rare ideas."

We might fill pages with extracts as interesting as these, but we must send readers to the book itself, promising them that they will not only be entertained, but also told enough about China to enable them to form an intelligent opinion of the action of Europe in general, and their own country in particular, in that strange land now almost monopolizing the attention of civilized mankind.

FRENCH ANGLOPHOBIA AND ANGLOMANIA.*

The seven books mentioned at the foot are of unequal merit, but stand in amusing contrast. They show, now an intelligent sympathy for, now a startling hostility towards, the Anglo-Saxon world. One may find in them a microcosm, as it were, of France at the present moment.

With MM. Arnold and de la Poulaine, we are as far from M. Démolins' eulogistic, sometimes even naïve, enthusiasm as from M. Bazalgette's appreciation of Saxon individualism. The first book named is ushered into the world by M. de Mahy, whose dread of England is well known. It is said that Eugène Sue, the author of the "Wandering Jew," used every night to search for the Jesuit assassin concealed in his house. M. de Mahy must imitate him for the English spy, who he fancies is disguised as a Methodist missionary. He is convinced that the North African missions smuggle into Algiers and Tunis small arms and shot, to further an insurrection among the Arab population. He has also the proofs of a conspiracy between the said missionaries and the French Protestants, which conspiracy is hatched in the offices of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and as often as he offers to expose the culprits in the Chamber of Deputies, a feeble unit of which he is, he finds his colleagues disinclined to listen to his astounding revelations. Since irony, as Renan said, is the consolation of the just, the French Protestants can rest assured that their enemy's closest kin are of the same religious persuasion as themselves.

avouer à nous-mêmes les menées du parti anglais organisé chez nous depuis plus longtemps et plus fortement que le parti prussien.

Nous savons (echoes M. Anold) que, sous le manteau de la réligion, sous le couvert d'idées philosophiques et humanitaires, le protestant britannique a envahi la France. Fort de son alliance politico-religieuse avec le protestant de Germanie, fort de son or et de son audace, il dirige, du siège social de la Société Biblique à Londres, les nombreux agents qui vont porter à travers la France la bonne parole, . . . "anglo-saxonne."

A conclusion in praise of the now obsolete "Ligue de la Patrie Française" shows in the interests of what political party the author of this book is working. The book is, however, sufficiently entertaining. There is a spirited answer to M. Démolins' rather superficial theories of social science, which in its vulgar argot style, in its calm ignorance of facts, and flaunting of paradoxes mistaken for truths, is amusing. As an antidote for this sort of "literature" Frenchmen might well study M. Bazalgette's and Baron Charles Mourre's philosophic pages. These books form the most instructive analyses which we have met with of the age-long battle on French soil between the rights of man and raison d'état. Foreigners forget that France has tended by the accidents of history to suppress individualism in the supposed interests of the community. The exigencies of the French monarchy inspired by religious fanaticism have twice crushed the élite of the nation. The liking for hierarchic subordination has engendered a spirit of distrust of the individualism which is well known to be the hall mark of Protestantism, and the essential note, therefore, of civilization in England, America, and even in Germany, in spite of the Empire and the Prussian hegemony. Hence the Anglophobia of our time and the absurd antics of the nationalists. M. Bazalgette is not sanguine as to the capacity of his compatriots to seeure a liberty worthy of the legends on the façades of their public buildings. The Latin ideal of solidarity does not concern itself with the cell but only with the organism. To know the nature of the trouble is, however, the beginning of wisdom and recovery. M. Bazalgette knows it, and he should be read. Baron Mourre's discussion of the problem is more optimistic and broad-minded.

M. Jean de la Poulaine's contribution to social and ethnological studies will better be understood by extracts, which may serve to define the state of mind of a contemporary French Anglophobe. As the author's name is not sufficiently known to his fellow countrymen, he has taken care to begin by a short account of himself. He "speaks English like his own tongue and with an accent that has never made any one take him for a foreigner, although some have often thought him a Scotchman." Also "he has been writing for many years in the English press, which pays for his prose very generously; and has lectured in London on English literature."

Here are some appreciations on the English:—

> L'Anglais n'est pas belliqueux, loin de cela, sauf en temps de paix (p. 31). L'honneur et la honte sont deux choses dont il parle assez volontiers, mais qu'il ne comprend guère (p. 35). L'hypocrisie y fleurit mieux (en Angleterre) que dans n'importe quel autre pays, parce que plus que partout ailleurs on attache plus d'importance à l'apparence de la vertu elle-même (p. 72). L'hypocrisie forme une partie essentielle de l'éducation anglaise. Cette hypocrisie est un vernis très utile qui cache la lèpre affreuse d'immoralité qui existe en Angleterre (p. 73).

Further on there is a chapter on the "absurd customs of the English Parliament," and the "gouvernement qui est un des pires de l'Europe en ce qui concerne les travailleurs, pour lesquels il ne fait absolument rien," and "la politique"; "Jamais le gouvernement anglais n'a hésité à commettre des actions peu dignes d'un grand peuple lorsqu'il a cru de son interet de s'écarter des lois de la droiture et de l'honneur." Then follow similar appreciations on Education, Trade, the Army, &c. This is the conclusion:—

> Malgré ces qualités réelles, l'Angleterre n'a jamais été aimée, et elle ne le sera jamais, parce que dans sa marche à travers le monde elle a trop souvent [illegible] a toujours été le mobile de ses actions, et que jamais une pensée généreuse n'a germé dans son sein, sans y être [illegible] par l'égoïsme le plus révoltant et le plus cynique qui se montre ait jamais vu l'exemple.

A proof of the superiority of the French, according to M. Arnold, is their literary merit. This we are ready to admit, but our critical faculty, however imperfectly developed it be, cannot help deploring in those Anglophobe authors the absence of all that makes the style of the least among French prose-writers incomparable. M. de Mahy's denunciations of "les menées anglaises" would be far more favable lored of the time-honoured metaphors with which they are invested. Such a sentence as the following:

> Notre habitat, notre pays . . . ne font que [illegible] vices originels intellectuellement indélébiles, is perhaps very effective at a meeting of a provincial Conseil General; it is scarcely worthy of a League which numbers on its roll of membership Lemaître, Bourget, and Barrès. Arnold writes like his patron, plus a flavour of argot, which recalls the sallies of Fort Chabrol, Guérin and his accomplices before the High Court. As to M. de la Poulaine, he has so far succeeded in mastering the English language that Anglicisms abound under his patriotic pen: "Ils etaient arrivés de faire cesser un état de choses" is a perilously literal translation from the hated language of an hereditary enemy. On the whole, the prose-style of these three Anglophobes, so sure of their literary superiority, would be perhaps acceptable to the ordinary reader of the Petit Journal.

M. Eugène Aubin writes in a different spirit and without the least desire of displaying any superiority. A member of the little colony of Frenchmen in Egypt, he recounts the progress of the English in that country, the gradual disappearance of French influence, and concludes with some gloomy apprehensions for the future. These observations are in a very scientific manner prefaced by a survey of the condition of India in 1897, when the author visited Bombay. The book is written throughout in an impartial spirit and without any excessive recrimination for past mistakes. As an opinion of a Frenchman residing abroad the following statement is worth quoting:—

> La perte de notre situation dans la vallée du Nil est la conséquence indirecte de nos désastres de 1870, et une conséquence directe du régime flottant sous lequel la France a vécu depuis lors. . . . Un rapprochement avec l'Allemagne pouvait sauver la position de la France en Egypte; la mentalité nationale ne l'a point permis.

The idea of a revanche seems more sentiment to a Colonial Frenchman; and it is, perhaps, to this fatal pre-occupation et hobe that France owes her lack of expansion abroad. M. Aubin then mentions the Oriental fatalism of the Egyptian Frenchman. The lack of energy in the colonist unsupported by the mother-country and left to himself is another cause of weakness. The book purports to be a guide to prevent mistakes similar to those of the Third Republic in the Egyptian question, and, although criticizing with the utmost severity the improvidence of the Indian Government at the time of the famine, it acknowledges the importance of the reforms already secured in Egypt.

> Une nation aussi civilisée, en possession d'une tradition coloniale aussi sure que l'Angleterre, ne pouvait passer sur l'Egypte sans y laisser de traces bienfaitrices. Rien ne serait plus maladroit que de nier le tact et le soin avec lesquels ont été poursuivis, depuis l'occupation, le rétablissement des finances, l'organisation judiciaire, le plan d'irrigation, conformément au programme primitivement tracé.

The first part of the book, on India, it will be interesting to compare with the articles published by M. Filon in the Revue des Deux Mondes on Education in India.

M. Paul de Rousiers, whose connexion with the Musée Social is well known, pursues his studies on the New World in a temper of sympathetic appreciation. After a survey of the outward activity of the Americans he studies the American in himself; in his home, his life, his dress; in his new-budding aristocracy, his politicians, his authors, his religious guides. There is a chapter on the Roman Church in America, which, although written by an avowed Roman Catholic, is infinitely better-informed and more scientific than the rhetoric of either M. Brunetière or M. Bourget. The concluding pages are a pæan to individuality, individual effort and energy. It is a pity, however, that some of Whitman's vigorous lines are not quoted instead of Longfellow's Psalm of Life. The latter is after all only an Old World poet accidentally born in the New.

Let us finally note the extremely sincere and suggestive book which M. Fouillée (already well known for his "Psychologie du Peuple Français") has written under the title La France au Point de Vue Moral. There are here 150 pages on the religious crisis in France, the rôles of Catholicism and Protestantism, and on the power as well as the licence of the modern French Press. M. Fouillée believes with the foreigner that France, after all, represents the great principles of the Revolution—the principles of the rights of man and of human solidarity. He insists that the triumph of raison d'état would be to destroy the raison d'être of France. To our mind, as we have pointed out à propos of M. Bazalgette and Baron Monnre, the real France is this double France, and the keynote to its history is a sense of the age-long struggle between these two instinctive forces. From this point of view M. Hanotaux, in his preface to his history of Richelieu, has a profounder sense of the drift of French social development than Michelet or M. Fouillée.

A CENTURY OF GERMAN LITERATURE.

A little over a year ago we discussed at some length the first of a series of ten volumes which are in course of publication by Bondi, of Berlin, on German in the nineteenth century. That volume dealt with intellectual and social tendencies. Another volume now before us takes literature for its province and is called Die Deutsche Litteratur des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts, by R. M. Meyer (10m.). It has been out some months, but the appearance of a second edition reminds us that the book has at least won the favour of the German reading public, and gives, therefore, an opportunity of bringing it to the notice of English readers of German. In the course of the last few years, however, there have appeared so many ephemeral books on modern German literature that one is naturally a little wary of recommending off-hand to a foreign public a new work on this subject. It must be confessed too, that Dr. R. M. Meyer's book awakens suspicion. He has laid himself open to the accusation of wishing "der Mitwelt Spass zu machen," for he has placed the chief weight of his book on the discussion of the literature of the last few decades, in other words, of those contemporary writers about whom the public of the moment has naturally most curiosity. The last twenty years of the nineteenth century receive more pages allotted to them than the first thirty. Theodor Fontane gets more space than the whole Romantic School, and Hauptmann is discussed at more length than Grillparzer. Dr. Meyer, it is true, defends this unfair distribution of space on the ground that the older periods have already been so much written about that they do not make the same call for a detailed criticism. But none the less, this lack of proportion is detrimental to the work as a lasting contribution to literary history.

Since the first appearance of Dr. Meyer's book, however, we have not only re-read it, but have compared it with a number of other works of more or less similar scope, and we are bound to confess that it is much the best history of modern German literature at present in the field. Not that it is in any respect a final book; Dr. Meyer recognizes himself that it is not the business of a contemporary to write final literary criticism; it is enough if he writes helpful criticism. We cannot always agree with Dr. Meyer's views, but their originality and suggestiveness are not to be disputed. The book suffers from an artificial division into decades, each chapter covering ten years. Such artificial dissections of literature suggest Linnæus' classification of the vegetable world. Neither in literature nor science can such a method be carried out without straining, if not actually running counter to, the laws of natural development. The plan has the disadvantage of dividing up periods and movements which can only be properly studied as wholes. In the examination of the first Romantic School, of the singers of the war of Liberation, of the Revolutionary lyric, there may be little reason for cavilling at the arrangement. But if we wish to get an idea of the part played, say, by Young Germany in the literature of the century, or of the activity of the Munich group of writers at a later period, we are obliged to piece it together out of several chapters.

The great merit of the book, however, and the reason which induces us to recommend it warmly to the English public, is the fact that it is the first book on modern German literature which is cosmopolitan in its judgment. Much has been said and written recently against "Das Berlinertum in der Litteratur," but "Berlinertum," or, in other words, metropolitan standards, whatever effect they may have on poetic production, are helpful to literary criticism; and here lies the hope of German criticism losing that provincial, narrowly "German" point of view which is often disagreeably in evidence. Not that Dr. Meyer, his Berlin standpoint notwithstanding, can be entirely acquitted of expressing opinions which are obviously not for us non-Germans, but on the whole he has written a cosmopolitan book. The writers to whom he devotes most attention, such as Grillparzer, Hebbel, Anzengruber, Hauptmann in drama, Heine, Droste-Hülshoff, Lenau in the lyric, Keller, Storm, Fontane in the novel are all writers whom a critic, placing himself at a general European standpoint, would also regard as the leading literary men of modern Germany. Our chief regret is that at least half of the very minor deities of the moment had not been dropped out of the book to make room for a fuller, more incisive criticism of the great innovators of the beginning of the century, those men who with their aphorisms and fragmentary novels, their exaggerated lyric feeling and their hopelessly undramatic dramas, succeeded nevertheless in revolutionizing the literature of their own land and of Europe. Such criticism none of the younger German critics is better able to write than Dr. Meyer. Perhaps in a future edition he will, even at the risk of making two volumes out of one, give his work that proportion the want of which seems to us at present its most serious flaw.

SHAKESPEARE REVISED.

We have never risen from any work on Shakespeare, even the most fantastic commentary on the Sonnets or the wildest "Baconian" apologia, with such a sense of nightmare upon us as from the perusal of William Shakespeare: Prosody and Text, by B. A. P. Van Dam, M.D., with the assistance of C. Stoffel (Williams and Norgate). Dr. Van Dam and Mr. Stoffel are new names to us among Shakespearian students, but with a serene self-confidence they batter down the whole edifice of metrical and textual criticism built up by the labours of generations of scholars and substitute a brand-new erection of their own. And they choose the very worst way to gain sympathy in their venturesome undertaking. For to a "cocksure" belief in their own infallibility they unite the loftiest contempt for all who have preceded them. The Cambridge editors are their favourite objects of ridicule, but Dr. Guest, Dr. Furnivall, and others come in turn under their lash. They would have, therefore, no right to complain if similar measure were dealt out to them and their whole laboured system of textual reconstruction brushed indignantly aside. But it is only fair to recognize that, absurd as are their main theories, the authors have gone through much patient investigation of the Shakespearian Folios and Quartos and of other Elizabethan texts. Hence the earlier chapters of the work, taken by themselves, have a certain value. They deal with the pronunciation of words in Elizabethan verse, and the consequent loss or addition of syllables, as contrasted with the normal Victorian standard. A good deal of this section has been anticipated by writers like König, but it is more fully worked out here, and the illustrations from contemporary authors are often interesting. Had, therefore, Dr. Van Dam and his colleague contented themselves with developing this point, they might have been credited with a useful piece of investigation. But on the basis of these differences between Elizabethan and Victorian pronunciation they found the theory, which is the key to their whole system, that "the rhythm of the heroic line consists in a regular sequence of unstressed and stressed syllables, which rhythm . . . is interfered with . . . by every omission and by every interpolation of a syllable." Thus, say they, when we glorify Marlowe and Shakespeare for having transformed the monotonous blank verse of Gorboduc by (inter alia) varying the number of syllables in the line, we are merely the victims of a delusion due to the printing of words without the abbreviations or expansions customary in Elizabethan speech.

We contend that the praise lavished on this so-called blank verse of Marlowe and Shakespeare is nothing more or less than the glorification of prose at the expense of the claims of poetry. What certain critics of our time are pleased to style blank verse and to laud to the skies as such is merely the prose into which the numerous form-alterations introduced by the printers and editors have converted the original blank verse intended by the poets.

This revolutionary thesis is developed in the chapters that follow, which lead up to the statement (for again we must quote the ipsissima verba) that "the old texts of Shakespeare's plays may with complete justice be described as the veriest Augean stables of printed literature." From these stables "a certain number of skilful critical scavengers have here and there carted away small heaps of accumulated dirt," but it has been left to the present writers to thoroughly cleanse them. The only adequate way of illustrating this process is to show these successors of Hercules at work. Thus in Richard II., Act V., 2, the Quarto reads :—

Yor. Bring me my bootes, I will unto the King.
(His man enters with his boots.)
Du. Strike him Aumerle, poore boy thou art amazd.
Hence vilaine never more come in my sight.
Yor. Give me my bootes I say.
Du. Why Yorke what wilt thou doe ?

On this our authors comment, "We must say that we can find no earthly reason why Aumerle should by his mother be called upon to 'strike' the servant. We might, when hard pressed, admit the possibility of the Duchess's telling Aumerle to snatch the boots from him, but the text as it stands is unmitigated nonsense. To set it right we propose to read the passage as follows :—

York Bring me my boots. I will Unto the King. (His man enters with his boots.)
Duch. (Stroking Aumerle). Poor boy, thou art amaz'd.
York Hence villain ! ne'r more come in my sight. Gi' m'
My boots, I say.
Duch. Why, York, what wilt thou do ? "

"The humour of this capital scene," they add, "has not always been duly appreciated." We can assure them that in its revised form they need have no fear of its failing to provoke mirth.

But even the most consecrated of Shakespearian passages is not safe from violation. In Hamlet's exclamation, "O my prophetic soul ! My uncle ! " the last two words form a short line, which, on Dr. Van Dam's theory, is inadmissible. Hence they are expunged as being merely an "elucidatory addition" by the "editor" of the Quarto. And the same fate befalls the last five words of Lady Macbeth's reproach to her husband, "A foolish thought, to say a sorry sight." And if after such instances of the working of the "new method" in textual criticism any reader is anxious to see it exemplified on a broader scale we would refer him to the astounding "blank verse" reconstructions of the opening prose scene in the Tempest, and of the last scene of Act 5 of 2 Henry IV. Here the authors find it convenient to have recourse to some "elucidatory additions" of their own. Thus in the Tempest they eke out a line by introducing the expletive Shioud, which they justify thus. "When we learn from l. 35 that the 'Boson' is a 'blasphemous dog,' we think there can be no harm in putting somewhat stronger language in his lips than the rather tame phrase I plague in l. 30. . . . The logic of the context requires at least one cutting oath from the boatswain's mouth, and there is exactly room for it in l. 10." Did space permit, we could quote other equally remarkable new readings from this "Essay in Criticism." It is deplorable that so much labour and learning, of a kind, should have resulted in this monumental piece of folly.

AN ITALIAN ON ENGLISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

It is not often that the Continental politicians and writers who talk of English local government, or, as it is currently but inexactly styled, "Self-government," show true understanding of the subject. A work remarkable both for its learning and its lucidity, has, however, been written by Signor Pietro Bertolini, formerly Italian Under-Secretary of State for Finance and until recently Under-Secretary of State for the Interior. IL GOVERNO LOCALE INGLESE E LE SUE RELAZIONI CON LA VITA NAZIONALE (2 vols., Rome, Bocca, 12 lire) is a product of three years' patient study and is unquestionably the completest account of the development of local government in England, from the Saxon period to the Local Government Act in 1891, which exists in any foreign language, if not, indeed, in the English language itself.

We need not follow the writer through his minute description of the feudal system, the evolution of local authorities, the growth of rates, the development of the functions of Justices of the Peace, and of the manifold organs of local government. For English students the chief interest of this work lies in the incidental criticisms and in the copious generalizations scattered throughout his pages. Signor Bertolini is no theorist, no lover of the brilliant half-truths which kill appetite for research. His method is severely historical except where, for instance, he incidentally notes the influence of the popular constitution of Anglo-Saxon Courts of Justice in developing the guarantees of liberty contained in English common law ; or where he emphasizes the value of strong local organization in preventing monarchical institutions from becoming absolute, as on the Continent, after the collapse of the feudal system ; or where he points out the influence of protestantism in spreading liberal ideas. One of the chief weaknesses of the Commonwealth was, in Signor Bertolini's opinion, its lack of firm basis in local government ; while that same local government, after the Restoration, acted as a check upon the demoralizing influence of the Stuart régime.

Special attention is paid by the author to the Poor Law. He is anxious in particular about the effect of the Parish Councils Act of 1894, and fears lest it should undo the great work accomplished by the Poor Law Reform of 1834. Again and again he insists upon the necessity of salutary rigour in the administration of the Poor Law. Such rigour, he recognizes, has, on the whole, been shown since the appointment of the Poor Law Commissioners in 1834 ; but he doubts the ability of district councillors, acting as guardians, to resist the pressure of unskilled electors—who in times of distress will naturally press for a lavish distribution of charity. He fears, in fact, lest the pauperism of the lower classes become as disastrously rapid as during the closing years of the eighteenth century.

Signor Bertolini writes as an acute Conservative acquainted by years of Parliamentary experience with the practical defects of a democratic régime. Like all moderate Italian politicians he accepts frankly the democratic idea, but seeks guarantees against its evils. "Much may be said in favour of a democratic form of government," he writes, "but not that it is cheap"; and he criticizes those flaws in English legislation in regard to local government which seem to leave a loophole for making democratic government still dearer. "Though the total indebtedness of any one local body must be limited to a certain ratio of the rateable value of the district, there is no Act," he says, "fixing a limit to the total indebtedness which may be contracted by all the local authorities of that district taken together." He sharply criticizes, moreover, the looseness of control which has enabled Parliament by special Acts to sanction local loans, sometimes for indefinite amounts, without the approval of the Local Government Board and without stringent obligations for the extinction of the debt within a certain time. Other perils which Signor Bertolini points out are the tendency towards excessive municipalization of public services—although he commends municipalization of services which are practically industrial monopolies—such as water and gas supply, sewers, electric lighting, and in some cases trams; and the possibility that the upper classes may gradually withdraw from the business of local administration. Possibly, he suggests, public spirit and past experience of the value of exercising a predominant influence over local affairs will prevent the English upper classes from ever withdrawing entirely from the Bench and from the local councils, where their continued presence cannot fail to be beneficial. Their presence and their gratuitous performance of public services are necessary to prevent local government in England from degenerating, as on the Continent, into an arid bureaucratic machine.

Some idea of the care bestowed upon the material side of the work may be gathered from the circumstance that in the course of 1,000 pages, on some of which occur as many as forty English names and words, only five misprints occur, and those of never more than one letter. The bibliography of the works consulted comprises every important English, French, and German authority, besides all the Parliamentary reports and returns bearing upon the subject from 1831 to 1838. The index of Laws and Acts of Parliament quoted covers twelve closely-printed pages.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Far East.

European Settlements in the Far East (Sampson Low, 7s. 6d.) is something like a guide-book, something like a gazetteer, and something like a series of extracts from Consular reports. Supposing, for instance, that we turn up Tien-tsin, we begin with the latitude and longitude, and proceed to a summarized account of Tien-tsin's place in history, with special references to the massacre of the Sisters of Mercy, and the long satrapy of Li Hung Chang. Then comes descriptive matter:—

> Very extensive building operations are going on throughout the concessions, which have excellent roads, with police, oil, gas-lamps, &c. The British Municipality has a handsome town hall, completed in 1889; adjoining there is a well-kept public garden opened in the year of Jubilee, and styled Victoria Park. An excellent recreation ground of ten acres . . . .

And so forth. Similar information is given about all the other European settlements, not only in China, but also in Japan, Corea, Indo-China, the Straits Settlements, the Malay States, Siam, the Dutch Indies, Borneo, and the Philippines. The book will be invaluable in newspaper offices, and useful to newspaper readers. It contains some very good photographs.

Most of the volumes in the "Builders of Greater Britain Series" (Unwin) have been more remarkable for diligent research than for literary merit, and Mr. Hugh Edward Egerton's Sir Stamford Raffles (5s.) is no exception to the rule. The author has ransacked through an immense number of papers in the India Office Library, and has had access to other important manuscript material, and the result is a book which is not less tedious than instructive. Some idea of Mr. Egerton's prose style may be gathered from the fact that he regularly speaks of Sir Stamford as "our hero"—the cliché of the early Victorian novelists. The book may satisfy a thirst for information, but it certainly will not create one.

The Book and its Reader.

The "Temple Primers," which we have noticed from time to time as they appeared, have provided for the general reader a number of wonderfully compact and judicious handbooks on numerous branches of knowledge. In the latest published of them the author, Mr. Basil Worsfold, has been assigned a theme much more abstruse and controversial than those dealt with by his colleagues. The Exercise of Judgment in Literature is a promising title, for it is in this particular kind of judgment that the general reader needs special enlightenment. Mr. Worsfold has, we are afraid, lost an opportunity. The general reader will not be attracted by his style, which is rather professorial; and if he surmounts this difficulty he will not find that the instruction he gains is, as a rule, worth the trouble. After a somewhat laborious analysis of the different arts, Mr. Worsfold sketches the history of criticism and endeavours to establish certain rules for the guidance of literary judgment. Art he defines as "the presentation of the real in its mental aspect," a definition which requires considerable qualification and leads to such misleading expressions as "all creative literature and all literature that is not merely science—that is, all literature in which the writer adds the work of his own mind to the facts which he presents," as if the scientific man did not apply to facts the work of his own mind. The dominant aspects of creative literature are discovered to be, by a not very logical analysis, matter, manner, and—a third aspect which is really inherent in the other two—the capacity to produce pleasure. These correspond to the essential tests of good literature—truth, symmetry, and idealization, or the appeal to the imagination. Of the conditions of legitimate idealization we have the vaguest account, and Mr. Worsfold, for some reason or other, assumes that "realism" must always be repugnant to the moral sense. This reveals a very inadequate conception of modern literary developments, and it is curious that the word "impressionism" does not, we think, occur in the book; certainly there is no explanation of the kind of literature which the word denotes. Nor perhaps is it quite consistent with the very questionable statement that the drama in modern times "has advanced by virtue of an enlightened realism which is manifested in the assimilation of its literary medium to the language of everyday life," by better acting, and "by virtue of a higher regard for historic accuracy and a more complete command of mechanical contrivances." Alas for Mr. Sidney Lee and for the champions of a "literary drama"! The history of criticism is traced with no mention of Johnson, and Mr. Worsfold would seem never to have heard of the controversies which have raged as to the meaning of criticism, of the method of history and analysis as opposed to the method of personal appreciation, of Sainte Beuve on the one hand, and of Anatole France on the other. Under the heading History and Biography the writer has nothing but the barest platitudes to say as to biographical methods or of the claims of the "scientific" historian, both of them topics of immediate interest at the present day. And we have seldom read a more superficial explanation than he gives us of those words which are such a puzzle to many a literary student—"classic" and "romantic." Mr. Worsfold's space was, of course, very limited; but for the sake of putting before his readers some more definite instruction in literary matters and some clearer ideas as to the conditions of criticism as they exist at the present day he might well have been satisfied with a terser account of the ideas of Plato and of Aristotle, and have sacrificed much of his rather elementary exposition of first principles.

Africa.

The South African Conspiracy, by Fred W. Bell (Heinemann, 5s. n.), is one of the South African books that matter. Its purpose is to muster the evidence that Afrikanderdom spells disloyalty, and to bring the charge of disloyalty home not only to those who openly glory in it, but also to Mr. Schreiner. The opinion generally held of Mr. Schreiner at the present time is that he steered an adroit course, and avoided too loud expressions of loyalty for fear of provoking the disloyalty of others. Mr. Bell's view is that he sat very adroitly on a narrow fence, and that the side of the fence on which he ultimately descended is not that on which, when the Transvaal trouble began, he hoped and expected to descend. He points out that "Mr. Schreiner allowed large quantities of arms and ammunition to be delivered to the Orange Free State," at a time when the object of their importation was so clear that the Portuguese Government stopped war stores at Delagoa Bay; that, owing to Mr. Schreiner's inaction, "in the early stages of the war, the colonial forces, as regards equipment, were utterly unfit to take the field"; and that he instructed the Civil servants at Kimberley "to hold aloof from warlike preparations as it was the desire of the Cape Government to remain neutral in any struggle that might take place." And when he records Mr. Schreiner's subsequent co-operation with the High Commissioner in the punishment of rebels, he sums up thus:

> The number of British troops under arms in South Africa exceeds the total of male civilian inhabitants, and Mr. Schreiner's is not the only apparent conversion. I think it can be fairly said that when the issue was dark and uncertain no acts of Mr. Schreiner's could have justly prevented the Afrikander party, had it achieved its aims, from still claiming him as its own, just in the same way as now it may be urged his acts entitle him to the support of the side which undoubtedly must be predominant.

The book, in short, is as vigorous an attack on Mr. Schreiner as any one need wish to read; and Mr. Schreiner's reply will be looked for with interest.

M. Edouard Naville, of Geneva, like M. Yves Guyot, of Paris, stands up for us on the Continent against brother Boer. His pamphlet entitled Britain and Boer Independence (Blackwood, 6d.) is pleasant reading, and should do good. To our German censors, in particular, the following historical parallel may be recommended:—

> The first act which raised Prussia from the position of inferiority in which the Peace of Olmütz had left her was the crushing of Denmark. On this little country Prussia tried her army, reorganized by Von Moltke and Roon, yet this trial blow was made in concert with Austria. Two years later Hanover, Hesse, Nassau, and other States lost their independence, and were annexed to Prussia. And yet the historical traditions of these countries, the rights acquired by a past illuminated with glorious episodes, were quite different to those of the Boers. To take part with the Boers would have been to follow a policy directly opposed to that which contributed to make Prussia first and then Germany the Power she is to-day.

It does, indeed, look like a case of the mote and the beam.

Those who desire to read the early history of Natal, and prefer short histories to long ones, may as well read it in Natal and the Boers, by T. Rowell (Dent, 2s. 6d. n.). The author has drawn on the usual sources of information, and boiled them down in a conscientious and painstaking manner. The facts are duly set forth, though the style is without distinction. The story is only carried down to the year 1847.

Mr. John B. Purvis' Handbook to British East Africa and Uganda (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.) is the work of a man who, as director of Technical Instruction in Uganda, had the opportunity of getting to know all that was worth knowing about the country. He sets forth his facts in a concise and business-like manner, and his book should be useful to travellers, settlers, and missionaries.

India.

Famines in India (Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d.) is a series of five open letters to Lord Curzon by Mr. Romesh Dutt, formerly of the Indian Civil Service, and now lecturer in Indian History at University College, London. The thesis which Mr. Dutt sets out to prove is thus lucidly stated at the outset:—

> There is no doubt that these famines are directly caused by the failure of the annual rains over which man has no control; but it is equally certain that their intensity and their disastrous effects can be to a great extent mitigated by moderating the land tax, by the construction of irrigation works, and by the reduction of the public debt and the expenditure of India.

These points, especially those relating to the land tax, are carefully argued, with a generous provision of statistics. Even those who do not see their way to accept all Mr. Dutt's conclusions will find his book a useful manual on the subject of Indian land tenure. His view that it is inequitable to make India pay for the maintenance of a large army to be used for the general purposes of the Empire has the support of many high authorities who are by no means to be described as little Englanders. But his contention that one of the remedies called for is the employment of more Indians in high appointments introduces a fresh order of ideas, and he does wisely in not insisting upon it with undue emphasis.

In Fort St. George, Madras, by Mrs. Frank Penny (Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d. n.), we have a history of our first possession in India. As the book is big and the subject not so big, there is room in it for many interesting, if trivial details, as to the peccadilloes of the servants of the East India Company, and their methods of maintaining discipline among their soldiers. There are also anecdotes, some of which are more familiar than others, about such divers celebrities as Clive, Elihu Yale, and Captain Kidd. The history is only carried down to the beginning of the century, and the book ends with alphabetical lists of monuments in cemeteries. The book owes its interest to the subject rather than to the treatment. It contains some tolerable pen and ink sketches by the author, and some footnotes on obscure points of history by Mr. J. Kelsall, formerly of the Madras Civil Service.

"Matériaux pour servir."

Many a student will be grateful for the Index to the Charters and Rolls in the Department of Manuscripts, British Museum (published at the Museum), the first volume of which has been edited by Mr. Henry J. Ellis and Mr. Francis B. Bickley, the Senior Assistants in the Department. This volume is an Index locorum, personal names, subjects, and religious houses, together with foreign documents, being reserved for future ones. Despite these limitations the unwearied compilers have filled nearly a thousand double-columned pages with this splendid list of deeds. It is, of course, not quite the first publication of the kind. The calendar of the Stowe MSS. has already been printed; so has the calendar of Charters before the Norman Conquest. The value of this first instalment of all the deeds in the Department of Manuscripts is that it extends from the eleventh century to the early part of the present, and includes every document of that description which had been acquired down to 1882. The limitation of date is not explained—the Index can hardly have been under way for seventeen years. To the topographer and the local historian the book will be of the utmost value, since it will inform him at a glance of every bit of manuscript material in the British Museum, outside the Stowe collection, relating to his subject. When the Index nominum is added, research will be made easy for many to whom distance and lack of time have hitherto rendered it difficult. No mere list of documents, however useful it may be, can be enthralling in itself; but here and there we notice suggestions of matters of historical or social interest, or which throw some fresh light upon details of local history. Thus, under date of 1418, there is a deed of manumission of a nativus of Battersea by Westminster Abbey, while many villages, now of small importance, have the or three pages allotted to their records. Of such, for instance, are Goudhurst in Kent, and Denham in Bucks, to name only two instances. To ascend from small things to great, we find the cities of London and Westminster occupying five-and-twenty pages. It is, of course, almost impossible to test the completeness and accuracy of a compilation of this kind; but we chance to have before us a copy of a document which should apparently have been included, but does not appear to be indexed. It consists of extracts from the Court Rolls of the Manor of Broadhurst, in Sussex—it was in the manorial house there that Archbishop Leighton died. The reference is Adol. MSS. 5701, fol. 168. One or two omissions in so extensive and laborious a piece of work would neither be surprising nor inexcusable, and this particular one—if omission it be—may possibly be explained by the limitations of the scheme. However this may be, there can be no question of the value of the book to students, or of the minute care, especially in the tracing of the relations between old and new forms of place-names, which has been bestowed upon it.

The Art of War.

Mr. R. B. Marston's translation of MECHANICAL TRACTION IN WAR, by Lieutenant-Colonel Layriz of the German army (Sampson Low, 5s. n.), appears opportunely. It deals with the past, the present, and the future of the traction engine, discusses the merits of different motors, and gives an account of the various experiments conducted with them in France, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, England, and elsewhere. The steam road-locomotive was successfully used in war as far back as the Crimean campaign, and afterwards by the Germans in 1870, and the Russians in 1878, and even then it was demonstrated that steep ascents, bad roads, and narrow streets presented no insurmountable difficulties. What has been the result of the recent experiments with them in South Africa the author does not tell us for the excellent reason that he does not know: but he quotes an expression of opinion favourable to them from the war-correspondent of the Daily Telegraph. His book will be valuable to students of the subject.

Mr. Clive Holland may be congratulated on his GOSSIPY GUIDE TO SWANAGE AND DISTRICT (Pearson, 6d.), the district including Corfe Castle, Wareham, Wimborne, and Poole. Swanage is Knollsea in Mr. Thomas Hardy's Wessex, and a good many other Wessex sites are duly identified in the guide, which is written in better English than most books of the sort. Particular praise is due to the photographs. There is hardly a smudgy picture among them, and the best of them, such as that of the old mill, are quite works of art.

FICTION.

Sienkiewicz.

The first thing that strikes the reader about Henryk Sienkiewicz and his KNIGHTS OF THE CROSS (Dent, 2 vols., 4s. 6d. per vol.) is his industry and the terrific length of the book. It looks like a task of weeks, the reading of these two great volumes, with their small print and their 757 pages. The "period" of the tale, too, looks formidable. Few novel-readers know much about Poles and Lithuanians in the early fifteenth century. But the book once begun will be read through to the end. The warriors are living men, breathing, fighting, and making love, and Sienkiewicz gives us time to become intimate with them. Young Zbyshko is the best of them, with his hand that could squeeze the sap from the young trees and his heart that can love one maiden truly and beat fast at the sight of many another. They are truly human, those Poles of old, mighty men with soft hearts, and a royal contempt for death. Zbyshko's uncle, a glorious old wolf, untameable, and of prodigious strength, loves his nephew like a woman. But when Zbyshko, through a boyish imprudence, is condemned to death, this is how the two take it:—

> Matsko could not sleep, and some time after they had lain down he called to his nephew—
> "Zbyshko!"
> "But what?"
> "Well, taking everything into account, I think that they will cut off thy head."
> "Do you think so?" asked Zbyshko, with a drowsy voice. And turning to the wall he fell asleep sweetly, for he was wearied by the road.

This is before the sentence is certain. Later on, when it has been passed, Matsko consoles the boy:—

> "Be not troubled. Thy bones will not be seeking one another at the day of resurrection. I will have an oaken coffin made for thee of such kind that the canonesses of the Church of the Virgin Mary have not a better. Thou wilt not die like a peasant, or like a nobleman created by patent. Nay! I will not even permit that thou be beheaded on the same cloth on which they behead citizens. I have agreed already with Amyley for entirely new stuff, from which a king's coat might be made. And I shall not spare masses on thee—never fear!"

This reminds one of "snug lying in the Abbey," but Zbyshko is "delighted" and repeats "God reward you!" His two love affairs are delicate and beautiful. His little bride and her tragic end evoke all the tenderness of his nature; but the splendid young Yagenka, whom he marries after Danusia's death, is the true mate for him. Brutality is not so rampant in "The Knights of the Cross" as in "Quo Vadis," though there are hard blows struck, and the description of Matsko's fight in the hall is as thrilling as the picture of his torture is horrible. Mr. Jeremiah Curtin's work as translator is conscientiously and sympathetically done: though the English reader is a little startled at an occasional rampant Americanism at a serious moment.

Sensational.

REVENGEFUL FANGS, by F. W. Bamford (Elliot Stock, 6s.), is full to the brim of horrors and snakes—literal snakes, with literal fangs. It is the tale of a feud and an Indian temple, and an interprising Englishman. The reader sympathizes with one of the characters when he says "I shall not be the least surprised if I dream about snakes, extra-fingered men, and fakers to-night."

Mrs. Meade's SANCTUARY CLUB (Ward, Lock, 5s.) were better described as an asylum for criminal lunatics. For the inmates (it was a residential club at Hampstead) were all criminals of the most desperate kind, and the two feeble-minded medical men who ran the show were certainly lunatics, since only lunatics could have exhibited the blindness of Doctors Cato and Chetwynd to the nefarious doings of the patients under their care.

For those who revel in stark melodrama Mr. Headon Hill provides lavishly in CAGED! (Ward, Lock, 6s.) a romance of a lunatic asylum and many other strange things. It is a somewhat careless piece of work, but few readers who are under the spell of the wild excitement with which each chapter is packed will care to consider questions of style. Mr. Hill knows his clients, and criticism must stand aside, and merely wish so energetic a writer good fortune.

Lovers of uncanny, gruesome stories may find some satisfaction in reading Mr. E. E. Kellett's A CORNER IN SLEEP AND OTHER IMPOSSIBILITIES (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.). But the author has nothing new to tell us. Many of his stories are rather obscure, and even the best of them, "The New Frankenstein," is not very well done.

Mr. Morley Roberts.

In THE DESCENT OF THE DUCHESS (Sands, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Morley Roberts essays farcical extravaganza. The Duchess was travelling by rail in Western America. She fell off the car as the train was crossing the Mississippi, but happened to be caught in the canvas awning of a flat-bottomed boat that was passing under the bridge at the time. The crew of the boat—typical Westerners—took her to their homes and took care of her till her friends could come to fetch her. One of the lads fell in love with her, but cherished no illusions. That is all the story, and the merit lies almost entirely in the treatment, which is admirable. Whether the humour will appeal to wide audiences, as does the humour of Mr. Jerome, we do not feel quite sure. There are some jokes in it of which imbeciles and uneducated people might fail to see the point. But we, at any rate, found it very amusing, and welcome it as evidence that Mr. Morley Roberts possesses literary gifts with which those who only know him by his psychological studies and his British Empire books do not credit him.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The programme for the autumn season is gradually taking shape, especially in the department of fiction. A few of the novels we have already announced, but it is now possible to give a list of some of the more important books which will probably be ready within the next few months.

Gertrude Atherton	...	"Senator North."
Amelia E. Barr	...	"Trinity Bells: A Tale of Old New York."
William Barry ...	...	"The Wizard's Knot."
Louis Becke ...	...	"Edward Barry: South Sea Pearler."
Sir Walter Besant	...	"The Fourth Generation."
Marie Corelli ...	...	"The Master Christian."
Stephen Crane ...	...	"Wounds in the Rain: War Stories," and a novel.
F. Marion Crawford	...	"In the Palace of the King."
Paul Leicester Ford	...	"Wanted, a Watchmaker."
Maurice Hewlett	...	"Richard Yea and Nay."
R. S. Hichens ...	...	"Tongues of Conscience."
Anthony Hope ...	...	"Quisante."
Henry James ...	...	"The Soft Side."
Lucas Malet ...	...	"The Gateless Barrier."
Leonard Merrick	...	"The Worldlings."
George Moore ...	...	"Sister Théresa."
Arthur Morrison	...	"Cunning Murrell."
Max Pemberton	..	"The Footsteps of a Throne."
Eden Phillpotts	...	"Sons of the Morning."
Una L. Silberrad	...	"The Lady of Dreams."
Mary E. Wilkins	...	"The Heart's Highway."
Charlotte M. Yonge	...	"Modern Broods."
John Buchan ...	...	"The Half-Hearted."
Anna K. Green...	...	"The Circular Study."
Charles Lee ...	...	"Cynthia of the West."
Richard Pryce ...	...	"Jezebel."

There will also be new novels—the titles of which have not been announced—by Egerton Castle and Winston Churchill; a volume of short stories by Bret Harte, and "The Wisdom of the Wise," John Oliver Hobbes' comedy in three acts, which we understand will wait for the stage production till the autumn. Next week, too, there will be a new novel by Mr. Baring Gould, entitled "Winifred." The beginning of next year brings the first number of Mr. Hall Caine's novel "The Eternal City," which is to appear serially in Messrs. Pearson's new lady's magazine. Mr. Richard Whiteing's next novel may be ready before then, but the author is still feeling the effects of his long illness, and it is impossible to speak with certainty on the subject of his book. Another volume of stories by Mr. Thomas Hardy has been talked of for some time.

Publishers, at all events, are not forgetting the Indian frontier and its neighbourhood in the worry of South African and Chinese affairs. Besides Mr. Bruce's book on "The Forward Policy and its Results," announced by Messrs. Longmans last week, and the Afghanistan volumes to come from Mr. Murray, Messrs. Methuen promise a personal record, by Sir Thomas Holdich, of twenty years' service on "The Indian Borderland." The work is described as a personal history of trans-frontier surveys and boundary demarcations, beginning with Penjdeh and ending with the Pamirs, Chitral, and Tirah. It also includes an account of some of the minor frontier expeditions which have taken us into hitherto untrapped districts and added to our topographical and ethnographical knowledge of the trans-Indus frontier from Karachi to Kafiristan. Besides these minor expeditions Sir Thomas Holdich served in the Afghan war, 1878-80 (as well as the Bhootan and Abyssinian expeditions), and was frequently mentioned in despatches.

Commenting more than a month ago on the statement that the question of an "authorized biography" of Ruskin was occupying the attention of his literary executors, we remarked on the difficulty the biographer would have to face in competing with "Præterita," and also mentioned Mr. Collingwood's Life. It is now stated by "A Man of Kent" in the British Weekly, on the authority of Professor Norton himself, that no biography of Ruskin will be prepared with the consent or aid of the literary executors on the very ground that "Præterita" and Mr. Collingwood's biography sufficiently cover the field. This, however, we imagine, does not preclude the publication of Ruskin's diaries, notes, and autobiographic fragments, and of a selection of the correspondence under proper editorial supervision.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are publishing "The Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed," a work which vindicates British policy, although it is written by a Transvaal burgher. The author is Mr. C. H. Thomas, formerly a prominent burgher of the Orange Free State and one of the best-known citizens of Belfast in the Transvaal. Mr. Thomas is intimately acquainted with all the leading Transvaal officials and generals, and he believes that the Boers have been betrayed and misled by the Hollander clique, and the object of his book is to "unmask the conspiracy of the nineteenth century."

According to the Daily Chronicle, Messrs. Chapman and Hall announce yet another edition of Dickens, the feature of which (it is stated) will be "the inclusion of all the illustrations which were made for the Dickens writings as they first appeared," printed from the original plates. Surely there is nothing distinctive about this. The recently-completed Gadshill edition, with Mr. Andrew Lang's introductions and notes (published by the same firm), was characterized by the same feature, and was thus announced in the prospectus:—"All the original etchings and woodcuts by Seymour, Hablot K. Browne, and Cruikshank, which appeared in the first editions of Dickens' works, and which are inseparably associated in the minds of the reading public with the characters created by Dickens, will be used in the Gadshill edition." The prospectus also states that "the publishers have in their possession unused duplicates in fine condition of many of the steel plates of the original illustrations, and the impressions will be taken from these plates." In what respect, therefore, the forthcoming edition will differ from the Gadshill edition it is difficult to imagine, and we can only surmise that the new issue will prove to be a cheaper reprint of the latter, printed from stereos, with possibly lithographic transfers of the etched plates.

Miss Cholmondeley's readers have been puzzling their inquiries into the origin and signification of the title of "Red Pottage," and have driven the publishers to have recourse to the author herself for authoritative information. The origin and the significance of this title might have been supposed to be sufficiently obvious, though many persons better read in fiction than in the Bible seem to have forgotten that the mess of pottage for which Esau sold his birthright is called "red pottage" in the Scripture. "And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage." Nor is the motto very obscure either—"After the red pottage the exceeding bitter cry." Esau's lapse led to Jacob's inheritance, and it was when Esau heard the words of his father, that the blessing had been already given to his younger brother, that "he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry." Miss Cholmondeley, however, cannot remember where she got her motto from, and suggests a search through the sermons of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom? One would scarcely have thought any authority were necessary for so simple a synthesis. So much for the origin. The significance such as it is is equally obvious. The young man sells his birthright of love and paternity and forfeits his blessing.

The fourth volume of poetry in the new edition of Byron will probably be ready in October. It includes "The Prisoner of Chillon," "Manfred," "Beppo," "Mazeppa," "Vision of Judgment," "Marino Faliero," &c., and will be followed by the fifth volume of the letters—1820 to 1822.

A volume of "Unpublished and Uncollected Poems of William Cowper," edited by Mr. Thomas Wright, is to be added to Mr. Fisher Unwin's Cameo Series. Of the twenty-eight poems, fragments, or couplets included in the volume some have never been published, some have been published only in part, some are passages which for various reasons were cancelled by Cowper, and some have appeared only in periodicals not now easily accessible. The next volume in Mr. Unwin's Library of Literary History will be "A Literary History of America," by Barrett Wendell, Professor of English at Harvard College.

In the list of some of Dr. Robertson Nicoll's literary aliases given in the last number of the Review of the Week (now to be numbered among the sixpenny weekly reviews) there is a misunderstanding which will be amusing to all who are familiar with the signature. "Claudius Clear." "Dr. Robertson Nicoll," it wrote, "otherwise Claudius, Clear Man of Kent, and other picturesque synonyms." The amusing part of it is that Dr. Robertson Nicoll is not by any means a "clear man of Kent." It is generally understood that, so far from being a native of one of the southernmost and most English of counties, Dr. Nicoll is one of the many able and industrious littérateurs who have come to us from across the Northern border. Among the other literary positions filled by him he was, we observe, the Friar of the Whitefriars Club chosen to speak in Mr. George Meredith's honour at the club meeting recently held in Mr. George Meredith's country. He found occasion to remind his audience that George Eliot was in her time too, like himself, a "pluralist reviewer." She reviewed "The Shaving of Shagpat" both in the Leader and the Westminster Review. George Eliot, in her reviews, compared the book to its advantage with Beckford's "Vathek," and said it might be called "The Thousand and Second Arabian Night."

Publishers, apparently, remain unmoved by Mr. Miller's prophecy that Omarism "is as certainly doomed to speedy extinction as the 'greenery-yallery, Grosvenor Gallery' cult which was in vogue a few years ago." Notwithstanding the number of editions of the Rubáiyát already in the market, Messrs. Methuen—grateful, perhaps, for the mild sensation caused by Mr. Miller's article and the correspondence which it created—announce another edition of the book, with a commentary by H. M. Batson and a biography of Omar by Professor Ross. FitzGerald's last text is given—by permission of Messrs. Macmillan—and there will be a full commentary. The biography by Professor Ross contains, it is said, many new and valuable facts.

It would be interesting to know how many copies of Darwin's "Origin of Species" have been printed since the book was first published, about forty years ago. Mr. Murray informs us that some hundreds of thousands of copies at least have been sold. The work will be out of copyright in a couple of years or so, and the publisher, taking time by the forelock, has decided to issue during the coming autumn an edition in large type, well bound and well printed, at a price which will bring it within the reach of all—half-a-crown.

Mr. Edward Arnold writes:—"In your interesting bibliography of books on China you do not mention Mr. Arnot Reid's work, "From Peking to Petersburg" (7s. 6d.), published in 1899, which ought not, I think, to be omitted."

Another series of brief biographies is announced, this time by Messrs. Methuen. The first two volumes of the "Little Biographies," as the new series is called, will be "The Life of Savonarola," by E. L. Horsburgh, and "The Life of Dante Alighieri," by Paget Toynbee.

The Antiquary for August will devote an article to "King Alfred as a Man of Letters," by Warwick H. Draper.

The demand for the revised edition of Alexis Krausse's "China in Decay," which was only published a fortnight ago, has been so great that the whole of the impression is already exhausted. Messrs. Chapman and Hall have a third edition in the press, which will be available in the course of a few days.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The orders for "The Times History of the War in South Africa" are coming in so rapidly that there is some possibility that the list at the reduced price may be very suddenly closed. It is at present being kept open to allow of the replies from South Africa and the other colonies. It must be borne in mind that the continuation of the war may render a sixth volume necessary, and this may induce the publishers to raise the price to meet the extra expense. Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Alfred Milner, and Lord Wolseley have given sittings for special portraits. Among the contributors are Miss Flora Shaw, Mr. W. F. Monypeny, Mr. Arnold Forster, M.P., Mr. Lionel James, Mr. Percival Landon, Mr. Bron Herbert, Major A. W. Pollock, Major Hunter Weston, Captain Nathan, R.E., and General Sir W. Nicholson. The whole is edited by Mr. L. S. Amery, who has himself written the greater portion of the first volume. Mr. Amery is expected in London on August 17.

* * * *

Let us congratulate Mr. E. F. Knight on the complimentary dinner given to him by his colleagues of the Press at the Hotel Cecil. Not every war correspondent oversteps the boundary line which separates the reporter from the man of letters; but the tendency is in that direction, as those know who have followed the work not only of G. W. Steevens, but also of Mr. Winston Churchill, Mr. Julian Ralph, the ebullient Mr. Hales of the Daily News, and Mr. Knight himself. Mr. Knight, in fact, was already a well known writer before he became a war correspondent. His accounts of his cruises in the Falcon and the Alerte belong to literature, and he combines, like the great B.-P., the talents, seldom found together, of the man of action and the man of letters.

There has been a Press Congress this week at the Paris Exhibition, and we can only express our hope that the journalists of the different countries have mutually instructed each other, and that the interchange of suggestions may have done something towards the evolution of the ideal newspaper. At any rate, it is certain that the journalists of every nation have something to learn from the journalists of other nations. If France could learn from England the advantage of knowing something of the subject you are writing about, we should not find the French military experts advising the Boers to destroy lines of railway which do not exist; and if England could learn literary polish from France, some of our cheaper daily papers would be better written. Germany, again, might very well take lessons in sub-editing from America; while America might well take lessons in self-respect from Germany. But the probability is that nobody will learn anything from anybody, seeing that every country has the sort of Press, as it has the sort of police, that it deserves.

When we wrote a few weeks ago of the forthcoming bicentenary celebration of James Thomson, the poet of "The Seasons," the weather scarcely befitted the summer of which the poet sang. Happily the season mended in time, and the celebration took place at Ednam, Thomson's birthplace, near Kelso, on Friday of last week, under a sky worthy of any summer poet's pen. It was, within its modest limits, completely successful. Visitors, under the guidance of the Edinburgh Border Counties Association, were driven to the places of interest in the neighbourhood, and speeches, some of undue length, in praise of the poet were delivered in a "haugh" or riverside meadow by Sir George Douglas, of Springwood-park, Kelso, whose cultivated interest in border life as well as in literature generally is well known; by Dr. Morel, of Paris, a biographer of the poet; and by Judge Willis. There was afterwards a dinner at the local hotel, where, if there was less Scotch whiskey and Scotch enthusiasm than at a typical "nicht wi' Burns," there was nevertheless whiskey and enthusiasm.

William Morris was a great democrat, though he did not write the sort of books that the democracy delights in; and it is a graceful act on the part of the family of the late Mr. Edward Lloyd to hand over to the public "for ever" the house in which the idle singer of an empty day was born. Their action secures to the public not only a house but also an "open space"—a faint reminder of the "merrie England" in which Morris rejoiced beyond the majority of poets.

We endorse Mr. Andrew Lang's complaint in Longman's Magazine against those who "pursue literature vicariously" by inviting him to inform them what were his experiences of collaboration, and whether he often had rows with his collaborator. But we may also congratulate Mr. Lang on the fact that his experience of this sort of thing has been small in comparison with that of some other men of letters. He might have been one of the men of letters invited by the editor of a popular magazine to plunge their feet into pudding basins full of gelatinous matter in order that the public might guess their stiffen from their soles. We exposed this conspiracy some time ago, and it never came to anything—probably in consequence of the exposure and the chorus of derisive comment which it aroused. But it was a very real conspiracy; and we know, though we do not mention, the name of a prominent canon of the Church of England who actually yielded to the editorial blandishments and stamped in the offensive mixture.

There is criticism for all tastes nowadays, and also for no taste at all. Mr. Henley and Mrs. Meynell, for example, have both been having their say about Ruskin's criticism; and neither deliverance is much to the taste of Mr. Lang, who writes about it in Longman's Magazine in his usual agreeable vein of raillery. Mrs. Meynell thinks that Ruskin's work may be likened to a sidereal sky beheld from an earth upon the wing. Mr. Henley, on the other hand, holds that Ruskin uplifted his voice and throned nonsense—tonsense all the time for many years and through interminable volumes. Mr. Henley, by the way, has been giving vent to some equally downright views in the last few numbers of the Pall Mall Magazine. Shelley, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Ruskin, Rossetti, and Mr. Swinburne lie now for Mr. Henley in a crumpled heap, with Byron standing erect at the beginning of the century and Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson at the end. It is quite a comfort to think that poor Matthew Arnold's ear is closed in death; these critical violences used to vex him.

What would Sir Henry Irving or any theatrical manager say to Manfred if it were submitted as the work of a writer of to-day? They would say that it was unactable, and they would be quite right. What can have made Sir Henry Irving say that he had thoughts of producing Lord Byron's gloomy and verbose drama? Of course it has been acted. Phelps appeared in it in 1863, and Charles Dillon played Manfred so lately as 1873. But there is no dramatic power or interest in the play. The enormously long speeches of which Manfred delivers himself on every possible occasion are not easy to read for long. On the stage they would very soon become tedious. Of course there would be plenty of scope for elaborate scenery and theatrical device. Alpine castles and singing spirits and chamois hunters would give the costumier and the scene painter and the chorus master a good opportunity.

Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. Tree seem to have realized that The King of the Jews would be an unsuitable name for the poetic play which the former has written and the latter purchased. It is now stated that the piece will be called Herod the King.

Miss Lucy Snowe's "Two Stage Plays" (Brimley Johnson) are the kind of amateur attempts at writing for the theatre of which most theatrical managers' cupboards are full. They are quite unstageable—that is to say, they would have very little effect on the stage and they are not very interesting from the merely literary point of view. Of the two Bondage is the better. It is modelled more or less on Ibsen lines, and it also suggests Strindberg. It may be gathered from this that humour is not Miss Snowe's strong quality. Her talent is for scenes of gloom, not for society. In the other play there are scenes meant to be satirical, but the satire is of the obvious kind. The neat little volume, one of the first to issue with Mr. Brimley Johnson's imprint, is a disappointment. But it was unreasonable to expect to meet such another virginal surprise as Mr. Sutro's Cage of Idlers.

In the preface to the sixpenny edition of "Aylwin" Mr. Watts-Dunton tells us the origin of his gipsy heroine, Sinfi Lovell. She is a real person—"the gipsy girl described in the introduction to 'Lavengro,'" written by Mr. Dunton some eight years ago.

"On that occasion," says Mr. Dunton, "I gave a slight sketch of the most remarkable 'Romany Chi' that had ever been met with in the part of East Anglia known to Borrow and myself. Sinfi Lovell. I described her playing on the erwth; I discussed her exploits as a boxer, and I contrasted her in many ways with the glorious Anglo-Saxon road-girl, Isopel Berners."

Many correspondents have written to Mr. Watts-Dunton to inquire whether the two gipsy girls are identical; and now their curiosity is gratified.

In the People's Friend Mr. A. H. Millar, famous for his daring views about Omar Khayyam, maintains the thesis that "The Fudge Family in Edinburgh," usually attributed to Thomas Moore, was really written by John Gibson Lockhart. The first part of the case, at any rate, seems to be pretty clearly made out. Moore was living in Paris when it was published; he had never been to Scotland; it was exceedingly unlikely that he would have dealings with an Edinburgh publisher, or possess the intimate knowledge which the poem displays of "the leading society people and the notable places in Edinburgh and Glasgow in 1820." Moreover, Moore's regular pseudonym for poems of the "Fudge" class was "Thomas Brown the Younger," and one fails to understand why he should have adopted the pseudonym of "Nehemiah Nettlebottom" for this single jeu d'esprit.

* * * *

On the other hand the presumption of Lockhart's authorship is only arrived at by a process of exhaustion in seeking an answer to the question, "Who was the literary man of the period most likely to write such a series?" Lockhart, at any rate, had the local knowledge, the talent, and the satirical habit; but there is no direct evidence of his authorship. Mr. Millar sums up the probabilities as follows:—

> Lockhart travelled on the Continent in 1816-17, and may have thought of imitating Moore's Paris book (The "Fudge Family in Paris"), boldly appending Moore's pseudonym; but afterwards he probably altered his plan and transferred the Fudges to more familiar ground. While there is no definite proof that Lockhart wrote this volume of poetical epistles, the cumulative evidence is very striking.

This would not be an absolutely unique instance of the appropriation by an author of another author's characters. We remember a pseudo-Pickwick who distinguished himself by Continental travel.

Though naturally disappointed that the second reading of the Copyright Bill has been postponed, the promoters of the measure are fairly sanguine that in another Session it will become law. A general election would not be likely to affect its prospects, as all the Parliamentary supporters of the Bill would in all probability be re-elected. Meantime, the Bill has reached the hands of the members, and there are those who expect that it will be one of the first matters settled when the next Session begins.

The new edition of Mr. Herbert Spencer's "First Principles" contains the announcement that Mr. Herbert Spencer is no less sure that he is right in his view of the universe now than he was when he began to formulate his philosophy, forty years ago.

> Neither the objections made by others [he says] nor further considerations of my own have caused me to recede from the general principles set forth. Contrariwise.

And that, of course, is as it should be. It would, indeed, be a tragic occurrence if a philosopher, who had embarked upon the exposition of a system on the scale of Mr. Herbert Spencer's, and was having the plates stereotyped, were to be converted to Neo Kantianism (like the man in the story that Mr. W. L. Courtney wrote for the Oxford Magazine) when his task was uncompleted. But this is a calamity by which philosophers, being careful people who think before they speak, are not very often overtaken. Philosophy, in fact, is more a matter of temperament than of research; and we have good authority for the statement that every man is born either a Platonist or an Aristotelian. Read Evolutionist for Aristotelian, and Neo Kantian for Platonist, and the statement is still true to-day.

An interesting feature of the edition is the advertisement of the numbers sold of Mr. Herbert Spencer's other philosophical works. "First Principles" is in its tenth thousand, "Principles of Biology" in its sixth thousand, "Principles of Psychology" in its fifth thousand, and "Principles of Ethics" only in its second thousand. Evidently of the many contagious readers who attack Mr. Herbert Spencer's system, only 20 per cent. have sufficient staying power to master it. The others drop out of the race like the sportsmen in the first canto of "The Lady of the Lake":—

And when the Brigg of Turk was won,
The headmost horseman rode alone.

One notices further that Mr. Herbert Spencer's books sell most widely when they do not form an integral part of the synthetic system. "Education" is in its 19th thousand, "The Study of Sociology" in its 21st thousand, and "The Man and the State" in its 11th thousand. These, at any rate, are figures which many more frivolous writers will envy.

The Bishop of London has been advising a body of schoolgirls to read three books written before 1800 for each one written after that date. This is going further than the familiar counsel of perfection that, whenever a new book is proffered, you should read an old one. As a general recommendation of the classics in preference to the ephemeral literature of the day, especially during the years of education, when taste is being formed, the Bishop's advice may pass as not only true, but trite. Taken for anything more than that it will not do at all, unless the counsellor will condescend to particulars. He would hesitate, we are sure, to recommend to the young ladies in place of "Pickwick" the perusal of "Roderick Random," "Peregrine Pickle," and "Humphrey Clinker." Perhaps after all it was his Lordship's little ruse. Guessing that the girls would not altogether, even on his advice, abandon their modern romances, he calculated that by this simple rule of three they would in time consume the whole course of the classics.

Last year a delegation of Bretons paid a visit to Wales in recognition of the common ancestry of the Welsh and Breton race. More than sixty thousand Welsh were present at the Cardiff fêtes, when many of the old Celtic rites and ceremonies were revived. Amongst the Bretons were the Marquis de l'Estourbeillon, Comte Le Gonidec de Tressan, Charles Le Goffic, Anatole le Braz, the well-known author whose books have been translated into English, Jean le Fustec, the Breton novelist, and the poet Durocher. A return visit to France has just been made by the Welsh, and a concert was given at the Paris Exhibition by two hundred members of the Welsh united choirs, conducted by Mrs. Clara Novello Davies, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Farr. The Welsh songs were given in that language, the audience applauding enthusiastically, and the Marseillaise was sung at the end of the concert.

Prices generally ruled very low at Messrs. Sotheby's sale last week, but the most marked falling off was in the value of the Kiplings. The following were among the more important books sold:—"Chronicon Nurembergense," fine copy, 1493, £6 15s.; "Rudimentum Novitiorum," Lubeck, 1475, the first book printed at that town, fine copy, £15; Manning and Bray, "History of Surrey," 1804-14, £16; Boydell, "Shakespeare Gallery," 1803, £15; Richardson, "Clarissa," first edition, 1748, £5; White, "Natural History of Selborne," fine copy of the first edition, 1789, £9; Ruskin, "Stones of Venice," first edition, £11 10s.; Stevenson, "The Pentland Rising," the rare little print of 1866, £5 5s.; Thackeray, "Vanity Fair," first edition, an excellent copy, £2; Swinburne, "Grace Darling," the privately printed edition of 1893, £1; Kipling, "The United Services College Chronicle," Nos. 1 to 58, £5 7s. 6d.; "Departmental Ditties," first edition, a perfect copy, £1 1s.; "School Boy Lyrics," first edition, a soiled copy, £3 5s.; Kelmscott Books, "Keats," £27 10s.; "Gothic Architecture," a copy on vellum, £8. Shakespeare, "First Folio," much cut down, and repaired in places, but otherwise in very good condition, £252.

An interesting guide-book has upon our table by Mary Cholmondeley Jones, "European Travel for Women," published in America by the Macmillan Company, and to Travelling much interest has it the writer's recognition that and Reading. American travellers still make holiday, to "read up" the countries and cities which they propose to visit. This is certainly the period which to set out upon a journey; and there is evidently much of that spirit in the United States than in any other civilized country. The typical English impression of the American tourist is of a man in a hurry, who, having arrived at a show-place, whether it be the Great Cow at the Lucerne, does not wait to admire the snow peaks or the pasture, but merely notes to himself that they are there, checking the statements of the guide-book in the same manner in which he would check the items in an invoice of goods delivered. There is, however, another, and a very large, class of Americans towards whom this tour is seriously and expect other people to do the same. We have heard such an American reproved in England for leaving with levity in the Castle of Chillon. "You will pardon me, sir," he said in accents of mingled pain and indignation, "but you do not seem to be aware that your Byron [illegible] a considerable point about this publicity." The speech was in the American language, but it was in the spirit of the eighteenth century; it kept alive, while it modified and brought up-to-date, the point of view of the dean of the grand tour. Not all the travellers of those days, of course, were men of culture and refinement who regarded travel as a part of education to which a knowledge of books was a desirable preliminary. There were exceptions to the rule furnished, among other instances, by the Scotsman who had nothing to report of a visit to Voltaire except that he did not like the way in which Voltaire carved a pheasant, and by Lullow the recluse who thought the Royal stables the only things worth going to see in Paris, and whose account of his travels only rises to real eloquence when he records the discovery of a Stabat Mater in which rests to himself. As a rule, however, the travellers of the age of the grand tour did get up their subjects before they started on their travels. One sees from the writings of Addison, Bishop Burnet, Archdeacon Coxe, and others, how much better they enjoyed their travels for having done so; and one congratulates American upon preserving the tradition. In England it is now to some extent following Macaulay's example of reading up a subject for one by his hands on shelves a city before he goes to it. In the United States, as the publishers know to their cost, those who are about to travel often buy up quite a small library and study it before they take their tickets. It is necessary, no doubt, the habit is the result of their comparatively recent European travel is such a much bigger enterprise for them than for us that they naturally like it more seriously, desiring to accumulate in the course of a spring and summer memory-pictures that will last them for the remainder of their lives. But the practice is a good one—everybody should read up a subject for pleasure, in moderation, and not to the extent of mind-cramming preparing to satisfy examiners. Publishers have been doing something of late to encourage the practice by the publication of what is called the pictorial guide-book. We are obliged to them, and we hope the experience has proved profitable; but we are not sure that the pictorial guide-book is all that is wanted. What we want is more attempts at the vivifying process of historical interest to which Sir Walter Besant refers, whether by full historians or learned antiquarians, but by writers who really have the gift of style, and the power of painting the past. We suggest, and we are inclined to think that [illegible] historical novelists—would be the best people to write them. At all events, remembering what Sir Walter Besant has done by bringing the talents of the novelist to bear on the history of London, we should like to see other novelists whom we could name trying what they could do for Rome, for Florence, for the old cities of Flanders and Provence, and for Geneva.

A DIRGE.

I.

Wind and rain at the break of day,
Wind and rain from the sea ;
Mist on the mountains far away,
And a broken heart for me :
Blow wind, blow up from the weeping West,
Blow wind and rain from the sea ;
For the soul I love in the wide world best
Can never return to me.

II.

Foam and spray for evermore,
Foam and spray from the sea ;
Wreck-wood strewn on the wind-swept shore,
Wreck-wood strewn for me :
Sweep on O clouds, from the stormy West,
Sweep onward over the sea ;
For the soul I love in the wide world best
Can never return to me.

III.

Wail of waves on the moaning strand,
Wail of waves from the sea ;
And a lifeless form on the cruel sand,
And a loveless life for me :
Cry out O bird to the troubled West,
Cry out to the angry sea ;
For the soul I love in the wide world best
Can never return to me.

IV.

Silent grave and lonely Cross
Lonely Cross by the sea,
Emblem alike of gain and loss,
Anchor of hope to me :
Blow, wind, blow up from the weeping West,
Blow wind and rain from the sea ;
Till the soul I love in the wide world best,
Is given again to me.

Personal Views.

PLEASURES OF MEMORY.

In spite of Sheridan's remark about easy reading and hard writing, it is probably true that we read with most pleasure what gave most pleasure in writing. I am using the word pleasure in a somewhat restricted sense. Nobody who picked his phrases would say that he read with pleasure, for example, the scene of Lear's madness, any more than he would call the Agamemnon a pleasant play. The emotion of the audience must have some kinship to the emotion of the artist, and what is composed under a violent stress of feeling, or painfully elaborated in thought, cannot play lightly and agreeably on the chords of our nature. And the things in literature that we value most—or since this is a personal view let me say, that I value most—have separated themselves not without bitter travail from the labouring brain of their creator. These were never the pleasant writing that makes pleasant reading. And yet there are certain works, among the most beautiful in all literature, which come by a special grace easily into life, all the nature of things working with the artist rather than impeding him. Who would care to decide which is the finer of the two great passages in "Richard Feverel"—the idyll of the lovers' first meeting, or the drama of Richard's return and Lucy's forgiveness? And yet the one comes evidently like iron from the anvil, shaped through fire; the other grows like a flower, if a flower could be imperishable. The reason of the difference is plain enough. In the later scene the artist works single-handed; characters, setting, action, words are all born out of his own brain; but where Richard meets Lucy, nature makes her lavish contribution. There the background, the surrounding circumstance of summer beauty, with its ripeness of wild fruit, coolness of shade and water, heat of earth and air, is really more important than the human action. In such a landscape Richard and Lucy are merely figures inevitably drawn together; and in painting the landscape Mr. Meredith is evidently enough concerned only to revive and reconstitute nature's achievement. Memory rather than imagination is at work in him and his appeal is to our memory. Down those pleasant loitering byways he easily leads us, for our memories too are willing helpers in the re-construction of the scene. If that passage, however retouched and embellished, was not written at first in a rapture of enjoyment, my theory must go by the board; but, for the moment, my personal view is that it was so written and for that cause is perfectly enjoyable, entirely pleasurable.

And there are many things in literature, more particularly in prose fiction, which affect one, not indeed so powerfully but in the same way—passages where the writer gives the rein not to imagination but to memory. They are written in the spirit of a man who talks on his favourite sport—and, perhaps, the best of them are about sport. Trollope in his Autobiography owns that it was a grief to him if a story could not be so managed as to include a hunting chapter; he even ingenuously confesses that perhaps he indulged himself too much in this particular shape of reminiscent imagination. But the apology was little needed, for these chapters are always among the best in his books, and the pleasure of the stout gentleman who pounds laboriously but not ingloriously after the hounds in memory (as he did in the flesh) never fails to communicate itself. Charles Kingsley, too, was a wise man when he began "Yeast" with a meet of hounds and a hard run across country, for that stirring piece of narrative appeals alike to the literary and the unliterary by the writer's contagious enthusiasm. Yet far more attractive to me were the fishing episodes in that same book—contributions to one of the most fruitful among secondary literatures. You will find that the chalk stream runs all through "Yeast," and when Kingsley is tired of his Socialism, his game-laws, his theology, and all the other thorny subjects, he flies for rest in memory to the beloved banks of his river; and it is those passages, breathing the revived delight in the varying yet constant face of running water, the happy exercise of skill, and the excitement of a struggle in which man has very short odds against his game—it is those passages, I fear, that one remembers best in that stirring example of the novel with a purpose. Certainly in a kindred book (though of an infinitely inferior order), "Tom Brown at Oxford," there is nothing I read with pleasure except the tale of an evening's trout fishing and the swirling rise of a great fish that sucked down a bee. There, at all events, Tom Hughes was writing about an emotion which he could communicate to whoever has loved trout and trout streams with the curious affection that allies itself to the desire to kill.

Fishing must have some special quality apart from other sports that makes its delight peculiarly communicable on paper. One does not readily recall any special page that revives the charm of snipe shooting; cricket has often been treated in fiction, and by those who loved it, yet never, I think, with such shores; whereas the fisherman has endless pages that may be relied on to awaken the pleasures of unpublished memory. The title Mr. William Black, who was perhaps not a very strenuous artist, nevertheless endeared himself to a large section of the kind in this way; one has killed many a fine salmon, many a sporting brilse in his pages, with a pleasure not unlike the reality. And the truth is that the charm of Mr. Black's books—which I maintain is a very real charm—lay just in the strength of his continual appeal to memory. The faculty was obviously very strong in him, and vivid effects, the spring of a boat on the waves, the enchanting brick of a running reel, the colour of heather and bracken, the shape of wind-warped pine trees, all haunted his fancy perpetually as if they were present, and this perception of things in themselves delightful was easily transmitted. What with Trollope or Kingsley were accidental episodes made with Black the main stuff of the narrative; it was all pleasant writing and at least for one who had the same fund of memory to draw on, who loved sea and heather, it was very pleasant reading. He had the art to make his personages picturesque—in some of the earlier novels, notably the "Daughter of Heth" they were quite extraordinarily effective—but they never became dramatic and predominant; the sailing or the fishing or the driving was always the essential thing. It is a lazy way to work, no doubt; but still it a man has the gift to call up to my mind pleasant things that he has seen or done, and set me thinking of pleasant things that I have done or seen, I do not grudge to write him down among my benefactors; and for the pleasures of memory as reflected in fiction I am most indebted to Mr. William Black next after Charles Kingsley.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

THE STORY OF ROMEO AND JULIET.

It is no wonder that Shakespeare should have chosen the story of Romeo and Juliet as the subject of one of his earliest plays, for no variant of the legend of hapless love is more widely diffused. Folklorists are often disposed to exaggerate the range of a particular fable; thus Herr Simrock in his remarks on Shakespeare's plays maintains that Romeo and Juliet is one of a series which includes Hero and Leander, Pyramus and Thisbe, and Tristram and Isolt, although these have nothing in common but the misery of the lovers. There is, indeed, a potion in Tristram, but it is not the narcotic draught which may be designated the distinctive sign of the Romeo and Juliet group. This wide sweep of the drag-net is apt to lead to confusion rather than comprehension, and a clearer notion of the inter-relation of the separate versions will be reached by dealing only with those which share the sign aforesaid.

Its earliest recorded appearance is the one in the romance by Xenophon Ephesius, "The Loves of Anthia and Abrocomas." When Xenophon lived, and how his story passed over into Italy, is uncertain; possibly it was first told by some fugitive Greek scholar, and thus came to the ears of the Italian novelist. The lovers are wedded and depart on a journey during which they are separated and suffer unspeakable woes. Anthia is rescued from robbers by the Governor of Cilicia, and drinks the drowsy potion to escape distasteful nuptials with her deliverer. Boccaccio probably took from this romance the idea of Decameron II., 7, but in his story the Princess of Babylon, in the course of her many trials, is displayed as a cunning amorous minx, as far removed as possible from the marble purity of Anthia, and Boccaccio, unlike Xenophon, tells the story end happily. The complete legend first appears in modern form in "Mariotto and Gianozza," the thirty-third novel of Masuccio's "Novellino" first printed in 1476. Like Xenophon's lovers these unhappy ones go wandering about the East and Egypt, but unlike them they meet no more and perish miserably. Masuccio, a person indebtful of Gothic form, and consequently ignorant [illegible] grossly facetious, seeks to be lethal [illegible] both the [illegible] and the opposite [illegible] author the gayer vein [illegible] of Shakespeare. No other version appeared till 1535, when "Le Ghiribizzi," by Luigi da Porto, one gentleman, [illegible] which [illegible] from the [illegible] of Verona, and laid the [illegible] [illegible] the family enmities of the Montagues and Capulets.

In 1591 Girolamo Della Corte wrote a history of Verona in which the Italian story is expanded to a real epopee, a romance which has provided the scaffolding that the modern poet has borrowed from the historian, whereas [illegible] the reality on the other side. No tradition of the tragedy appears in any earlier historic record, and Dalla Corte gives no authority, simply remarking that he does not [illegible] the poem of a poet to whom the lovers were [illegible]. Another witness is Bandello, who, in a book of travels published in 1729, relates that in Verona he saw an old tomb in which were two coffins "sealed by the inscription yet legible appeared to contain the bodies of young Counts that had come by their Death in a very Tragical manner about three centuries before."

At some date previous to 1573 was written a tragedy "di Hadriana," by Luigi da Porto, which follows closely upon the lines of "La Giulietta," the time being shifted back to the age of King Latinus. The author declares that the plot is founded on an episode in local history, and in this most [illegible] garrulous [illegible]. Da Porto having made Giulietta attended a young girl and her [illegible]. Bandello, in his "Novelle," printed in 1554, was [illegible] of having given it publishing a rendering of the story which [illegible] a paraphrase of Da Porto's, and [illegible] the [illegible] plagiarizing even the asserted origin thereof, [illegible] that the tale was told to him at the baths of Calmo by a certain Peregrino, Da Porto's account being that Peregrino, a Veronese captain, had told it as they journeyed together to Udine. The personality of the nurse is further developed by Bandello, as she appears as a good old woman and not as a girl. The legend passed into France by at least three different routes. It appears in the prologue to a French translation of Bandello's "Filicopo" (1573). Boaistuau's genial use [illegible] in the collection of "Histoires Tragiques" by Belleforest (1581); and in "Les Comptes du Monde Adventureux" (1555). Matteo's novel is [illegible] Brooke. From Belleforest Painter took the story—"Rhomeo and Julietta," in which the moral between the [illegible] and becomes in the tragic is completely changed. Painter, like Masuccio, puts the lovers [illegible] there is no mutual recognition at the last, as Romeo dies of poison before Juliet awakes [illegible]. But of the [illegible] controversy we have [illegible] the priority of Shakespeare gives one [illegible] from the confusion of an [illegible] is one [illegible] surpassing beauty and pathos in the Romeo and Juliet of the lyric drama. It is almost certain that Shakespeare drew more freely for the plot of his play upon Arthur Brooke's poem "Romeus and Juliet" (1562) than upon any other work. Brooke, as well as Painter, took most of Romeo and Juliet, though Boaistuau is [illegible], and of Masuccio with [illegible] hands. He has added [illegible] to the [illegible] scene, and Mercutio is [illegible] the more striking [illegible] and making of the [illegible] Juliet [illegible] through both Romeo and Paluria, [illegible] declare him to be "a gentle Dan, worthy [illegible] prise," and "a very [illegible]". Indeed, the [illegible] of Shakespeare's [illegible] Painter gave a [illegible] to Brooke's version in [illegible]. The closest [illegible], however, of Shakespeare's [illegible] Brooke may be found in the [illegible] of the [illegible] practically transferred entire from the poem to the play. The [illegible] and [illegible] verses are [illegible]. Brooke makes her second [illegible] from the inevitable "old gossiping" of the Italian Novelle, while Shakespeare leaves [illegible] in doubt, but in all essentials [illegible] the same.

The age of Juliet has always proved a tiresome crux to all the ladies who have essayed the part on the stage. It is well nigh an impossible task for a mature woman, however competent actress she may be, to mock the humours of a girl who had not seen "the change of fourteen years." In thus exaggerating her youth Shakespeare has outdone Brooke, who makes her two years older, while Painter and the Italians all speak of her as just under eighteen. Two Spanish dramatists have used the same plot, Lope de Vega in Castelvines y Monteses, and Francisco de Rojas in Los Bandos de Verona, and both bring their plays to a happy ending. The last named is much the finer piece of literary work. Many of the scenes are presented in beautiful and stately poetry, but in places—notably in the episode of the narcotic draught—the action is hopelessly confused. It is, however, the only rendering which fully elucidates the family feud. In both plays the father, when he beholds his reanimated daughter, takes her for a ghost, the dénouement in Lope's play being very ingeniously managed. The lovers fly together from the tomb, and seek shelter in an untenanted country house belonging to Juliet's father. But the father himself takes a second wife, and goes to spend the honeymoon there, whereupon the plot finds happy solution in forgiveness and reconciliation.

W. G. WATERS.

VICTOR HUGO.

There is still a public for Victor Hugo in England, if not in France. One may safely infer as much as that when one finds Mr. Dent publishing a new illustrated translation, in ever so many volumes (2s. 6d. net each), of his novels. It would not have occurred to Mr. Dent, or to any other publisher for that matter, to sink his capital in a similar reissue of the works of Paul de Kock, or Chateaubriand, though their popularity was hardly less than Victor Hugo's while it lasted. But the author of "Les Misérables" remains in favour, in spite of the shifting winds of literary fashion; and we are tempted to spend a little time in wondering why. Our impression—derived mainly from a recollection of the way in which the novels affected us when we read them uncritically, with other "yellowbacks," in our schooldays—is that they owed their great success to qualities quite different from those to which the novelist evidently attached most importance. We never knew with any certainty what they were about; we never followed the ramifications of the plots as we followed those of the Waverley novels; the characters were never real to us like the characters of Dickens and Thackeray; and as for the great moral ideas—we did not even know that they were there. In a way, indeed, and in places, we found the works of Victor Hugo as obscure as those of Persius or Mr. Meredith—no doubt because they embodied a symbolism to which we had not got the key. But we turned to his books, again and again, in search of one particular sensation which they could always be relied upon to provide. They made our flesh creep, as did the books of no other writer except Edgar Allan Poe; they seemed most real just when they were most appalling; for the sustained horror of such scenes as the fight with the octopus and the adventure in the quagmire of the sewers it was worth while to plough through many pages of apparently extraneous matter. To re-read the books now is to revive many memories of many nightmares, but no memory of any intelligible story or any lucid idea which the story symbolized.

At the same time one cannot re-read the stories without feeling quite sure that it was by no means in order to make our flesh creep that Victor Hugo wrote them. Such a purpose would imply the possession of a sense of humour, and in that sense Victor Hugo was conspicuously lacking. One might as plausibly say that God in order to make people's flesh creep that Ezekiel drew his famous picture of the valley of dry bones. Hugo was as absolutely serious as any Hebrew prophet, and as firmly convinced that he had a message to deliver. One perceives this from the tone of his books, which is always the tone of a man who believes himself to be, as Kepler put it, "rethinking the thoughts of God"; one also perceives it from the way in which he is known to have comported himself in his daily life. He was the sort of man who would get up at a literary dinner and salute the Future in the name of the Past, or both in the name of the Present, according to the exigencies of the hour. He said in his old age that it was nothing less than his duty to go on producing verse and prose, in spite of the possibility that his powers were failing and that a good deal of his work might not be of the highest merit. It would be the duty of Posterity, he added, to go through his voluminous productions and separate the wheat from the chaff. And Posterity, by a strange and bitter irony, has decided that the wheat is represented not by the passages which embody the great moral ideas—which, after all, are put more concisely in the copybooks—but by the passages which make the reader's flesh creep.

The influence of Victor Hugo does not seem to have been at all proportionate to his popularity. His name marks the end, not the beginning, of a literary movement. Even in his lifetime the hungry generations had begun to tread him down. The romantic school is nowadays represented in France by M. Georges Ohnet, a writer whose works have about as much to do with literature as those of Mrs. Henry Wood. There proved to be greater vitality in the school of Balzac, whose traditions were inherited by Flaubert, by Guy de Maupassant, by Zola. Such disciples count; the disciples of Victor Hugo do not count. In France, at any rate, his influence is, for all practical purposes, extinct. It is only in England that he has had a disciple who has made a noise in the world. Is it necessary to say that that disciple is Mr. Hall Caine?

We do not suggest, of course, that Mr. Hall Caine has the appalling self-consciousness of Victor Hugo—that he aspires to be regarded as a literary high priest or supposes himself to be "rethinking the thoughts of God" when he is engaged upon a piece of literary composition. All that we mean is that Mr. Hall Caine, like Victor Hugo, shines in melodrama, and that his most conspicuous melodramatic idea is also to be found in Victor Hugo. In any novel by Mr. Hall Caine there is one great scene that habit has taught us to look for. It is the scene in which a thoroughly respectable person—he is generally some one of importance in the Isle of Man—announces, with much pomp of circumstance, that he is not so respectable as he appears to be, but has a secret sin upon his soul. And what is that but the great scene in "Les Misérables" in which M. Madeleine explains that he is really Jean Valjean? Whether Mr. Hall Caine took the scene from "Les Misérables," or got it through the medium of Mr. John Coleman's melodrama, with its fine outburst, "Here, take the fetters off those honest hands and place them upon mine," or arrived at it by independent cogitation, we do not know, nor does it greatly matter. The main thing is that the resemblance is there, and that it entitles Mr. Hall Caine to rank as a disciple of Victor Hugo.

SARA COLERIDGE.

Among the many notable names which appeared in Mr. Ellis Yarnall's pleasant reminiscences, published last year, not the least interesting is that of Sara Coleridge, the only daughter of the poet. Those who are familiar with her letters will be glad that the world should be reminded of one whose memory is hardly so green as it deserves to be. Sara Coleridge represented an ideal of womanhood which can never be out of date. In days when "Higher Education" had not become a practical question for women, she was an accomplished linguist, well read in classical as well as modern literature, a keen theologian, a literary critic of considerable originality and acumen.

Yet those who knew her best testify that she was seen to the highest advantage in her home life. For literary distinction she had little or no ambition. Her earliest work, the translation from Latin into English of Dobrizhoffer's "Account of the Abipones," was undertaken with the view of helping to defray her brother's college expenses. "Phantasmagorion" was written originally for the amusement of her own little son, and its publication was due to her husband's wish alone. It is strange now to turn over the pages of this well nigh forgotten fairy story, and try to imagine what the children must have been like who were thrilled by the adventures of the "slender princes," and "youthful maidens with braided tresses" whom the book describes in somewhat long-winded fashion. In later life Sara Coleridge's best intellectual powers were dedicated to the editing of her father's work, a task which devolved on her after the death of her husband and cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, to whom we owe the chronicle of the poet's delightful "Table Talk." Her life was not long enough for her to complete her labour of love, and the volume of Coleridge's poems, published in 1852, which bears on the title page her own and her brother Derwent's names as joint-editors, was completed by the latter alone. The labour involved in the collection and arrangement of Coleridge's scattered writings was very considerable, and Sara Coleridge threw into the work all that energy and enthusiasm of which she had so large a share. Deeply imbued as she was with admiration for her father's character and genius, she thought no trouble thrown away, if she might only vindicate his reputation as a thinker and teacher, and clear his name from the misconceptions and prejudices which had inevitably gathered round it. She aimed at being his interpreter no less than his editor.

Great as was Sara Coleridge's intellectual debt to her father, in her childhood she owed more to the influence of Wordsworth and Southey. In one of her latest letters, she speaks of the long walks she used to take with the former, about Rydal and Grasmere, and the conversations between him and her uncle Southey to which she would listen sometimes for hours. It was not so much any definite teaching that she received from either which left its impression on the girl's mind; but she was unconsciously and deeply influenced by the companionship of both. Of Southey she said that he was upon the whole the best man she had ever known.

Sara Coleridge was an ardent educationalist in the best sense of the word. She devoted herself heart and soul to the training of her children, and, to judge from the scattered references to the subject which appear in her letters, her opinions on it were well worth laying to heart. In those days, when education was hardly looked upon as a science, and no societies existed to teach parents how to bring up their offspring, she had to rely on experience and her native mother-wit rather than the counsels of authority. One is glad to know that her pains were not thrown away. Her son's career, though short, was brilliant, and full of promise for the future. It is probable that he owed much of his success to his mother, both directly and indirectly. They studied Homer, Pindar, Æschylus, and Plato together, and when absent, he would write to her for help and advice. His successes at Eton and Oxford strengthened the general impression that he was destined to add fresh honour to his distinguished name, but his early death prevented him from realizing the hopes centred on him.

Sara Coleridge's letters are perhaps more read nowadays than anything she published herself, but the touch of time is felt even upon them. The controversies with which they so often deal are mostly superseded. The literary criticisms they contain have been in some instances falsified, in others rendered superfluous, by the verdict of time. The events and persons with which they are concerned belong to a bygone day, and can no longer engross us. It is the personality of the writer which gives them their lasting charm. In her editorial work this necessarily occupies a subordinate place, nor would she have wished it otherwise for one moment:—

> Father, no amaranths ere shall wreathe my brow,
> Enough that round thy grave they flourish now!
> But love his roses mid my young locks braided,
> And what cared I for flowers of richer bloom?
> These, too, seemed deathless—here they never faded,
> But, drenched and shattered, drop into the tomb.

These lines of her own adequately express her feeling on this subject. But, in the letters, written with no thought of publication, we find the compliment to those portraits of Sara Coleridge which her friends have drawn for us. We can understand from them something of that personal charm of which these letters show her spoke so strongly, the almost masculine strength of her intellect, combined with perfect femininity of speech and thought, her sympathy, penetration, and depth of affection. Even those who only know her slightly recognise the beauty of her character. Mr. Yarnall writes of the gleam of genius in her face, a "radiant expression that gave one under a spell." Her nephew, the late Lord Coleridge, in his memorial notice of her son, Herbert, has endorsed the universal opinion. After enumerating her literary achievements, he adds, "And when to these endowments there is added great power of conversation, and remarkable personal beauty, it is easy to understand the striking impression she made on the society wherein her lot was cast. Those, however, who only saw her in society could not know how tender and feminine a nature lay under that bright and attractive exterior. Devoted to her husband and her children, full of warm family affection, and the greatest consideration for those whose interests and enjoyments were utterly unlike and inferior to her own, I can truly say of her that as I have never known any woman of learning and genius equal to hers, so I have very seldom known any one of a character in all things more noble and more beautiful." We owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Yarnall for restoring such a character to our minds. It is of too rare a type to be lightly forgotten.

CHINA.

In his preface to China and the Present Crisis, with Notes on a Visit to Japan and Corea (Simpkin), Lieut.-Col. Mr. Joseph Walton, M.P., disclaims all "literary pretensions"; and his book certainly is very far from literary in form. It consists in the main of a series of paragraphs, mostly only a few lines in length, each covered by some sub-editorial heading such as "possibilities of trade," "Chinese testing," "missionary work," "pawn shops"; and a good many of the paragraphs look as if they had been gathered from Consular reports and other works of reference. Whenever Mr. Walton arrives anywhere he pours out the statistics which [illegible] "The trade of Hankow is enormous and rapidly increasing." "The railways of Ceylon are owned by the Government." "The staple products of Corea are rice and beans," &c.—until one is reminded of the letters which Mr. Bowyer wrote home with the assistance of the Oxford guide-book. Interspersed, however, with these bald statements of fact, which a writer of "literary pretensions" would have relegated to footnotes or an appendix, we have an occasional good story, and a fair number of shrewd observations. The remarks, for instance, on Colonel Brooke's Chinese regiment are interesting, and show that some of the qualities of the "foreign devil" can be appreciated by the children of the oldest civilization in the world.

> These soldiers are paid eight dollars (Mexican) a month, in addition to rations. At the end of the month, when they received their money in full, without anything being deducted by the paymaster for what is known in China as "squeeze," they were greatly astonished. As the news of this unusual treatment spread, the number of [illegible]

There is also a grim humour in the story of the sinking of the Eldorado, the British steamer that was conveying Chinese troops when the war broke out.

> The captain, knowing there was no escape, was prepared to surrender, but the Chinese soldiers on board would not allow it. They preferred that the ship should be sunk and their lives lost there and then, rather than be subjected to the foreigners which they themselves are in the habit of inflicting upon prisoners, and which they imagined would be their fate if they fell alive into the hands of the Japanese. Capt. Tsuyama told us that the Kowshing was not torpedoed, as has been commonly reported, but sunk by shot and shell. The enemy knew that General Von Hanneken were the only European survivors. They saved their lives by plunging into the sea and swimming to the Japanese men-of-war. While they were thus endeavouring to escape, the Chinese soldiers on board their own steamer tried to shoot them, under the impression that their capture had been effected through the treachery of the British officers by the Japanese.

We come, at last, to a chapter in which Mr. Walton drops "to fact" and proceeds to generalize and to prescribe for the treatment of the crisis. His idea is, after restoring order, to rely upon the Viceroys, who have shown that they favour reform, and are willing to afford protection to foreigners.

These Viceroys, if in favour of reform, as I believe, should be included in the Government which must be formed under the protection of the Powers. To encourage them and to strengthen their hands, it should be distinctly intimated to the Viceroys that not only can they rely on receiving any assistance that may be necessary now, but that we will guarantee them the fullest protection hereafter should any attempt be made to inflict punishment upon them in consequence of their friendly action. The Chinese people could then, without fear of consequences, show their real views, and I am confident it would be found that the reformers are a not inconsiderable body.

It seems a plausible plan; but the questions remain whether the Powers can be brought into line about it, and whether a Chinese Government, bolstered up by the Powers, would prove to be stable. The general opinion is that such an arrangement would, at the best, only be temporary, and that, soon after the renewal of the policy of exploiting China in the interest of European trade, and the re-planting of unprotected European colonies in the interior of the country, other Boxers would arise, more formidable and better armed, and a fresh series of massacres be perpetrated. But all this, of course, is mere matter of conjecture. The optimistic and the pessimistic view are alike unsupported by any evidence that can reasonably be called conclusive. A good commercial map of China is bound up in Mr. Walton's book.

BYRON'S SINCERITY.

People are never tired of talking of Byron's pose, of Byron's Byronism, by which is meant his vanity, his affectations, his insincerities. Even Moore, his biographer and friend, fully equipped with all an Irishman's natural love of a lord, seems to have found it irritating that the lord should be an Adonis in looks, and a great poet as well. We cannot otherwise account for that vein of petty criticism, which Moore continually brought to bear on his benefactor and host. He never wearies of jotting down particulars as to Byron's temper, caprice, hysteria, parsimony, loss of beauty, and increase of girth. But, apart from this, Moore with all his genial Hibernianism, with all his sweet, pretty gifts, was about as capable of understanding the whole Byron as was Byron's servant Tita, say. Indeed, in the essential manly qualities, Tita was probably the better judge of the two. The critics, however, sheep-like, have trodden in Moore's footsteps, and Byron's Byronism has become an accepted fact.

And yet the truth is, that every succeeding volume of the Letters makes more clear the man's want of pose, his absolute sincerity. He was as sincere to all the world as all the world only dares to be when by itself. Every one of us is sincere when alone with our own soul, because then we have nothing to fear. But Byron never feared any one, or anything, and his birth, his position, and his genius coming to the aid of his unquestionably reckless courage rendered him perfectly independent of the opinion of others. Never does he take a pen in his hand but he expresses himself clearly, frankly, unalteringly, as men express themselves to each other in speech, but dare not write, and his brilliant, entertaining, gossiping letters are marvels of honesty and truth.

The fourth volume of the Letters, edited by Mr. Prothero for Byron's Works (Murray, 6s.), should not fail to win unprejudiced persons to this point of view. The letters begin with his arrival in Ravenna, November, 1816, after a summer spent with the Shelleys in Switzerland, and go down to March, 1820. They deal with the interesting period of his residence in Venice, with his notorious amours there, and with his introduction to and intimacy with La Guiccioli. On the side of his work they deal with the composition of "Manfred," of the last canto of "Childe Harold," and of the first four cantos of "Don Juan."

Incidentally, the letters present Byron in the character of a most solicitous and affectionate father, and these paternal qualities of his have scarcely been properly appreciated. They did not find much scope for development, as he was deprived of the society of Ada, his legitimate daughter, by his "moral Clytemnestra" (which is the phrase in which he usually refers to his wife); and Allegra, his natural child by Jane Clairmont, died in her sixth year. But all his references to both children are full of affection, and those to Allegra display a whimsical pride. The letter in which he informs his sister, the Hon. Mrs. Leigh, of Allegra's birth, has never been published before. We give a part of it:—

> (Florence, May 27, 1817.) . . . They tell me it [Allegra] is very pretty, with blue eyes and dark hair; and, although I never was attached nor pretended attachment to the mother, still in case of the eternal war and alienation which I foresee about my legitimate daughter, Ada, it may be as well to have something to repose a hope upon. I must love something in my old age, and probably circumstances will render this poor little creature a great, and perhaps my only comfort.

In another letter to his sister (Venice, August 3, 1817), he mentions her again:—

> My little girl, Allegra (the child I spoke to you of), has been with me these three months; she is very pretty, remarkably intelligent, and a great favourite with everybody; but, what is remarkable, much more like Lady Byron than her mother—so much so as to stupify the learned Fletcher and astonish me. Is it not odd? I suppose she must also resemble her sister, Ada; she has very blue eyes, and that singular forehead, fair curly hair, and a devil of a spirit—but that is Papa's.

The last paragraph in the volume also refers to Allegra, and occurs in a letter to Hoppner. We give it, although it has appeared before:—

> (Ravenna, March 31, 1820.) Allegra is prettier, I think, but as obstinate as a mule, and as ravenous as a vulture; health good, to judge of the complexion—temper tolerable, but for vanity and pertinacity. She thinks herself handsome, and will do as she pleases.

A whimsical account, surely, of a child only three years old, two months, and some days.

A good many passages in the letters which Moore thought advisable to omit are now restored, although we are still far from having the full text vouchsafed us. All the restored passages go to prove Byron's courage and candour. In Moore's Life there is a letter to Murray (Bologna, June 7, 1819), which concludes thus:—

> I never hear anything of Ada, the little Electra of my Mycenæ; the moral Clytemnestra is not very communicative of her tidings, but there will come a day of reckoning, even if I should not live to see it. . . . What a long letter I have scribbled!

But between the two last phrases is a passage concerning the suicide of Sir Samuel Romilly, whom Byron never forgave for the part he played in the drama of separation with Lady Byron, which is of interest:—

I have at last my [illegible] copy of [illegible]. When that [illegible] (take your choice, is not become and might be had) was doing the worst to upset everybody's [illegible], and blessing [illegible] also adding my readier, but [illegible] those [illegible] bringing desolation on my head, and destroying all my household gods, did I think that, in less than three years, a national event of [illegible] importance and [illegible] would [illegible] [illegible] coal, creating [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

the Latin, but with these are a large number of English compounds beginning with to. Amongst the most important English words in the G section is great, which with its compounds fills six pages. As with so many other important words, the derivation is quite uncertain. The use of great in numerals is curious; great gross means twelve gross, great hundred, a hundred and twenty. The magnus annus alluded to in the Fourth Eclogue of Virgil will be remembered. The word grave has at least three different origins, each with its series of historical examples. Grange has an interesting pedigree. To gravel, that is to bring to a nonplus, we find is as old as 1548: gravelled appears in a burial notice of 1582, but apparently the word was then used of an unmarried woman who lived as a married wife, or a mistress. Its use in a more innocent sense is quite modern, and began in India. If Dr. Murray is right, the word gravy is simply due to a misreading of Fr. grane, which is always used in the MS. cookery books for the same thing.

The I section contains several articles of importance for English thought or custom. Under Influence is much astrological lore, ranging from Chaucer to Ruskin. Would many sufferers from the dreaded scourge connect the word influenza with the stars? It is allied in popular thought with running at the nose and eyes, but the Italians used it for any "visitation" or epidemic. The relations of ingenious and ingenuous, inhuman and inhumane, deserve study. Several legal terms occur here also: information, injunction, inmate, innuendo, the last originally a parenthetic explanation. Farm lore may be found under infield. Besides ingle, the fire, there is another ingle, "to fondle," or a "fondling" used in a bad sense. The history of inoculate shows considerable changes of meaning, being used at first of engrafting or the like. Ink and inn are among the most remarkable words in this section. Ink is derived from encaustum (ἔγκαυστον), but coming from the O. Fr. enque it has never a longer form in English. An article of three columns on inn gives a good deal of new information on such matters as University hostels, Inns of Chancery and Inns of Court. As applied to a hostelry, the inn must be a place which gives lodging to travellers, not a mere tavern.

Amongst dead words which deserve to live we may note inlaw, the opposite of outlaw. There are fewer of those experiments in language which Dr. Murray calls nonce-words; but perhaps inhearing may be classed among them, invented by J. Wilson in 1828 and used by no other. This word, however, expresses a new idea idiomatically, and is different in principle from the would-be humorous compounds, formed by writers who lack the literary sense, some of which we have noted before as unworthy of a place in the Dictionary. We must not omit to mention some important grammatical articles on affixes, -gram, -graph, and especially -ing.

IBSEN'S "LOVE'S COMEDY."

LOVE'S COMEDY. By HENRIK IBSEN. Translated by C. H. HERFORD. (The Modern Plays Series.) (Duckworth, 3s. 6d.).

Ibsen is such a Titanic figure in modern literature that we are surprised some enterprising English publisher does not issue a complete and uniform edition of his works. Meanwhile we welcome this admirable rendering of Kærlighedens Komedie which is here for the first time rendered accessible to the general reader. The lapse of years since the play was written has a little impaired its vitality; its interest and value now rest to be found in the position it occupies in the long list of Ibsen's productions.

Love's Comedy was produced at Christiania in 1862. It was the first of Ibsen's purely polemical works. In the two dramas which preceded it you will, it is true, find traces of the writer with a message, but he is hidden deep in the cloak of historical romance. Love's Comedy is the introduction to all Ibsen's social plays. It was the first piece of work to arouse violent indignation, opposition, enthusiasm among his countrymen, the first to carry his fame beyond the sea. It was his first battle-cry of revolt. And it was Love's Comedy that moulded Ibsen's career for it drove him to take the "exile's staff and sorrow's pack," drove him from his compatriots who poured on him "in draughts unsparing"

> The wholesome, bitter tonic-drink wherethrough,
> Though sick to death, I nerved myself anew
> To face the fight of life with steadfast daring.

Curiously enough it does not strike one immediately as the work—even immature—of a great dramatist. With the possible exception of hero and heroine the dramatis personæ are stock puppets and the strings are wofully apparent. The action is meagre, the characterization ineffective. The style, too, differs entirely from that of Ibsen of our days. It is florid, abounding in clever conceits and windbag rhetoric. Its dialogue is fiery with metaphor, sparkling with wit—the dialogue of Brand accentuated by a thousand indiscretions. Is this the precursor of Ghosts and The Master-Builder? Well, it contains, three distinct prophecies which have been fulfilled in Ibsen's subsequent plays—the prophecy of contempt for commonplace humanity, of belief in the loneliness of greatness, of the author's obsession by the problem of marriage.

Love's Comedy is an attack on what we may term the usages of Norwegian polite Society. In this it is of local rather than of universal interest, for we are happily free from the nauseous business of the Continental Verlobung upon which are poured the vials of his wrath. But as Ibsen's view broadened he added daily to his store of ridicule for small creatures. The keynote of his pessimism in Love's Comedy is, as Dr. Brandes points out in reviewing his later works, not hatred but contempt. In the picture of the crowd of garrulous and stupid love-makers in Love's Comedy there is no shade of pity. Ibsen in 1862 wrote from a heart of stone—have the years softened it? Ibsen's text in almost every play is "He alone is strong who stands alone," and in Love's Comedy the theme is the strength of lonely love. In order to conserve their love in its power Falk and Svanhild parted to live alone that love might live for ever. It is a strange doctrine, this teaching of passionate idealism, but a doctrine which permeates Ibsen's creed and work, as Professor Herford made clear in his recent article in Literature. As the editor and translator of Love's Comedy, Professor Herford evidently hesitated to quote the work in proof of his theory, but of all his plays this is the most characteristic of Ibsen the idealist.

We have neither space nor inclination for a discussion of Ibsen's views on marriage here set forth. They but add to the Chinese puzzle of his later plays. Dr. Nordau has somewhere collected Ibsen's "advice to those about to marry," and it must be admitted that he succeeds in proving his case of grotesque contradictions. The moral of Love's Comedy is that marriage for love is a monstrous error, that ideal love cannot survive the taint of the realities of married life, that to love and lose is best of all. The play ends with a marriage of convenience between Svanhild and a middle-aged, pompous merchant, and we seek in vain for signs of the author's disgust. Well, not perhaps altogether in vain. Love's Comedy closes with the significant lines:—

> Most of the company "Hurrah!"

Mark the "most." It may be that Ibsen is among the small minority. It may be that we have no right to identify the creator with the creatures of his fancy. In reading anything from his pen it is necessary to keep before the mind his declaration of independence:

> "To ask is my vocation, not to answer."

APIS MATINA.

All who appreciate sound and graceful Latinity should be delighted with the collection of Latin verses, translated and original, which Canon Young has lately published under the Horatian title APIS MATINA (Macmillan and Bowes, Cambridge, 6s. n.) In selecting his passages for translation he has ranged rather widely in point of time, subject, and (though lyrics predominate) metre, so that ample opportunity is afforded us of judging of his powers of adaptation. At the same time, the fact that the English originals are in most cases both familiar to all and also highly characteristic of the styles of their various authors tends to put the Latin versions printed opposite to a decidedly severe test. It is not too much to say that these very sturdily survive that shock of slight disappointment which almost inevitably accompanies the first reading of the translation of a favourite passage.

The lover of Tennyson, for instance, coming across this from the "Holy Grail":—

> Then flash'd a yellow gleam across the world,
> And where it smote the plowshare in the field,
> The plowman left his plowing, and fell down
> Before it; where it glittered on her pail,
> The milkmaid left her milking, and fell down
> Before it, and I knew not why, but thought
> "The sun is rising," tho' the sun had risen,—&c.,

will probably become so flooded with reminiscences of the melodies and the glamour of those wonderful Idylls as to be at first incapable of appreciating a translation. But let him allow a sufficient interval to elapse, and he will find that with his mind still attuned to Tennyson's note the following hexameters, retaining as they do something of that marvellously concentrated effect of mystery, are good and skilful enough to rekindle in him something of his emotion.

> . . . inde jubar sensi rutilare per orbem, > quo simul atque ictus splendescit vomer, ibidem > sistit opus, flexoque genu se sternit arator, > sternit se supplex virgo, mulctralia linquens > luce laecessita et distentas ubere vaccas.
> tunc ego—sed Phoebus dudum se moverat ortu—
> "sol oritur!" dixi mecum, nam causa latebat.

We should, however, naturally expect a still fuller measure of success in renderings of poetry written in the classic tradition, and may find it on turning to the admirably sympathetic version of the tender and majestic passage in the "Paradise Regained," descriptive of Christ's sojourn in the wilderness. Or here, again, in a different province, is a rendering of Amiens' song in As You Like It, which, if it lacks quite the same open-air freedom and the irresistible song-note, is yet very happy in its tunefulness and suggestion of the refrain.

> Qui sub fronde sub ilicis > meeum vult recubans ludere fistula > musam aptare avium modis > si curat liquidis, hue ferat hue pedem;
> nullos hic nisi turbinis
> hostilesque hiemis sentiet impetus.
> quisquis, sorte petentium > spreta, degere amat sub Jove simplices > quaerens ipse sibi dapes > contentusque datis, hue veniat comes;
> nullos hic nisi turbinis
> adversosque hiemis sentiet impetus.

A volume such as this invites a comparison of English and Latin lyric metres. We have only space here to suggest the almost illimitable variety of English measures, and the comparative fewness of Latin verse-schemes. Thus Hood's "Past and Present," Macaulay's "Battle of the Lake Regillus," "Rule Britannia," "Casabianca," Campbell's "Parrot," and many more are all turned by elegiacs. On the other hand, each of three passages from "In Memoriam" has a separate measure devoted to it. The rendering of its fourteenth poem by stanzas consisting of three choriambic lines and a fourth glyconic particularly appeals to us, but Canon Young has mastered all his metres and his selection almost always leaves us with the impression that no other would have been so fitting. Especially successful are the Alcaics which represent Shelley's "Arethusa"; the dance forward of the first two lines, the pause of the third, and the darting swoop of the fourth, conjuring up a vision of motion no less fascinating than that suggested by the breathless rush of Shelley's poem.

CHESS.

It is the privilege of a master in any department of human endeavour to have his life-work duly chronicled and handed down to posterity. In the case of Mr. Blackburne, the famous chess player, such a memorial needs no apology. For nearly 40 years he has held a foremost position among English players. Such a record as is contained in Mr. Bird-Gossage's Games at Chess, selected and annotated by himself and edited by Mr. F. A. Graham (Longmans, 7s. 6d. n.), is the fitting crown and consummation of a life devoted to the scientific exposition of the most intellectual of games.

Born and bred in Manchester, Mr. Blackburne found himself in his youth connected with the hosiery trade. But though more profitable and less precarious than professional chess, it failed to claim Mr. Blackburne for its own. Manchester lost a potential merchant prince, the country gained its greatest chess master. At the age of 19 the future champion had already discovered his peculiar avocation, and he is found in the local newspapers challenging all-comers to a blindfold against ten strong opponents. The success which attended this effort seems to have determined his future course, and his career from that date has been a series of triumphs. No better testimony to the position which he occupies in English chess circles can be adduced than the plain, unvarnished fact that in the three International Cable Matches against the chess-men of America he was selected on each occasion to do battle at the first board. Among the masters of the present day Mr. Blackburne may be said to hold a unique position. As a blindfold player he stands and has stood for many years supreme in this particular branch of his art. He has done more than any other player of his day to popularize the game in this country, and it has been his custom to devote some months of every year to touring among provincial clubs, and engaging their strongest members in simultaneous contests. Further, in the all-important department of end games, he is acknowledged by general consent to be second to none.

In this excellent edition of his games, full justice is done to all the prominent characteristics of his style. An admirable selection of his simultaneous and blindfold games is given, and for the benefit of the sceptical the ten games played at the London Tournament of 1862 are recorded in full. Universal, however, as this particular power of concentration may be, it cannot be expected to produce the finest work, and it is to the games that Mr. Blackburne has played on equal terms against foemen worthy of his steel that the chess-player will naturally turn. Of such games more than a hundred examples have been collected, arranged according to their openings, and annotated by the master himself. The chronological order which has been adopted will enable the student to follow intelligently the evolution of the various openings, and at the same time appears likely to lead to the realization of the hope expressed by the editor that the book will be found useful as a manual for chess players. In his prefatory remarks on the Ruy Lopez, that fleet-in-being of genius and mediocrity alike, Mr. Blackburne ingenuously mentions that he never adopts this opening in important tournaments unless he happens to be "a little off colour and content with a draw." This is surely the confession of an essentially attacking player. And the present compilation of games illustrates lucidly the fertility of resources, the brightness of conception, and the brilliance of combination which have invariably been characteristic of his play.

A word of congratulation is due to editor and publishers for the care that has been taken in the production of the book.

Mr. James Mason's Social Chess (Horace Cox, 2s. 6d. n.) will commend itself to players who enjoy the game but fear to give it too much of their time and attention. There are several kinds of chess, from match play, which is selective and yet always amusing, to skittle-chess, which may be amusing but cannot be scientific. Social chess, as Mr. Mason understands it, seems to hold a middle place between the two extremes. Of the 131 short games that he has collected, only two run to as many as thirty moves. They are mostly by masters and well-known players, and for sure remarkable for brilliancy rather than for profundity. Of course, it must not be imagined that brilliancy and brevity always go together, seeing that in the best short game the brilliant victory of one player presupposes a rather marked degree of blindness in the other; yet, if a game is to be interesting, it must not be a mere scramble, as Dutch games often are, for minute advantages. From this point of view nothing could be better than Mr. Mason's book. It may be that his historical sketch leaves something to be desired, but his choice of games is excellent, and every game is illustrated by a diagram of the critical position, and is expressively annotated. The "immortal game" is here, wonderfully won by Anderssen and lost in an equally surprising way by Kieseritzky. Mr. Mason's note points out the one move by which it might have been, at least, drawn. It is virtually a gift. But all the notes are good and interesting, and all the games, as far as we have tested them, are studied with perfect accuracy. If the book is at all capable of improvement on its own special lines, perhaps a few brilliant endings might have been added with advantage. Horwitz's games, we should think, would supply some of them.

We have also received a revised and enlarged edition (3rd) of Mr. James Mason's PRINCIPLES OF TIMES IN THEORY AND PRACTICE (Horace Cox).

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

"Powell of Endless Fame."

SPORT IN WAR (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.) is a reprint of five articles contributed by General Baden-Powell to the Britannia Magazine. The first paper deals with lion-shooting in Rhodesia, the second with ostrich-hunting in Cape Colony, the third and fourth with elephant-hunting, and the fifth with snipe-shooting in Tunis, when the author had French officers for his companions. It is all lightly and graphically written; and General Baden-Powell's picturesque sketch of the Gallic warriors should certainly be quoted at a time when people tell us that they are likely to come out best on a rival:

> What curiosities to me my French companions were! . . . Their get up for snipe-shooting was their uniform képi and jacket, with baggy linen overalls, and capacious game bags and gun slung on their backs, and they rode their ugly half-bred stallions in regimental saddles. . . . As I jogged along with my two foreign companions, I seemed to be once more with my old Boer friends starting out on shooting horses for the veldt. But instead of the silent whiffing of Boer tobacco there came from my companions an incessant chatter, and a string of questions as to whether, in passing through Paris and Marseilles, I had seen this or that singer or dancer. . . . This seemed to be the only interest not only of this pair, but of half the officers one met in the colony.

Studies in the Occult.

M. Camille Flammarion is well known as an astronomer and a writer of various fascinating romances suggested by his astronomical studies. It is less well known that he is an ardent investigator in psychical research, and has been a member of the Parisian Society for the study of Spiritism since 1861. THE UNKNOWN (Harper, 7s. 6d.) contains a selection of the evidence which he has obtained in this pursuit, and is a volume infinitely more engrossing than a syndicate of novels. The author describes it as a book of observation only, but such modesty, he says, ought to shun not the real existing, but that our hopes of immortality are my chimera. Incidentally, M. Flammarion leads us down many interesting side-paths, gives examples of telepathy, for instance unexplained, phenomena, and holds out delightful possibilities for the future. That the primary point is that thought exists, has a real existence, imponderable, intangible, invisible though it be, and an existence apart from the brain, and outliving it. That mind acts upon mind, generally unconsciously, but sometimes consciously, both by suggestion for instance, is a truth which most people to-day admit; indeed, it is almost a truism. But M. Flammarion believes that we may one day be able to send our thoughts through space to some place, by the force of our own will-power. Does this sound incredible? Quite as incredible would it have seemed to our grandfathers that they could ride in the streets of London without horses, train go without engines, and telegraphic messages be sent without wire. We may suppose thought then to radiate out on all sides, and to travel with a swiftness which annihilates the conditions of space, making itself, necessarily, felt by that particular mind which is in absolute harmony with it and saying nothing to those other minds which have not this harmony: just as this is Flammarion's own instance if a certain note, b flat say, be sounded in a room, whether by the voice, the violin, or in any other manner, the string belonging to b flat on a piano near at hand will vibrate and resound, while all the other eighty-four notes will remain mute. In illustration he gives many examples of visions, presentiments, dreams of distant or of future events; and although all of these may not be convincingly authenticated, as some critics have complained, what does that signify? Surely no candid person, with an intelligence, a sensitiveness, above the brutes, but could, if he would, add his own quota of psychic experiences. Yet, because all life is one, even the brutes have their share of psychic power. Thus, Flammarion gives us the case of the dog, Lioune (No. XIII.), who, in the act of dying, appeared to her mistress in a dream (i.e., the dog's thought, travelling out to that mistress's brain, prompted the dream); and we are reminded of the story of the second sight of St. Columb's white pony who came and wept over his master foreseeing the Saint's approaching death, as well as of the premonitory terror of the two oxen destined for slaughter, in one of Loti's incomparable sketches. Again, time having, metaphysically speaking, no real existence, being but the necessary condition of our thinking, we understand how it is that when the concentration of consciousness in the brain is temporarily abolished, as sometimes happens in dreams, as is always the case in the mesmeric sleep, in second sight, &c., we obtain the power of reconstructing a past in which individually we could have had no part, and of foreseeing the so-called future. From this point of view the prophets of Israel, the pythonesses of Greece, the mystics of the Middle Ages fall into line. All life is one; and perhaps the belief in our individual identity, as something apart from all other life, is the obstacle which stands in the way of man's knowledge of the true extent of his nature.

"Stepping Westward."

A BOOK OF DARTMOOR, by S. Baring Gould (Methuen, 6s.), is uniform with the same author's books on Devon and Cornwall. He has the advantage of knowing his subject intimately, and his knowledge has enabled him to write a book which is interesting in spite of its somewhat ecclesiastical style. Dartmoor is treated from every point of view. There are chapters on ponies, cattle, and deciduous remains; there are legends; there are stories of the convict establishment at Princetown; and there are descriptions of the natural features. One could have been glad of a little more about the Tors—more especially with reference to the position which the rock-climber can get on them if he likes to make any scramble up the granite piles on their summits—but the chapter on hors is thorough and thrilling. Mr. Baring Gould seems to have had some startling experiences to learn his skill; and novelists in quest of sensational situations will note for use the sober statement that "the only convict who really got away here Princetown, and was not recaptured, was last seen riding a bee line for Fox Tor Mire. The scrambling incident of the disguise of the prison authorities were mentioned for the season of the whole year by post."

Guide-Books.

HAMPSHIRE (Dent, 1s. 6d.), edited by Cosmo A. B. Dewar, belongs to the better class of guide-books. The first part consists of itineraries, and the second of essays on botany, colour, geology, history, literature, cycling, &c., while the third is a general gazetteer of places of interest in the county. Literary associations are carefully and sympathetically dealt with; the great names being those of Charles Kingsley, Gilbert White, Lord Tennyson, Jane Austen, and Legh Richmond, whose "Little Jane" is buried at Brading in the Isle of Wight. Perhaps, however, the chapter heading "Charles Kingsley's Country" is a little misleading. To many of us Charles Kingsley's country is not Eversley, but the north of Devon. Let it be added that the guide is good to read as well as full of information, and that the pictures are artistic and the maps clear. We welcome the new series warmly, and shall look out for "Norfolk," which is to be the next volume in the series.

The fourth edition of the GUIDE TO SOUTH WALES in the Thorough Guide Series (Dulau, 3s. 6d. n.) has been revised with particular attention to the requirements of cyclists, who get a 16-page supplement on pink paper all to themselves.

An Autobiography.

THE LAST OF THE CLIMBING BOYS, an autobiography, by George Elson (John Long, 6s.), has a preface by the Dean of Hereford, who tells us what agreeable emotions come to him when he contemplates the career of men who have risen from small beginnings "possibly not to the summit of their ambitions (which is reserved for very few indeed), but at all events to a position of independence and respectability." Mr. Elson, in fact, began life as a "sweep-lad," and rose, by his talents, to occupy an office of importance and responsibility in the shampooing department of the Lemmington Turkish Bath. His reminiscences cover both periods of his life. They give us instructive information about the bad old times when boys had to climb chimneys to clean them, and they tell us what gratuities Mr. Elson received from Fred Archer, Abington Baird, and Mr. J. L. Toole, and other gentlemen whom he manipulated in the discharge of his hydro-therapeutic duties. Having ourselves, as it happens by a fortunate coincidence, "turked," as we called it in the days of our youth, in the establishment of which Mr. Elson was a pillar and an ornament, we are able to add our testimony to his professional and conversational abilities to that of these more distinguished witnesses; and we are delighted to learn from Mr. Elson that his merits have met with the reward which was their due. "When I arrived at a gentleman's mansion," we read, "I was not expected to go round to the back door as of old time. The front door was my right entrance, opened by the footman, who would take possession of my top coat and silk hat." It is, indeed, a happy picture on which to drop the curtain, and we quite share the emotions regarding it which the Dean of Hereford has expressed in such well-chosen phrases. Let us add—what we hope we have already succeeded in suggesting—that there is hardly a dull page in Mr. Elson's book.

"M. A. P."

PEOPLE YOU KNOW, edited by Percy Hurd (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.), is a collection of appreciations of notable contemporaries, reprinted from the Outlook. They are somewhat on the same lines as the "Modern Men" Series which used to figure in the National Observer, but less malicious, and not quite so brilliant. Moreover, one occasionally comes upon mistakes, indicating that the writer's acquaintance with the subject is but superficial. To speak of Zola's "sublime absence of humour" is to confess that one has not read "La Terre"; and to speak of it in connexion with the "J'accuse" letter is to show a singular failure to understand in what circumstances humour is superfluous if not inappropriate. And to say that Lord Curzon of Kedleston "won the Arnold essay with a portentous volume on Diocletian" is to say the thing that is not. Mr. Curzon, as he then was, did not win an essay but a prize; the subject was not Diocletian but Justinian; and the essay was not a portentous volume but a slim pamphlet of the usual character of prize essays.

ROBERT RAIKES, a brief biography of the originator of Sunday Schools, by T. Henry Harris (Sunday School Union, 1s.), is meant for children. It is well and picturesquely written, though the phrase occasionally swells to a pomposity which may make things difficult for young readers.

Messrs. Johnston have sent us their MAP TO ILLUSTRATE THE CHINESE QUESTION (1s.). It is usefully comprehensive and contains, on a single sheet, a large map of China, a large map of Japan, small scale maps of the world, and of the Orient, and large scale plans of Hong-kong, Kiao Chau, &c.

CHINA OF TO-DAY (Newnes, 6d. n.) is an album of pictures, mostly photographic, to be completed "in about 12 weekly parts," illustrating the crisis in the East.

FICTION.

"The Increasing Purpose."

The enormous success of "The Choir Invisible" ensures a large audience for Mr. James L. Allen's new novel, THE INCREASING PURPOSE (Macmillan, 6s.). He takes us once more to the Kentucky he knows so well and shows us this time its farms and forests as they were forty years ago. Amid these scenes he introduces us to two children, so he terms them, of the Revolution—the intellectual and social revolution wrought by the American Civil War. David, the hero, is a poor, devout, high-minded lad, working at the hemp on his father's farm. Stirred by the founding of a new University near at hand, he determines to become a minister; goes to the Bible College there, and, confused by the theology of his teachers and the dissensions of the Churches, fuddles his untrained intellect with Darwinism and the new thoughts of the Old World, and ends by losing, crudely enough, yet so tragically for him, his belief in Christianity. That is the drama of this man's soul with God. How the social side of that Revolution, which had converted Gabriella, the heroine, from a wealthy Southern heiress into a simple Kentucky schoolmistress, affected the drama of his heart with women it is for the reader to discover.

Though we cannot, hand on heart, pronounce "The Increasing Purpose" to be a very great work of literature, we may safely assert that it will achieve a large success and achieve it on its merits. What are those merits? They do not consist in style, for Mr. Allen spoils an otherwise serviceable style by such phrases as "a pomological pyramid" (by which he means "a pile of apples"), and he is occasionally led by a well-meant endeavour to be picturesque into affected rhetoric and shapeless enumerations that seem to be an echo of Walt Whitman. They do not consist in originality; for those who have watched the career of the religious novel in England, who have lived through the doubts and soul-searchings of a Robert Elsmere or a David Grieve, will find little that is new, intellectually or psychologically, in the increasing purpose of this somewhat grievous David of Kentucky. They can hardly depend upon the interest roused by the characters, for, with the exception of the hero, all the characters of the book are merely sketched in, although the sketches of the girl whom David woos and wins, of his father and especially of his mother, the farmer's indolent wife "who lived in her house with the regularity and contentment of an insect in a dead log," are, so far as they go, indeed admirable.

The success of the book will be due to merits quite other than these. The tone of the author, who deals with the doubts and difficulties of the farmer's boy in a manner always reverent and yet sympathetic, will commend it to the public; and the unlimited interest in religious questions, the unsatisfied desire for not over-subtle theological discussion, which are inherent in the Anglo-Saxon race, will once more be gratified by "The Increasing Purpose." From a literary point of view the book shares the great merit of Mrs. Humphry Ward's works. The atmosphere produced by the observant descriptions of the hemp-farms and the hemp-breakers of Kentucky, survivals from the old time, in the days when after the great and terrible moments of the Civil War a new spirit was astir in the land and new aspirations were making themselves felt in men's hearts, is wholly appropriate to the story, and gives it a sense of unity which goes far to render the book a work of art.

Tales of the War.

Mr. Ernest Glanville retells the story of the early part of the South African war in his exciting novel THE DISPATCH RIDER (Methuen, 6s.), and weaves into it a fascinating love affair of presumably his own imagining. The Natalian, David Gradwell, and Somerset, the heroic Englishman, have many adventures before good fortune attends them and their loves are made to prosper. In the meantime the reader is well entertained.

FOR THE QUEEN IN SOUTH AFRICA (Putnam's, 6s.) contains some half dozen startling tales of the life of Tommy Atkins and his friends during the war. Mr. Carly Davis Haskins writes with great clearness and with convincing sincerity. His is a book that will interest all "good Uitlanders" and all who have followed the varied fortunes of the war.

A GENTLEMAN IN KHAKI (Chatto, 1s.) is sure of a welcome by reason of its title. Mr. John Oxley is not a great writer, but he knows how to make the most of his subject and introduces such characters as Mr. Rhodes, Colonel Kekewich, and the rest with no small skill. The story is full of incident.

After Mr. Thomas Hardy.

Borleigh is an inland village in Wessex where the country folk have hopes of growing, later on, into a population of 700. It is duly fitted with a typical squire, village inn, carrier, vuz (for gorse), and, indeed, with every appurtenance of a Hardy novel. But the author of JAN OXBER (Ward, Lock, 6s.), Mr. Orme Agnus, is an original observer and no plagiarist, although his villagers speak thus:—"He do hold up his nose pious-high and that chit of his allus wi' two or dree vellers hengin' round her—great vooils, as I should zay zo!" and so forth. Into this world of sharp-tongued women and slow men Mr. Agnus peers with an acute and kindly eye. His people are real flesh and blood. His collection of well-arranged stories reads like experiences in which the characters have acted vicariously for the author. "Jan Oxber" is the first of this well-told series of vital tales, which, without disrespect to this author or to Mr. Hardy, may be said to strongly remind one of the work of the writer of "Under the Greenwood Tree."

"Taming the Shrew" and "Leonard Seal's Wife" are excellently told. "Jan Oxber" should be widely read.

John Strange Winter.

Everybody knows that the popular author of "Bootle's Baby" can tell a good story. There is no complicated plot in THE MARRIED MISS BINKS (White, 3s. 6d.), and the story is thin and rather commonplace; but as usual it is well told. Of course, we all know the young man who has never known his parents, but finally turns out to be an earl. In this particular case it is highly improbable that the young man in question would never himself have looked in the little box full of love relics which belonged to his mother. This is left to his wife, who in that way discovers her husband's mysterious birth. Miss Binks is a very pleasant heroine with plenty of common sense, though perhaps a little too matter-of-fact with her love. John Strange Winter, however, is at her best in describing foolish society women, and this is a sort of society novel, with the Binks family as nouveaux riches. Mrs. Oliver Beddingham, née Polly Binks, is a living creature. Her cravings for "smartness" and her wretchedness at being snubbed by her sister-in-law are very amusingly described.

The Crusades.

Mr. Robert Barr is by nature and temperament a modern writer; and that fact is never more evident than when he writes novels of the Middle Ages. THE STRONG ARM (Methuen, 6s.) is a story of the Crusades. It opens vigorously, but gets gradually dull. Mr. Barr does not give us the colour of the period; his characters talk, if they do not behave, pretty much as if they were the author's friends and contemporaries. The book includes a few other short stories, all dealing with the same period and all equally dull. Mr. Barr has done so much good and sound work in his time that we are sorry to see him straying into mediævalism, in which he is not at home. The humorist's song with the lines "A man must be an ass, Who fights in a cuirass," represents Mr. Barr's natural attitude towards such matters. He loses much more than he gains by trying to take the Middle Ages seriously.

Studies of Women.

In A PLAIN WOMAN'S PART, by Norley Chester (Arnold, 6s.), and in LOTUS AND LAUREL, by Helen Wallace (same publisher, same price), we have two novels written by women and appealing to women chiefly. Both are well written, both will give their meed of entertainment. The part of the plain woman in fiction is always to play the guardian angel to her fairer, and so frailer, sister, and thus Norley Chester employs Fay Kennedy to watch over her friend Doris Fortescue and to prevent her at a critical moment from taking an irrevocable and unfortunate step. There is a great deal of nice and highly-cultured conversation on the way thither.

Miss Wallace in "Lotus and Laurel" provides an original situation. A famous violinist, Madame Waldstein, has an only daughter, Karola, who also displays great talent for the violin. The mother is tortured by jealousy, foreseeing a rival whose fame will begin to wax as her own begins to wane, and she does all she knows to thwart Karola's musical proclivities. But it is a law of nature, apparently, that parental discouragement should produce filial perseverance. Karola cares for her violin and for nothing but her violin, and just as her mother has sacrificed everything in life for her art so Karola will do the same. The rivalry between the two women works up to a dramatic moment when the mother, putting her pride from her, beseeches the daughter to give up her professional career so as to leave her, the mother, undisputed first place during the few years which remain to her. And Karola refuses her mother's prayer. With so strong a situation as this the book might have been great.

MRS. JEREMIE DIDELERE, by H. J. Jennings, bears the imprint of Messrs. Harrison and Sons, of Pall-mall, and its price is not stated. The story is very fairly good reading. The central figure is a swindling but seductive little widow, and the plot deals with her matrimonial plans both for herself and her daughter. Nothing is new in the idea, but the treatment is fresh and bright. The author should avoid in future the descriptive names which he has chosen for his characters. Every time one reads of Mr. Gush or Mrs. Didelere, one is reminded that they are not living people, but labelled types in a book.

THE NORTHERN BELLE, by John Werge (Digby, Long, 6s.), might be one-third of its size with advantage. The superfluous matter in it is evidently the mistake of a beginner rather than deliberate "padding." It reads like the diary of a young woman who has spent a season in London and recorded everything she saw, for the benefit of her native village. For an unsophisticated American, if such a thing exists, "The Northern Belle" would be an excellent guide-book to London.

BLIX, by Frank Norris (Grant Richards, 3s.), has a good deal of "sling" about it and an exhilarating young heroine, "as trig and trim and crisp as a crack yacht." She wears shirts of "a rattling stiffness" and a dog-collar round her wrist instead of a belt. Some men might find so much breeziness and tautness a little dangerous to sentiment. But the hero falls in love with her, greatly to his own advantage. She cures him of gambling, encourages him in his literary work, proposes to him valiantly when he seems diffident, and is altogether a thorough "good fellow." Mr. Frank Norris is a spirited writer.

THE NAKED TRUTH, by Miss Andrew Merry (we risk the title) (New Century Press, 3s. 6d.), is a would-be clever collection of stories which misses being of value on account of its vulgarity. The first story, which gives its name to the book, intends to tell of the life of a lady of society who, as it were, "plays the game." "The only law she acknowledged was the passing inclination of the moment." Some of the social sketches are rather well done despite the fact that a lady of fashion speaks of "delightful invites."

An entirely absurd story of an adopted daughter is BETTINA, by May Crommelin (Long, 6s.), although written in all seriousness. No doubt young ladies on sea-side benches next month will read it with interest, but then young ladies, Heaven bless them! have the digestion of the ostrich in the matter of fiction. They can read anything at all which calls itself a novel, so long as it makes no demands upon the mind, and we can truthfully assure them that "Bettina" never makes any such demands.

THE QUEEN'S WARD, by Jean Middlemass (Digby Long, 6s.), deals with the fortunes of the two very beautiful and excessively high-bred daughters of a proud old Scottish earl, and it is well that Miss Middlemass lays special stress upon their breeding, for we never should have guessed at it from their doings, and sayings, or their behaviour towards their French maid.

DAUGHTERS OF PLEASURE, by Anna, Comtesse de Brémont (Greening and Co., 6s.), has a kind of naive immorality about it which is harmless because of the wild improbability of everything in the book. No young person would think of applying to herself the doctrines of the three "soiled doves" of the story, for the simple reason that they are not human beings to point a moral but merely decorative creatures who adorn a tale. Their very names begin the improbability. They are not related to one another, and their companionship is accidental. But one is called Hera, the second Atene, and the third Neaera. All three have undressed themselves, and there is a touch of Fielding in the chapters in which each relates her history and misfortunes. But they are all endowed with genius, which reinstates them in society—one as a great actress, one as a queen of opera, and one as a violinist. All three get "suited" with husbands, almost simultaneously. But for these absurdities the book might be a good one.

Love's Labours.

Although after reading STUDIES IN LOVE (Dent, 1s. 6d. n.), by Miss Maude Egerton King, one's mind is filled with the sorrows of man, the stories have a spirit of beauty within them that belongs to the sweet side of melancholy. Miss King applies her delicate, sensitive art to the situations that border tragedy and occasionally lead to fine and noble issues. Such a study as "Dr. Delaney's Experiment" is original and yet profoundly true. The strenuous nobility of the three principal characters, the pure joy which the woman's love for the dying man wrests from an almost hopeless impasse, is a fine example of nervous work. Such a story as "A Helpmate" is rare in recent fiction. It tells of the devotion of a sincere, uncomprehending nature for a subtle, not altogether generous, broken-hearted artist. Janet, who has married the artist when the love of his life is dead, really considers a picture entitled "The Soul's Awakening" to be inspiring and helpful (in a few such touches Miss King places her characters vividly before her readers), and she is so proud to be of service to the man she loves that no depths of self-abnegation affright her. What is asked of her the reader will do well to see for himself. She is taken ill, and then "on the very threshold of death they first met as true lovers; and they were happy. Antony wondered that he had held his happiness at arm's length so long. He had selfishly shut himself up in the dark house of his sorrow all this while; and when at last he opened the door to the Love that had been knocking and waiting so patiently, over Love's shoulder looked Death." But the artist or observer—and the author knows that to be one you must be the other—is not content with an easy tragedy. Janet recovers, and the end is such as all who have recognized the facts of life must own to be a true one. The other "studies" are, after their fashion, equally good, compact of quiet humour, pathos, and sincerity. We knew that the author of "Round about a Brighton Coach Office" was expert and acute; it is, therefore, doubly pleasing to find from her latest book that she is inspired with a true sense of the beauty and tragedy of life.

Boys.

Three boy's books come to us from Messrs. Partridge. A BOY OF THE FIRST EMPIRE, by E. S. Brooks (3s. 6d.), is a story of France in the days of Napoleon. There is not enough fighting in it to satisfy the bloodthirsty, as we get no battle until nearly the end, when the hero loses sight of Napoleon's standard and in the battle of Leipsic sees them in the hands of Wrestrow. The book is not without illustrations. THE BOY WHO COULD, by Walter Rhodes (2s. 6d.), is a school story, and a very good school story too. There is a fight, as one of the most important events is nearly as good as the fight between Tom Brown and Slogger Williams. Towards the end there are some exciting attempts at kidnapping. THE FIGHTING LADS OF DEVON, by William Murray Graydon (2s. 6d.), is a story of the sea-dogs with the same Lad in the days of the Spanish Armada.

SOMERSET, SCOTLAND AND LONDONDERRY, by Gilbert Swift (Elliot Stock, 5s.), has great merits. The boy Somerset and his friend and biographer, Sandell, are taken literally from their cradles to manhood in 165 merry pages. All their impressive phases are amusing, especially the schoolboy stage. They and their elders strike one as real live boys, and provoking contrasts to the somewhat "precious" specimens of Anglo-boys offered since the "Eric" type.

We desire to offer Lord Ernest [illegible], the author of THE CRUTCHES (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), our sincere sympathies. He has suffered badly at the hands of his amanuensis, of the printer, and the printer's reader, and he must be very ill indeed if a fourth part of an hour when the hideous grammatical errors in both French and English met his eye—for the first time, as one sees on the printed book. It was just in the house of debauching sense with blots as these that the patient man of Uz decided so summarily that his enemy would write a book.

THE ROSE AND THE DANCER, by Arthur Charles Smith (Downey, 3s. 6d.), is a volume of well-written short stories. Mr. Cosslett Smith, who evidently has travelled much, seems to be more or less under the influence of French, or rather of Parisian, décadence. An unpleasant pessimistic view runs through most of the stories, and the tone, generally speaking, is not wholesome. They show, however, imagination and originality.

MUMMER MYSTIC PLAYS is the not very applicable or appropriate title of a quaint little book by Alastair Graham (Mrs. Frederick Townsend Martyn), published by the New Century Press at 3s. 6d. There is a curious mystery about the verse and the style; but while the "mummers" cannot be decided bits of a kind, their actions are too vividly dramatic for the average reader, who will hear bewilderment only where actual deaths are bewildering.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The [illegible] International Catalogue of Scientific Literature is well on its way towards accomplishment. The recent International Conference passed this, and the actual bibliographical labour has become a simple question of organization. The catalogue is to include both current and retrospective literature and will be published, for the present at least, in seven volumes. Classified subject indexes are of such value that it may be hoped an attempt will be made to give something more than a list of titles. Each nation is to catalogue its own literature, and various volumes may no doubt be issued at unequal periods. In Russia and the United States, neither of which countries were represented at the Conference, [illegible] may be difficult to obtain. No doubt, after the first year, the scheme will take more definite shape, and if the existent Provisional International Committee can secure machinery to work its main outlines, it may be possible to bring the whole catalogue up to a high level.

An International Bibliographical Conference, in connexion with the Paris Exhibition, is to be held on the three days August 16th to 18th. This will be distinct from the Conference of Librarians (assembling on the 20th inst.) and has a separate organizing committee. General Sebert, membre de l'Institut, will be the president, and M. Eugène Caps[illegible], of 5, Place du Panthéon, the secretary. Special consideration will be given to the scheme of the International Institute of Bibliography for the adoption of universal catalogues of bibliography based upon a decimal classification. The subscription of 20 francs is double that to be charged for membership of the Librarians' Conference.

In Wolverhampton all classes have shown great public spirit in support of the new Free Library, the foundation-stone of which was laid the other day by the Duke and Duchess of York. The project was intended as a worthy commemoration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, and the financial problem was met by voluntary offerings from children, working men, local magnates, and athletic clubs. The result will be a handsome building, with accommodation for 100,000 volumes.

With the approval of the Shoreditch Vestry, the Electric Lighting Committee have made a grant of £250, out of their profits, for providing books in the Public Library. This gift, which is equivalent to a year's expenditure on light, may, it is hoped, be an annual one. We believe that, under a special Act, at Oldham the Library and Museum has derived substantial benefit from gas profits.

The late Mr. Talbot Baines Reed was the possessor of a large typographical library classified in accordance with a scheme of his own. The books have been purchased by the governors of the St. Bride Foundation for their technical reference library at the St. Bride Institute in Bride-lane. This already contains the "William Blades Library" of 3,500 books and pamphlets and the "Passmore Edwards Library" of nearly 2,000 volumes, all on printing and the allied trades. Each of these collections is provided with a good annotated catalogue, and the library is invaluable to the technical printing classes held at the Institute.

We have received the thirtieth annual report of the Library and Club connected with the works of Messrs. Braby, at Deptford. This institution encourages thrift, provides relaxation, cultivates a love of reading, and further gives proof of kindly interest between employers and employed. We learn of the success of a coal club, a gardening society, and an ambulance class, while from the library of 5,000 volumes 1,711 books were lent for home reading, no definite time being laid down for their return.

The State of Iowa has, in a new school library law, effected a considerable advance upon anything yet attempted in this way. Every school district must set aside annually a small sum for each child of school age. The money thus obtained is spent upon books for the library. This enforces what has only been attempted voluntarily and to a very small extent in England.

THE IRISH LANGUAGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your note on the attempt to revive Erse as the language of Ireland omitted to cite the very apposite instance of Greek in favour of your contention. As a classical language, Greek is still the delight and linguistic treasure-house of Europe. As a spoken tongue it shares the discredit and disadvantages which belong to the speech of all small and unprogressive populations. You remember how that eminently practical and unsentimental person the Roi des Montagnes wrote to his daughter that "il faut que tu sois en état de parler le français, l'anglais, l'allemand, car enfin tu n'es pas faite pour vivre dans ce petit pays ridicule." The Greece of olden time was not a "petit pays ridicule," because the golden days of its language and literature were also the days of its political strength, of its empire over the greater part of the then known world, and of the trade, the riches, the leisure, and the vigour, the curiosity, the restlessness of mind and body which empire and trade bring in their train. Why are our little islands not a "petit pays ridicule?" Surely because we rule far and wide, because

> Who knows whither we may vent
> The treasure of our tongue, to what strange shores
> This gain of our best glory shall be sent,
> To enrich unknowing nations with our stores!
> What worlds in the yet unformed Orient
> May come refined with accents that are ours!

Irishmen help us to fight our battles and to rule our Empire, and it seems a pity that a respectable but unpractical sentiment should drive them to enrol themselves among the small and backward tribes of men. At this moment, a distinguished Irishman, the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces of India, is hardening his heart against the sentimental objections of his Mussulmans, who would retain as the Court language of their province the Persianized Urdu, which to the more numerous Hindus is nearly as difficult as Erse must needs be, for many years to come, to the bulk of Irishmen. Sir A. P. Macdonnell is as practical as all Irishmen are when they are not misled by pseudo-patriotic sentiment, and wishes his Courts to use the real living ubiquitous speech of his province. If Erse were really the popular language of Ireland, not only would administrative and legislative support be unnecessary, but, even if applied in the contrary direction, would be unavailing to eradicate a living language. For this I can quote another Indian precedent. It was a Scotchman, Sir George Campbell, who forbad the teaching of Assamese in the primary schools of Assam, and substituted the kindred speech of Bengal, as being spoken by a larger, a more progressive, a better educated community. In that case the experiment failed as completely as Sir A. P. Macdonnell's effort will undoubtedly succeed. A dying language can as little be resuscitated as can a vigorous spoken speech be destroyed by legislative action. But perhaps Mr. T. P. O'Connor and his friends are wielding a mere brutum fulmen, and have no real desire to see the young generation of Ireland turned into a "domum ambiguam Tyriosque bilingues." For there seems a want of unselfish thought in the attempt to crowd Erse as well as English into the too scanty school days of primary scholars.

Faithfully yours,

J. D. ANDERSON.

THE DATE OF PEPYS' MARRIAGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—There is a possible solution of the doubt respecting the date of the marriage of Samuel Pepys, the noted "diarist," which it may be of interest to investigate.

Three entries of his give the date as October 10, leaving the actual year undetermined: but the registry of St. Margaret, Westminster, puts it determinately as December 1, 1655. This discrepancy points to the conclusion that there were two ceremonies. Accordingly we may assume that the earlier one was informal. Taking this view, we find that Mrs. Pepys came of a Catholic family, so the wedding of October 10 must have been of some sort to satisfy her religious scruples, and perhaps those of any Catholic priest having access to her who might have been willing to accept the risk of so doing.

Following up this clue, we find that banns were put up on October 19 at St. Margaret's and published on the 22nd and 29th inst., followed by a legal marriage on December 1, performed by a justice of the peace. Mrs. Pepys was then barely fifteen.

Faithfully yours,

A. HALL.

JUDGMENT IN LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the notice of the above book, which appears in your issue of July 28, your reviewer says, "Mr. Worsfold, for some reason or other, assumes that 'realism' must always be repugnant to the moral sense." Allow me to point out that this statement is absolutely untrue. The degree in which it misrepresents my views will appear from the following passage (on page 72), which defines the sense in which I have used the term in the book in question :—

"It is only by reference to this principle (i.e., the principle of idealization) that we can attach a definite significance to the terms 'realism' and 'realistic' as applied to works of creative literature (and of art in general). No work of creative literature can be 'realistic' in the sense that the author has reproduced reality and not the mental aspect of reality; for if the author had attempted to do this his composition would not be a work of creative literature at all. If it is used as a term of reproach, the word can only be properly applied to the work of an author who has so far neglected to select his material—to idealize in fact—that his work has lost the quality of giving pleasure. As, however, this quality of giving pleasure obviously depends upon the nature and character of the individual reader, as much as on the nature and character of the book, the term cannot be used with any precision unless we credit the individual whom the given work fails to please with an average degree of artistic and moral perception. And since the latter—moral perception—is the more commonly developed, the term has come to bear a significance which is almost equivalent to 'immoral,' or repugnant to the general sense of mankind. But in thus using the term it is necessary not to forget that its original and wider significance is different. In its wider significance it characterizes any work of literature (or art) in which the author (or artist) has reproduced any subject, or any aspect of a subject, which lessens or removes that 'beauty' by virtue of which a work of art gives pleasure."

I am, Sir, obediently yours,

W. BASIL WORSFOLD.

"MR. BOYTON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In last week's issue of your paper your reviewer of my book says :—

"If it had not been for Mr. Anthony Hope's imaginary kingdom stories Mr. F. M. Allen would never have written 'Mr. Boyton.' . . The imitation is not very happy."

If it were not for your reviewer's discovery I should have remained in ignorance of these things. I have not read any of Mr. Hope's stories, nor have I seen any of his plays. I say this regretfully, not boastfully—so that I could not have imitated him, happily or unhappily, unless, indeed, I am the victim of some curious form of mental disease.

I do not desire to juggle with words, nor am I anxious to enter the lists with a critic, but the Kingdom of Poland—even as I took the liberty of reconstructing it—is not an imaginary country. So far as I can ascertain, Mr. Anthony Hope's books do not deal deliberately with the future, "Mr. Boyton" does, and this fact (or fiction) is sufficiently emphasized. Unless the date and the scene of my story are considered the story of Mr. Boyton's exploits would no doubt be a mere absurdity.

Good, bad, or indifferent, "Mr. Boyton" is my own, and owes nothing to anybody's influence, writings, or suggestion.

On matters of opinion I readily admit that no writer is entitled to quarrel with his critics. I will confess that I am sorry to learn (from Literature) that there is in my story "a complete absence of all love interest." I endeavoured—perhaps maliciously—to avoid this pitfall; and, though I rang no wedding bells and "gave a wide berth" to the Divorce Court (and its purlieus), I tried in more places than one to show that my hero had shaken off his early misogyny and had fallen in love. Indeed, I went so far as to devote a whole chapter—evidently a sheer waste of good paper and ink—to an account of his making a proposal of marriage; and in the last page of the book I indicated that a wedding was an event upon which the imaginative reader (or reviewer) might with confidence stake his, or her, last dollar.

Yours truly,

F. M. ALLEN.

Munster-house, Lucien-road, Tooting-common,
London, S.W., July 24, 1900.

 We withdraw the word "imitation"; but we cannot advise Mr. Allen to read Mr. Anthony Hope's works.

Poland is not, of course, an imaginary country; but the Poland of Mr. Allen's story is, nevertheless, an imaginary kingdom, seeing that it has an American millionaire for king.

In spite of the "proposal of marriage" we find no real "love interest" in the book. [Ed.]

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Messrs. Macmillan announce "An Attaché In Peking," by Mr. A. Bertram Mitford, who was appointed at Peking as far back as 1865. His book is an actual record of life in the British Legation at Peking, based on the author's diary. From Peking Mr. Mitford went to the Legation in Japan, and a few years later published his "Tales of Old Japan."

We understand that the autobiography of Sir Harry Smith, victor of Aliwal and Governor of the Cape from 1847 to 1852, which his grand-nephew has in hand, will be published in the autumn by Mr. Murray. The autobiography, as Mr. Moore Smith says in his written request for the loan of letters of his great-uncle, has been preserved for many years by General Sir Edward Holdich. It is a pity that the record stops at 1847, telling nothing either of Sir Harry's Governorship of the Cape or of the closing years of his life in England, but perhaps the letters will fill up the gaps. Even as it stands the autobiography covers nearly half a century of a career which was extraordinarily full of fighting romance and adventure. It was, of course, from Sir Harry Smith and his wife that Harrismith, in the Orange River Colony, and Ladysmith, in Natal, took their names, the towns of Whittlesey (named after the burial place of Sir Harry and Lady Smith) and Aliwal also serving to commemorate their connexion with South Africa.

But Sir Harry was the hero of almost a hundred fights before he became Governor of the Cape. He had twelve clasps to his Peninsula medal, and he won his wife in the same campaign. The story of this love affair is worth repeating. After the assault of Badajos, on April 6th, 1812, two handsome Spanish ladies, one the wife of a Spanish officer serving in a distant part of Spain, and the other her sister, a girl of fourteen years—Juana Maria de los Dolores de Leon—claimed the protection of Smith and a brother officer, representing that they had fled to the camp from Badajos, where they had suffered violence from the infuriated soldiery, having had their ear-rings torn from their ears. Smith and his friend took them to a place of safety, and within two years the younger sister became Smith's wife. In later years she was well known in English society. Meantime Smith had campaigning to do in many parts of the world; from the battle of Toulouse to the capture and burning of Washington was only a matter of a few months, and a little later, at the unsuccessful attack on New Orleans, Sir Edward Pakenham fell into his arms, killed. Smith returned from America in time to take part in the battle of Waterloo, and to march with the allies into Paris. One of his younger brothers, by the way, was the first British officer to enter the capital on that occasion. Then came the Kaffir war at the end of 1834, and Harry Smith's memorable ride of 700 miles from Cape Town to Graham's Town in six days. Eight or nine years later he was knighted for his services in the Gwalior campaign, and not long afterwards came his brilliant success at Aliwal. "I never read an account of any affair," said the Duke of Wellington in the House of Lords, "in which an officer has shown himself more capable than this officer has of commanding troops in the field"; and it was of Smith's despatch announcing his victory that Thackeray, in his essay "On Military Snobs," wrote, "A noble deed was never told in nobler language."

The author of "Oom Paul's People," Mr. Howard C. Hillegas, which we noticed last autumn, was for many months with the Boer commandos. He managed, however, to get through the British lines with a good deal of literary and artistic material stowed away in his person, and he is now in America preparing a volume on his experiences, to be called "The Boers in War."

Books of general travel will be numerous this autumn. We have already announced "In the Ice World of Himalaya" and "Among the Berbers of Algeria" (both to come from Mr. Fisher Unwin), and Mr. Murray's list includes "In Tuscany," by Mr. Montgomery Carmichael, British Vice-Consul for West Tuscany. Mr. Fisher Unwin is also bringing out a book entitled "Half-Hours in Japan," by the Rev. Herbert Moore. Messrs. Methuen announce "Modern Abyssinia," by Mr. A. B. Wylde, a traveller who knows the country intimately, and who is said to have had "the privilege of the friendship of King Menelik."

Two more travel books of a somewhat unconventional character are to come from Mr. Fisher Unwin. They are both about tramps. One, entitled "Landlopers," is a tale of tramp life, or "trav'ling," in the Australian bush, written in the form of a diary. Much of the story is said to be founded on the experiences of the author, Mr. J. Le Gay Brereton. The other book is by an American author, Mr. Josiah Flynt, and is a more serious study of vagabond life. It is described as an account of the adventures of a scientific student, who lived the life of a tramp, with all its perils and vicissitudes, in order that he might study the question of tramps and their relation to crime on its own ground and in its own peculiar conditions and environment. Russian, German, and English tramps are studied, as well as American. "Tramping with Tramps," as the volume is called, will contain an introductory letter from Mr. Andrew D. White, the American Ambassador in Berlin, and a chapter and glossary devoted to the tramps' jargon.

Students of Italian art will also be well catered for. Two or three months ago we referred to the forthcoming publication by Messrs. Putnam of Mr. Bernhard Berenson's concluding volume on the Italian Painters of the Renaissance, as well as to the two new editions of "The Florentine Painters" in the same series, revised and considerably enlarged. Mr. Murray now announces a somewhat similar work —"The Painters of Florence from the Thirteenth to the Sixteenth Centuries"—by Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady), intended as "a handy book for travellers in Italy and students of art." Perhaps Mrs. Ady's book will also lead to a series.

Dr. James Breck Perkins has written the story of "Richelieu, and the Growth of the French Power," to be published shortly in Putnam's Heroes of the Nations Series. The author has already reviewed Richelieu's administration in his history of "France under Mazarin," but the present volume, it is stated, is based upon an examination of new sources of information, including the MSS. to be found in the Affaires Etrangères at Paris and other public offices. His book will be followed next month by Mr. Robert Dunlop's Life of Daniel O'Connell. There may be some delay in bringing out the volume on "Louis IX. (Saint Louis)," which should follow the O'Connell book, as Mr. Frederick Perry, the author, has been sent to South Africa on Government service.

Some startling statistics are given in the announcement of the book on "The Locust Plague and its Suppression," by Dr. Henry Munro, which Mr. Murray will shortly publish. It seems that of the 53,000,000 square miles which the earth's land surface comprises, 40,000,000 are more or less continuously subjected to the scourge of the locust plague. "It causes a greater loss both in blood and treasure than a war even between Great Britain and the South African Republics."

A second series of Illustrated volumes on "Literary Hearthstones," written by Marion Harland, will be published by Messrs. Putnam in the autumn. The first series dealt with Charlotte Brontë and Wm. Cowper; the two forthcoming volumes deal with Hannah More and John Knox. About the same time Messrs. Putnam will continue their series of "Historic Towns of New England" and "Historic Towns of the Middle States" with a volume on the "Towns of the Southern States," edited by Lyman P. Powell, with an introduction by W. B. Trent.

Balzac's works are to become common property on the 18th of this month. M. Calmann Lévy has already begun to reprint all his works in 3f. 50c. volumes. For the right of publishing them up to the present year Michel Lévy paid, in 1865, fifteen years after the author's death, the sum of 80,000 francs. The works of some of Balzac's famous contemporaries will not cease to be copyright until much later. De Musset's copyright expires in 1905, de Vigny's in 1913, Lamartine's and Sainte-Beuve's in 1919, the elder Dumas' in 1921, Gautier's in 1922, Michelet's in 1924, and Victor Hugo's in 1935.

Among the works announced by Mr. Murray may be mentioned "The Life and Correspondence of the Right Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers," by his son, Lieutenant-Colonel Spencer Childers (though this will probably not appear before the new year); "Dangerous Trades," in which a number of experts deal with the different aspects of industrial occupations as affecting public health, edited by Dr. T. Oliver; Mr. Sydney Buxton's "Political Handbook," adapted to the coming general election; and a translation, in two volumes, of "The Greek Thinkers," by Professor Gomperz, of Vienna University, who is the author of the standard German translation of Mill's "Logic."

Messrs. Greening are publishing a volume entitled "Northern Lights and Shadows, and Eskimo Folklore," edited and translated by Ralph Graham Taber, proprietor and manager of the Eskimo Village at the Paris Exhibition. The book will be made up of folk tales translated from the originals told in the Eskimo tongue. Although this is their first publication, the authorship of them undoubtedly dates back hundreds, and possibly thousands, of years.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Mr. John Murray is clearly bent on extending his old-established business in more directions than one. His series of novels is a new departure for the firm in Albemarle-street, and hard upon this comes the announcement of the Monthly Review, a publication on rather new lines which is to appear first at the end of next month.

* * * *

The size is about that of the old New Review. Antique woven paper, a new fount of type, large margins, and stitched binding will do all that can be done for the exterior of the new periodical. The contents will apparently be very much like those of the existing reviews, with two exceptional features. The Monthly Review will be illustrated, and it will contain a certain number of "editorials" as well as signed articles. The appointment of Mr. Henry Newbolt as editor is full of interest. The author of "Admirals All" has already achieved a well-deserved reputation as a writer of stirring verse, and we hope that he will be no less successful in conducting a high class review. We wish him and Mr. Murray's new venture all success.

* * * *

The Stage Society has had a successful first season, and proposes largely to increase its membership. Other changes are also contemplated. One is the substitution of some other night than Sunday for the performances. This presents certain difficulties. A theatre and actors are not so easy to secure on a week-night. The enlargement of the society will also make it necessary to give two representations of each play instead of one. It is to be hoped the society will really set itself to do a useful work and to benefit its age by seeking out and producing English plays. Our stage is at a critical point. A great deal of talent is tentatively approaching the dramatic form. If it is encouraged we shall have the makings of a modern English drama. Lacking encouragement, it will give up the attempt and the theatre will remain what it is—the home of worn-out conventions bolstered up by spectacular adornment and music-hall display.

* * * *

At a time when coals and other commodities are getting dearer because of the wars, it may be a consolation to some people to learn that copyright novels are likely to get cheaper. The talk, at present, is of abolishing the six-shilling novel, and substituting the half-crown novel, in paper covers. This is practically the French plan, which has both advantages and drawbacks. The advantage is that it increases the book-buying public; the drawback is that, supposing the author to get a living wage, a volume that a book lover would care to handle can hardly be turned out for the money. Nor is it any answer to this argument to say that the purchaser can have books bound if he wants to preserve them. In the case of long books by authors who demand heavy royalties, the French publishers habitually economize in the quality of the paper, with the result that a new novel by M. Zola almost invariably makes its first appearance in a format utterly unworthy of a binding. No doubt, however, the state of the market for six-shilling novels is just now such as to make some new experiment desirable. Publishers and authors would probably like to go back to the old three-volume format; but this is impossible, since the libraries block the way.

The managers of the German Theatre in London, encouraged by the success of its season at St. George's-hall, propose to have a winter season extending from the middle of October to the middle of April. The performances this time will be given in the Comedy Theatre, Haymarket.

A sympathetic sketch of the career of "John Oliver Hobbes" in the Bookman contains the interesting announcement that Mrs. Craigie's next novel will probably deal with Nonconformity. It is a subject on which, in spite of the satirical sketches of Mrs. Oliphant, there is still room for a great novel. Great novelists have as a rule been rather shy of giving the sympathetic rôle of jeune premier to a Dissenter. The sympathetic Dissenter is almost as rare in fiction as, say, the sympathetic dentist or the sympathetic dancing-master. Mrs. Craigie seems to have many qualifications for repairing the wrong that is done to a large and useful section of the community. Her ancestors, we learn from the Bookman, were Free Church divines, and her father is one of Dr. Parker's deacons. We trust she will write the sort of novel about Nonconformity that the Doctor and the deacons will be pleased with.

In the Contemporary Review Mr. Aylmer Maude reproaches Literature for having refused, two years ago, to take Count Tolstoi's theory of art seriously. The definition of art which Mr. Maude there quotes with approval from Count Tolstoi runs thus:—

> Art is a human activity, consisting in this, that one man consciously, by means of certain external signs, hands on to others feelings he has lived through, and that other people are infected by these feelings, and also experience them.

The definition, of course, narrows the meaning of a word to which the dictionaries give a wider significance, and which can be used, in ordinary parlance, for any kind of work guided by rules; and it is not hard to pick holes in it even as a definition of what is understood when art is spelt with a capital A. It would exclude the art of the actor whose business is to infect his audience not with the emotions which he has lived through, but with the emotions which the stage manager directs him to simulate. It would also exclude the art of any man of letters who does not write imaginative literature—any masterpiece addressed not to the feelings but to the intellect, like Gibbon's "Decline and Fall." It is not even fair to the imaginative writer. It would prove that there is no art in the novel of observation, but only in the novel of experience. That is to say it would place "A Rebours" on a higher plane than "Madame Bovary." Whence it seems to follow that, though the definition may stand as a definition of the art of Count Tolstoi, it will not hold water as a definition of art in general. But has any one ever given—and will any one ever give—a definition of art that will defy analysis?

A correspondent writes:—"A comparison of events in China with Mr. M. P. Shiels' romance, 'The Yellow Danger,' which was published two years ago, is curious. There is much in the novel that is prophetic of the present situation, especially in some of the minor details of the book. The disposition of the British Fleet coincides remarkably with the book; although since Mr. Shiel's novel appeared there have, of course, been many changes in our Chinese squadron. Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Seymour, of course, is still in command of the Fleet, which includes H.M. ships Barfleur, Terrible, Bonaventure, Daphne, and others mentioned by Mr. Shiel. But for the war in South Africa H.M.S. Powerful, which plays an important part in the romance, would almost certainly have been there also. The usurpation of Prince Tuan, hitherto a practical nonentity, of what is virtually despotic power, bears a superficial resemblance to the rapid rise of Dr. Yen How in the book to a similar dictatorship. The massacre of Europeans and their flight seaward, so vividly depicted by Mr. Shiel, have been realized. We have learnt to our cost, in accordance with the author's warning, that China is now armed with the most modern weapons of the highest scientific precision, which she has quietly, but continuously, been importing from Europe since her war with Japan. It is obvious from the efficiency of the Chinese troops, and particularly the gunners, that the military drill planned by Dr. Yen How has been carried out in reality to a large extent by the Chinese authorities; and it is only too probable that the foreign officers have been murdered by the soldiers they have disciplined, as actually happens in the novel. But the most startling fulfilment of any event foretold in 'The Yellow Danger' is the Chinese invasion of Siberia; it is fortunate for Europe that this raid is not likely to be followed in fact, as in fiction, by the armed exodus of all China."

An article in the Quarterly on "the conditions of great poetry" is an attempt to find the reason why England is not producing great poetry at the present time. The writer's idea is that "at the root of all great poetry there is some form or other of strenuous and impassioned optimism" which "must be generally diffused throughout the poet's own country or throughout the world," and that this is not the case with us just now. It sounds plausible; but it is always difficult to characterize correctly the age in which we live. The discovery that the British Empire is a happy and united family may very well be held by our critics of the future to mark off our period as one of widely diffused optimism, in spite of its conspicuous lack of poetry; or it may even come to the conclusion that some of our poetry was greater than we thought. Nor is it at all certain that the contemporaries of Byron—who flourished in a period when trade was bad—were conscious of being optimists.

According to the reviewer, it is not enough for the poet to be an optimist; he must also address an optimistic public. Otherwise his work will not be on the high plane of the interpreter but on the lower plane of the missionary. This, too, sounds plausible; but we begin to have our doubts when we find the theory invoked in connexion with the name of Mr. Swinburne. Surely Mr. Swinburne's early poems cannot be regarded as endeavours to interpret the prevailing sentiments of an optimistic age. He was rather the poet who set out to épater le bourgeois. He was, in short, a self-appointed missionary to the bourgeois; and he was received by the bourgeois much in the same spirit in which missionaries are received in China. Respectable newspapers denounced him, and respectable fathers of families put his works on the fire with the tongs, with the result that his first editions went to a premium. Nowadays Mr. Swinburne is himself a bourgeois, and interprets, when he does not obscure, the widely diffused optimism of the average man. But he wrote better poetry when his optimism—if that be the proper name for his appeal to pagan gods to "come down and redeem us from virtue"—was, as the reviewer puts it, "the precarious possession of some small clique or party."

The little poem which runs:—

La vie est vaine,
Un peu d'amour,
Un peu de haine,
Et puis—bonjour.

La vie est brève
Un peu d'espoir,
Un peu de rêve,
Et puis—bonsoir

has always tempted the translators by reason of the difficulties it presents. The extreme simplicity of the lines is merely a subtle form of artfulness hardly discovered until the words are transposed into English. A correspondent sends us two versions, the one "capping" the other, which were brought into being a few evenings ago.

This life is vain,
A lover's sigh,
A little pain,
And then—good-bye.

And life I deem Holds grief, delight,
A little dream,
And then—good-night.

We like the second one better:—

Our life is vain;
A love, some play;
A hope, some pain,
And then—good-day.

And life is brief
For me, for you—
A dream, a grief,
And then—adieu.

Against Mr. Balfour's disparaging remarks about Landseer the other day may be placed a passage from a letter written by Dickens to the artist on the 10th of January, 1856—"Whenever I speak of men born of nature to be writers if they had not highly distinguished themselves in some other way (they are mighty few) I always instance you with your remarkable powers of observation and perception." Rossetti was no less warm in his appreciation of Landseer's "Dialogue at Waterloo":—

> This is, in the truest sense of the word, an historical picture; . . . not merely an embodiment of conceptions, however acute and valuable, founded on the records left us from past ages; this, on the contrary, is itself a record, a part of the time, to remain chronicled; an emphatic personal testimony. It belongs to a class of art but too little followed in our day, which leaves its own annals, for the most part, to the caricaturist and the newspaper draughtsman; a class which is more "historical" than Mr. Cross' picture, or than Mr. Lucy's, or than M. Delaroche's, as not being painted from history, but itself history painted.

Nevertheless, the fame of Sir Edwin is, we fear, on the wane. His works do not appeal to connoisseurs with a tenth the force to-day that they did a decade ago.

One of the most interesting by-ways in the history of literature, that of privately printed books, still remains largely unexplored. The compilation of such a history naturally presents considerable difficulties. Every year increases rather than lessens them, and until the task is taken in hand seriously our national bibliography, in this respect, can only be regarded as glaringly incomplete. No consistent attempt has been made to grapple with the matter since Martin published his work on the subject, the second edition of which is even now more than forty years old. And yet much that is of interest and importance, especially in regard to modern books, is being lost by not taking account of personal preferences. Privately printed books fall generally into three classes, those privately printed in very limited numbers for sale or otherwise; those compiled from letters and circulated only in a limited circle; and those issued for the purpose of testing opinion on the merits of some proposed work.

* * * *

The first class do not present many difficulties from a bibliographical point of view, for they mostly bear the date and place of imprint, and are sufficiently numerous to be traced without much trouble. Into this category fall all those works illustrating private collections of objets d'art, the beauty and value of which their owners, either from vanity or a genuine love of the subject, desire to be more generally known and appreciated. Such works are often issued regardless of expense, as, for instance, the "Museum Worsleyanum," by Sir Richard, two volumes, folio, which is said to have cost as much as £27,000. Into this class fall also the books published at private presses, such as the Strawberry-hill and Lee Priory Presses, and it includes besides the numerous series of bibelots dealing with some peculiar class of "ana," like the diminutive volumes published by Mr. William Loring Andrews on "Grolier," "Aldus," and other kindred subjects.

* * * *

The second class includes all those volumes which are mainly restricted to reprints of the correspondence of well-known authors, not previously published. Sometimes these compilations, like the "Charlotte Brontë and Her Circle," edited by Mr. Shorter, are printed for the use of the general public, but it more frequently happens that the books owe their existence to a desire to give a small circle of friends some of that intimate knowledge of an author which can be obtained from a study of his spontaneous correspondence. As may be readily understood, such volumes are extremely difficult of acquisition, and as they do not come within the terms of the Copyright Act there is no certain means of tracing them.

The last class is the despair of the bibliographer and the collector. But they present a romantic side to the history of literature, and a volume dealing with them adequately would be highly entertaining. For instance, the real reasons why Byron, Matthew Arnold, and many other authors were induced to destroy or cancel the issue of certain volumes of their works as soon as printed would make an interesting chapter. Of Byron's first work, the "Fugitive Pieces," privately printed at Newark in 1806, only three copies are now known to exist, for he ordered the entire issue, of about one hundred copies, to be burned almost as soon as they were printed. Another waif around which centres a long and important chapter of literary history is the excessively scarce trial print of the "Laus Veneris," of which Moxon issued a few copies in order to fortify himself with the opinions of competent judges before venturing to issue the "Poems and Ballads" of 1866. But even then the storm raised seared Moxon so much that he hastily handed over his remaining sheets of that remarkable volume to Hotten to publish, and thus gave rise to the two different title-pages prefixed to this now famous first edition. The most remarkable example is that offered by Tennyson in his different versions of "The Idylls of the King." Not only had many of the various editions different names from those which they now possess, but as regards the earliest ones they frequently differed in both form and connexion. How many separate prints were taken of these poems it appears even now almost impossible to tell, and the collection of a complete set of only those known would be a very difficult matter. The whole subject has a real fascination, but if its mazes are to be successfully threaded it is necessary for each generation to gather up its own clues.

A very scarce book, with a [illegible] about it, is George Turbervile's "Booke of Falconrie," 1575, a copy of which is included in Mr. Quaritch's recent list of "Additions to the English Catalogue." Turbervile was better known in his own day as a garrulous traveller with a poetical turn of mind, but to-day his fame rests rather upon his prose writings than upon his verse, and his book on falconry is a classic among works on sport. It stands about midway between Dame Berners' "Treatise on Fishing" and Izaak Walton's masterpiece, and has much in common with both. From every page there breathes an enthusiasm for wild sports and for all manner of field pastimes. Turbervile deals with the mysteries of the training of falcons, hobbys, lanners, lanets, and goshawks almost as genially as Walton with the peculiarities of fishes. Turbervile's introduction to his book is a characteristic piece of verse. Here are the opening lines:—

I deem that no man doubts
But games and all our chief delights,
Were first devised to drive the dumps
Of pensive pinéd sprights.

To clear the clouds of drooping cares,
And mists of mournful mind,
And banish bale that heavy hearts
In cheerless chairs did bind.

A correspondent, who has been amusing himself lately in conning the titles and mottoes of old books, sends us the result of some of his investigations:—Despite Butler's assertion that the titles of books have a physiognomy of their own from which a skilful observer will know what to expect, a great many of the old titles are very misleading. There is the old story of the Farming Society of Dublin, who ordered a dozen copies of the "Essay on Irish Bulls" under the impression—natural enough—that the book related to the subject. A French writer who translated Shakespeare's Winter's Tale into his own language, called it Conte de Monsieur Winter. Horne Tooke's "Diversions of Purley," one of the most abstruse treatises on etymology, had many purchasers, who believed it to be a book of amusing games. Some of the eccentric old titles seem to have provided useful suggestions to modern writers. Barnaby Rich's "Souldier's Wish for British Welfare: A Dialogue betweene Captaine Skill and Captaine Pill," may very well have given Leigh Hunt the idea of his "Captain Sword and Captain Pen." A little book published in 1670, entitled "Unfortunate Heroes, or Adventures of Ovid, Horace, Virgil, Agrippa, &c.," distinctly recalls the chapter on literary men in Carlyle's "Hero Worship."

* * * *

The titles of old books on dress are some of them worth recalling. Here are two:—"England's Vanity, or the Monstrous Sin of Pride in Dress, Naked Shoulders, and a Hundred Other Fooleries" (1683) and "Quippes for Upstart Newfangled Gentlewomen, or a Glass to View the Pride of Vain Glorious Women, containing a Pleasant Invective against the Fantastical Forrein Toys Daylie used in Women's Apparell" (1595). Rhyming titles were formerly often to be met with. The following is a good example:—

Reader, here you'll plainly see
Judgment perverted by these three—
A Priest, a Judge, a Parcentee—
By Thomas Heywood. 1611.

Authors of modern educational books might take a lesson from some old writers in the choice of entertaining titles. Grammar, under the title of the "Diversions of Purley" assumes a most attractive guise. A sixteenth-century Latin grammar has as sub-title the following:—"A Delysious Syrupe newly Clarythst for Yonge Scholars yt thurste tor that Sweto Lycore of Latin Speche." Old lexicons would be termed an "Altearie" or a "New World of Works," or a "Manipulus Vocabulorum." But in the invention of fanciful titles the Puritans excelled all other writers. Here are the names of some of their theological pamphlets and books, "A most delectable Sweet Perfumed Nosegay for God's Saints to smell at" (1586); "The Snuffers of Divine Love"; "Heel-pieces for Limping Sinners"; and "The Spiritual Mustard-Pot to make the Soul Sneeze with Emotion."

* * * *

The naïveté of some of the mottoes adopted by authors in introducing their books must have helped to put their readers in a good temper:—

Read this over if you're wise,
If you're not, then read it twise;
If a fool, and in the gall
Of bitterness read not at all.

The above is from "Gentlemen Look About You" (1590). Here is another from that delightful book "Geffrey Whitney's Emblems" (1586):—

"Peruse with heede, then frendly judge, and blaming rash refraine;
So mayst thon reade unto thy goode, and shalt requite my paine."

The world of art and letters in Paris has suffered a severe loss in the death of Ary Renan, who died on Saturday last at the early age of forty-three. From his father he had inherited not only the love of letters but something of Renan's charm of style, and from his great uncle, Ary Scheffer, and his grandfather, Henry Scheffer, he had received his taste for art. A pupil of Gustave Moreau, Puvis de Chavannes, and Elie Delaunay, he has followed in their footsteps and confined himself to ideal and antique art. The three paintings now on exhibition at the Grand Palace give an excellent idea of his manner and ability. Although professedly a painter, Ary Renan was quite as much a writer and a poet. He wrote a remarkable series of critical articles for the Gazette des Beaux-Arts. His last literary work was a sympathetic biography of Gustave Moreau.

The Mercure de France this month contains several articles suggested by the present crisis. "La Chine qui se ferme," by a navy officer, who adopts Pierre Nosles as his nom de guerre, is full of actuality. The writer has been in China for many years and knows the people and the country well. M. Remy de Gourmont gives his opinion on the same subject. Dr. Albert Prieur reviews "Superstition, Crime, et Misère en Chine." The author, Major J. J. Matignon, is shut in Peking with the French Legation. There is also an article by Charles Merki, à propos of "La Chine qui s'ouvre," by René Pinon and J. de Marcillac. This book is a good summary of the diplomatic history of the Far East since the Chino-Japanese war.

For English and American visitors to Italy, especially for those who are not well acquainted with Italian, the new Italian Review, written in English, and published in Rome, should prove welcome reading. The review is to appear on the 15th of each month, beginning from next November. Meanwhile a specimen number which has been published gives a good idea of what use the monthly will be in keeping English visitors au courant with Italian life in all its aspects. Italian politics, art, drama, society, and sport all find a place, and the editor, Professor Fanny Zampini Salazar, devotes an interesting article to the subject of Woman's Progress. A novel devoted to life in Italy and a poet's corner, which "Violet Fane" is the first to fill with an appropriate poem, "In a Roman Garden," will be special features.

The Eighteenth Century.

One cannot accuse Mr. Balfour of positive originality in standing up for the eighteenth century in his address to the University Extension students at Cambridge. The prejudice against that century was no doubt very real at one time, owing partly to the fact that it came to a bad end in the midst of wars and revolutions, and partly to the fact that Carlyle denounced it with all the vigorous indignation of a Hebrew prophet. Its claims to our respectful consideration, however, have been vindicated by many critics, including Mr. John Morley and Mr. Leslie Stephen; and it has been shown that the eighteenth century can furnish satisfactory parallels to most of the distinctive features on which the nineteenth century prides itself. It laid the foundations of British industrial supremacy by such inventions as the steam engine and the spinning jenny; and it laid the foundations of Imperialism, seeing that it was in the eighteenth century that England "conquered the world in a fit of absence of mind." It was a century of fruitful scientific exploration and inquiry—the century in which Kant revolutionized metaphysics, and De Saussure revolutionized geology, and Lavoisier revolutionized chemistry, and learned men went to Lapland to observe the transit of Venus, and to the Andes to measure an arc of the Meridian. In the domain of literature the century saw the invention—some would even say the perfection—of the novel by Fielding, Richardson, and Rousseau; in the domain of art it was represented by Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney; in the domain of religion it produced the Wesleys to be compared with the Puseyites, and the Moravians who anticipated the Christian Endeavourers. Nor is it true to charge the century, as some do, with being flaccid and incapable of enthusiasm. Even in this latter Mainly About People period the world is not so interested as it then was in those whom it conceived to be its greatest men—as witness the fashion of making pilgrimages to see Voltaire, the Priest of Pure Reason, at Geneva; and Rousseau, the Pope of Sentimentalism, in the Val de Travers. Decidedly in loving the eighteenth century Mr. Balfour is not wasting his affections on a worthless object. But there are, in truth, many reasons, quite apart from its achievements in the intellectual arena, that make the eighteenth century attractive—especially when one looks back upon it from a distance and is not obliged to see anything in it that one prefers to shut one's eyes to. From the point of view of literature, which is the only point of view with which we have space to concern ourselves, it was the period in which literature had not yet passed under the tyranny of the man in the street. There were no free elementary schools, producing a half-educated public clamouring for something to read, incapable of appreciating style, indifferent to learning that could not be turned to immediate practical account, but eager for cheap sensationalism and hackneyed sentiment. The masses were grossly ignorant; but there was a considerable aristocracy of intellect. The man of letters wrote, if not for his intellectual equals, at least for a public that had intellectual taste, knew when he was doing his best, and did not need to be written down to—a public, too, that did not suspend its interest in literature because a war was raging at the other end of the world. Of course, there was an obverse side to the medal—"toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail." Literary men often lived in garrets instead of country seats, and frequented taverns instead of clubs. If they wanted to grow rich, they had to keep a shop, like Richardson, or go in for fraudulent army contracting, like Voltaire. And, though they were welcomed and made much of at the Court of Frederick the Great, they were wise to give a wide berth to the Court of Louis XIV., who probably locked up more literary men in the course of his long reign than any other Monarch in any other age of the world's history. Few people, however, can look at both sides of a medal at once; and by keeping the obverse of this medal invisible one gets a picture of literary life in the eighteenth century which is full of charm for every man of real literary taste.

TO A BIOGRAPHER.

You write his life! you will but prove
That he was neither saint nor sage;
Nor will he more our wonder move
Divested of his garb of mage,
And all the trappings of the stage;

And that beside what he bequeathed
In unexplained munificence;
Beside the wealth wherewith he wreathed
An empty name with consequence
The man was an impertinence.

But to your task; you undertake
From hints of sorrow, strife, desire;
From what it seemed he held as stake,
To show the man—his force, his fire;
What lay beneath his soul's attire;

How he regarded God and man;
Did he find hard those questions set
Of Life that we as children scan;
Give up and pass with inward fret,
Not learned enough to answer yet?

But of himself where hides the truth—
If he knew not can you decide?
Did he not deify in youth
The things in manhood thrice denied?
Yet who in this would say he lied?

Ah! those unspoken thoughts which made
The inner man we never knew;
And all that in the genial shade
Of his great nature lived and grew,
From far-off founts their nurture drew.

Nor more of him can you aver
Than one who marking from a height
A distant sail, can say of her
The port, though hidden from his sight,
The helmsman steers for day and night.

These well-proved facts, or those—their sum
Or difference, this or that way read—
To final truth indeed are dumb;
Believe me, both of quick and dead,
Blest are we most in things unsaid.

You loved him and, as friend, were proud
To know the man behind the pen!
Then wherefore show him to the crowd,
When far lies that beyond its ken
Which made him more than common men?

Nor will our love accept your best
Unless it be, as lovers need,
In such chameleon speech expressed
That each may there, for his own creed,
Peculiar confirmations read.

W. G. HOLE.

BE SATISFIED.

Be satisfied! Love is not given in vain;
The poor, parched Earth is greener for the rain
The unasked Heaven's largess, though hearts tried
Long time and strove against it, and denied
Her freshened flowers, her rapturous fields of green;
The rain hath saved: and we, for all its pride,
Perchance unloved of thee a heart had died.
Be satisfied.

Love on, until for Love's sake thou dost deem
All things less lovely,—save to love is gain,
Yea, is great gain; though all the world deride
And hope grow weary, still whate'er betide
Love on, high heart, and thou shalt yet attain
Thy heaven, and, the last want put aside,
Be satisfied!

Personal Views.

ONE OR TWO OLD NOVELS.

This heading of mine, with its suggestion of a few old-fashioned books, and leisure to enjoy them, contrasts well with the "Recent Fiction," "Ten New Novels," and the like, which indicate the reviewer's desperate attempts to keep pace with the fertility of modern writers. There are no statistics that I know of, but probably the weekly output of to-day exceeds the annual output of the time of Richardson, Fielding, and Smollett. These eminent men wrote comparatively little. Richardson produced three novels only, though two of these were long ones; Fielding three, and Smollett less than half a dozen. To-day, nearly every well-known novelist has twenty works to his credit, and some of them still more, so that nobody who does not devote his whole life to the business can pretend to know more than a percentage of them. In such a state of things, I am tempted to adopt the attitude of the man, now and then satirized in eighteenth-century novels, who has made the grand tour and professes to read nothing but the classics. I have made the grand tour of fiction, from "Theagenes and Charicleia," a fourth-century work, to the novel that was published only yesterday. Some of them I have reviewed, and these, happily for me, do not long remain in my memory. Pereunt et imputantur; which is to say, being interpreted, that they have their day, a very short one, and are reckoned up without much profit to any one.

I shall always regret that my comparatively recent introduction to this planet has precluded me from reviewing "Clarissa," "Pamela," "Joseph Andrews," and "Sir Charles Grandison." It would have been a pleasure to me to praise "Pamela" for "the novelty of the plan, the strokes of nature and pathos with which the work abounds, the simplicity of language, the sentiments of piety and virtue that are brought forward." In "Sir Charles Grandison," Clementina would have been described as "a young creature involved in a passion expressed with the utmost innocence and delicacy, yet so strong as to overturn her reason; and afterwards, on the recovery of her reason, after a severe struggle, voluntarily sacrificing that very passion at the shrine of religious principle." Such were Richardson's model young women, whom our ancestors heartily admired. When Richardson's village readers heard that Pamela had at last married Mr. B., a shadowy gentleman with no surname, they set the church bells ringing. When a painful interval occurred in the publication of the volumes of "Clarissa," the author was overwhelmed with letters imploring him to give the story a happy ending. For my own part, had I been Richardson, to whom time and space were no object, I should have married her ultimately to Sir Charles Grandison. He might have been introduced as the travelling friend of the avenging Colonel Morden, and he would have been ready with a hundred excellent reasons for marrying the lady in the sixteenth volume. But Richardson was inexorable, as we all know, and the story, thanks to its detail, is a most affecting tragedy. An abbreviated version of "Clarissa" was once produced by a misguided person who failed to see how completely the whole book depends for its effect on its detail. It moves slowly, very slowly indeed, but that is in reality its chief merit. Yet I could not undervalue a certain labour-saving appliance which appears in the unabridged edition. At the end of each of the eight volumes there is a summary of each chapter, so that he who reads may skip, if he is minded to do so. It may be worth while to quote one of these summaries:—"Lovelace to Belford:—Copy of the transcribed paper. It proves to be her torn answer to his proposals. Meekness the glory of a woman. Ludicrous image of a termagant wife. He had better never to have seen this paper. Has very strong remorses. Paints them in lively colours. Sets forth the lady's transcendent virtue and greatness of mind. Surprised into these arguments in her favour by his conscience. Puts it to flight." But the reader ought not to skip. Take away his detail, and Richardson is, as Thackeray's Lord March says, "a fat old printer who has written a story about a confounded girl and a fellow that ruins her." Read him honestly, all the one million words of Clarissa's story, and you will find yourself, for at least a week, in the eighteenth century.

It may have been with the hope of reviving a taste for old novels that Mr. Henley has lately edited Smollett, undertaking at the same time the much more difficult task of commending him to the public. Now, Smollett is excellent material for the critic, and Mr. Henley is no mean critic. He assigns Smollett his due place in literature, as a sort of forerunner of Marryat and of the author of "Pickwick." Unluckily, Smollett deserves not only all the good things, but also all the hard things, that Mr. Henley has been obliged to say of him. In a string of epithets worthy of Aristophanes, Mr. Henley calls him "the humorous, arrogant, red-headed, stiff-necked, thin-skinned, scurrilous, brilliant, Scots hack of genius." All these adjectives are true. Throw a little of Smollett's filth at the canvas—an indispensable final touch—and the picture will be complete. Smollett readable in these days! Yes, if we do not mind the dull and stupid foulness which, with all his genius, he seems to have mistaken for humour. It is not the mere pardonable coarseness of a coarse age, but an unsavoury mess which provokes, not laughter, but nausea. He knew the world well, especially the seamy side of it, so that he has a certain historical value; but, when everything has been said that can be said for him, he remains the only great writer of his time who demands from his reader the physical qualification of a strong stomach. Obviously, I cannot back my assertion by quotations. I appeal to "Humphry Clinker." "Humphry Clinker" is distinctly the cleanest of Smollett's books, yet its readers will soon find that they love to turn over its pages to the old Edinburgh cry of "Gardyloo." Smollett will explain what that means. Most people will prefer literature in which it is not necessary to walk so warily.

There was another Scotch doctor, with a career strangely like that of Smollett, who had, however, none of the "spleen and jaundice" of the learned Smelfungus. Dr. John Moore, the father of the General whose Burial is so celebrated, wrote "Zeluco," the novel of the year in 1789. To my mind, "Zeluco" is a fairer representative of the old novel than any of Smollett's shady heroes. It may not be a work of genius, but it fairly indicates the taste of the generation succeeding Smollett's. Mr. Henley incidentally refers to "Zeluco" as "now almost unreadable." That is a matter of opinion, and cannot be argued. It may be said, however, that any one who likes full-flavoured villainy will do well to make the experiment of reading this once famous book. Zeluco himself is so solidly drawn, and made such an impression on our grandfathers, that his character was pronounced to have reached, "like that of Satan, the very sublime of guilt." Naturally, one compares him with his compatriot, Tebaldo Pagliuca, Mr. Marion Crawford's more recent Sicilian villain. Mr. Crawford, no doubt, is the better artist, though Dr. Moore also was quite at home in Italy. But Zeluco, according to his old-fashioned, eighteenth-century lights, does his best to be a complete sinner, and the gradual development of his criminal nature proceeds, or is intended to proceed, on scientific principles. That, at any rate, is in his favour.

C. H. T.

NEW LIGHT ON SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

I.

From documents which I have fortunately rediscovered I am able to cast new light on various phases of Raleigh's career. Thomas Baker, the antiquary (1656-1740), left brief notes of MSS. which had been in his possession and which referred to charges of "Atheism" against Marlowe, Kyd, and Raleigh. These notes were transcribed by Hunter in his MS. "Chorus Vatum," and were utilized by Mr. Sidney Lee in his articles on Raleigh and the two dramatists in the "Dictionary of National Biography." The original MSS. were, however, supposed to have disappeared, and to be no longer accessible. But last year I discovered the papers relating to Kyd and Marlowe among the "Harleian MSS.," and gave an account of them in No. 386 of the Fortnightly Review. For a long time I could not trace the Raleigh papers, but I have recently found them in fols. 183-190 of the "Harleian MSS.," 6,849. These documents, on which this article is based, contain the record of "examinations" held at Cerne in Dorsetshire on March 21st, 1593-4, by order of the Court of High Commission, and they begin with a list of nine "interrogatories" on "Atheisme and Apostacye." The special Commissioners appointed to take evidence in answer to these interrogatories were Viscount Bindon (Lord Thomas Howard), Sir Raulfe Horsey, Dr. Frances James, John Willyams, and Fraunces Hawley, of whom Horsey, Willyams, and Hawley have appended their autograph signatures to the record of the examinations. Cerne is not far from Sherborne, where Raleigh was during this period living in retirement. In the early summer of 1592 the discovery by the Queen of her favourite's intrigue with Elizabeth Throckmorton had resulted in his imprisonment in the Tower, and, though he was set free after a few months, he remained in the deepest disgrace. As member, however, for Michael in Cornwall, he attended the Session of Parliament in 1593. During these few months in London, an exiled from "Cynthia" and her brilliant circle, he was thrown largely into the society of men of letters, many of whom were under suspicion of free-thinking. He had left the capital, however, before the arrest of Kyd, and afterwards of Marlowe, in May, 1593; but the charges made against his "man" Harriott during the proceedings against the dramatists and reports later from the West Country of the sayings and doings of himself and his friends in Dorsetshire gave his enemies an opportunity of striking at him while he was under a cloud. That the Commissioners were anxious to get hold of every scrap of evidence against him may be inferred from the fact that all the witnesses examined were either clergymen or churchwardens, whose bias would naturally be entirely on the Orthodox side. And we may, therefore, fairly conclude that in the allegations of such witnesses we get the worst that is to be urged against Sir Walter on the score of irreligion.

The most valuable part of the examinations is the "relacion" or report of a theological discussion with Raleigh, written and delivered to the Commissioners "upon his oath" by Ralph Ironside, minister of Winterbourne. Ironside was a man of some distinction. Born at Houghton-le-Spring, in Durham, about 1550, he had been a member of St. Edmund Hall at Oxford, had graduated in 1580, and had afterwards been elected a Fellow of University College. His character and attainments lend weight to his statements, as does also his preliminary declaration that "for his owne knowledge he will aunswer, but for that he hath harde, and knoweth no anethore to justefye the same, he is perswaded by Counsell that he is in daunger to be punished, and therefore refuseth to saye any thinge uppon uncertaine report." His "relacion" opens thus:—

> Wednesday seveniight before the Assises summer laste I came to Sir George Trenchards in the afternoone. There were then with the knight Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Raulfe Horsey, Mr. Carewe Rawleigh, Mr. John Fitziames, &c.

The gathering here described took place, as is evident from Ironside's words, in the summer of 1593, some time after Sir Walter's return from the capital. This glimpse into his social life at a period when our information about him is scanty would, of itself, lend value to the "relacion," which goes on to describe the beginning of the theological debate as follows:—

> Towards the end of supper some loose speeches of Mr. Carewe Rawleighes beeing gentlye reproved by Sir Raulfe Horsey in these words "Colloquia prava corrumpunt bonos mores," Mr. Rawleigh demaunds of me what daunger he might incurr by such speeches? Whereunto I answered, "The wages of sinn is death." And he makinge leight of death as beinge common to all, sinner and reightuous, I inferred further that as that liffe which is the gifte of God through Iesus Christ is liffe eternal, soe that death which is properlye the wages of sinne is death eternall, both of the bodye and of the soule alsoe. "Soule," quod Mr. Carewe Rawleigh, "what is that?" "Better it were," sayed I, "that we would be carefull howe the soules might be saved then to be curiouse in findinge out ther essence."

This attempt of the worthy minister of Winterbourne to parry Carew Raleigh's query by an edifying commonplace draws Sir Walter into the discussion.

> And soe keeping silence, Sir Walter requestes me that for there instruccion I wouldе answer to the question that before by his brother was proposed unto me. "I have beeu," sayeth he, "a scholler some tyme in Oxeforde: I have aunswered under a Bachelor of Arte, and I ad tanke with divers; yet heithernnto in this pointe (to witt, what the reasonable soule of man is) have I not by anye beinne resolved."

This passage is of the highest interest, as it is the first discovered allusion by Raleigh himself to his career at Oxford, as to which we have hitherto been dependent on an entry in the Oriel College registers, some loose statements by Anthony à Wood and Fuller, and a couple of anecdotes by Bacon and Aubrey. Wood tells us that "he went up to Oriel in 1568 or thereabouts, and after he had spent about three years in that House left the University without a degree." But it is not unlikely that Wood's statement is merely a deduction from the Oriel entry, where Raleigh figures as an undergraduate in 1572, though we know that he was fighting on the Continent in the autumn of 1569 and probably for some considerable period later. Sir Walter's own allusion does not help us, as far as dates are concerned, but it gives us a vivid picture of him answering the questions of some examiner in philosophy, who could stir but not satisfy his speculative interest; and it proves for the first time that through the vicissitudes of his career the memory of his Oxford days was one "to which he loved to return in his memory the days were as one "a scholler in Oxeforde," and when (according to a further statement of Wood's) "he was the ornament of the juniors and a patterne to seniors in conversation and philosophy."

Ironside, himself a distinguished member of the University, took up Sir Walter's challenge by an appeal to the authority whom then, as now, every good Oxonian held to be supreme:—

> Hearinge Sir Walter Rawleigh tell of his degree and scholarship some time in Oxforde, I cited the generall definicion of "Anima" out of Aristotle, 2nd libro "de Anima" cap. 1st., and thence deduced the specifick definicion of the soule reasonable that it was "Actus primus corporis organici animantis humani vitam habentis in potentia." It was misliked of Sir Walter as obscure and intricate. And I withall yealded that, though it could not unto him as beinge lerned, yet it must some obscure to the most prosest; and, therfore had rather say with devines plainly that the reasonable soule is a spirituall and immortall substance, breathed into man by God, whereby he lyves and moves, and understandeth, and soe is distinguished from other creatures.

Raleigh, however, again protests against this creation of the very difficulty that they are seeking to solve:—

> "Yea, but what is that spirituall and immortall substance breathed into man, &c.?" saieth Sir Walter. "Soul," quod I. "Naye then," saieth he "you answer not like a scholler! Hereuppon I endevoured to prove that it was substantiae, naye in such disputes as these, usuall and necessarye to passe in circulum. . . . As, for example, if one aske, what is a man? You will saye he is a creature reasonable and mortall: but if you aske again what is a creature reasonable and mortall? you must of force come backewarde and answer it is a man.

Raleigh, however, again demurs to his opponent's conveying, and in his argument we seem to have an echo of lessons learnt from Harriott:—

> "O but we have principles in our philosophie," sayeth Sir Walter, "as totum est maius quolibet sua parte. And aske me of it, and I can shewe it in the table, in the window, in a man, the whole being bigger then the parte of it." I replied that such demonstrations as that are against the nature of a man's soule, beinge a spirite: for as for all thinges (i.e., the illustrations chosen by Sir Walter) were subiect to the sence, soe man's soule being invisible, is to be discerned by the sperite. Nothing till more curiouse in the worlde than that there is a God, yet being a spirite to subiecte him to the sence. . . . it is impossible.

But this attempt of Ironside to justify his assertion about the soul by an appeal to the analogous nature of the Deity only drives Raleigh another step back in his scepticism. "Mayye," quod Sir Walter, "these two be like, for neither could I know heitherto what God is."

This startling avowal doubtless caused some commotion among the listeners, for at this point one of them, Mr. Fitziames, interposed in the disputation by reminding Raleigh of Aristotle's definition of God as "Ens Entium." Hereupon Ironside, perhaps nettled at the intrusion of a third person into the debate, remarked somewhat tartly:—

> That whether Aristotle, dyinge in a feaver, should crie, "Ens Entium, miserere mei," it was uncertaine; but that God was Ens Entium, a thinge of thinges, havinge beinge of himselfe and geivinge beinge to all creatures it was most certaine, and confirmed by God himselfe unto Moyses.

This appeal to Scriptural authority failed to convince Raleigh, who persisted in demanding a definition of "this Ens Entium." And when Ironside merely answered that it was "God," Sir Walter, probably growing impatient of this circular method of argument, "wished that grace might be sayd; for that," quod he, "is better than this disputacion!"

Thus ended this memorable post-prandial dialogue. The substantial accuracy of Ironside's report of it cannot be questioned, for, apart from his scrupulous limitation of his evidence to points of which he had first-hand knowledge, we have other guarantees of his good faith. Sir Ralfe Horsey, one of the Commissioners, had himself been among Sir George Trenchard's guests, and would have detected any serious error in the account of what had passed at the supper table. Moreover, another witness gives an almost identical narrative of the earlier part of the disputation, which had been repeated to him at a previous date by Ironside himself; while yet another affirms that when he had questioned the rector of Winterbourne on the subject he had answered "that the matter was not as the voice of the countrie reported thereof." It is evident, therefore, that misleading accounts of the affair had got abroad, and that Ironside was anxious to furnish the correct version.

In the testimony of other of the deponents at Cerne, with which I shall deal in the second part of this article, "the voice of the countrie" is unmistakably heard.

FREDERICK S. BOAS.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

It is the mark of genius of the first order to be universal. By its interpretation of human life genius of the first order is known. But there is genius which is incapable of this interpretation, and yet makes us feel its power. On this lower level it is temperament rather than intellect which tells. A criticism which is partial or fragmentary or prepossessed has little value, but observation, directed by an instinct which in some direction is peculiarly sensitive, cannot fail to be fruitful. Short of the highest powers, sensitiveness and rarity of temperament give the best results.

Sir Thomas Browne has not the extended and commanding view of the greatest thinkers. He could never be put on a level with Bacon or Plato, Sophocles or Shakespeare. He has attempted, to a certain degree, a criticism of life, but his criticism was both limited and immature, and it received no further development. In his first work, the "Religio Medici," which was written at the age of 30, he has given his thoughts their widest stretch. From that time he rather contracted than expanded his field of vision. The "Religio Medici" is so far universal as to give the measure of its author, but, by its very nature and origin, it was incapable of sounding the deeps of the human heart. Browne was too much steeped in fantasy and his own individual notions to be able to give a satisfactory account of human nature. He was incapable of stating the problem fairly to himself. But in the "Religio Medici" he comes nearer to the heart, and addresses himself to more elementary and widely prevailing feelings than he was ever afterwards concerned with. The scientific and antiquarian interests overlaid what was more sympathetic and natural in him, and thus, though his powers did not diminish, perhaps even increased, his effectiveness was noticeably diminished. We cannot draw from him a representation of things upon which we can rest. He is too remote, he is in touch with us at too small a part of our being, for us to be able to see with his eyes. But we can mark a distinct attitude towards the world, something which can illustrate our own view of things, if we have formed one for ourselves, or draw one from some other source. And strong and nimble as Browne's intellectual parts undoubtedly were, his attitude towards the world was not prescribed by intellect. The note of his work is a note of temperament, and not of reflection. But the fact that his attitude was distinctive, after the admission of his real intellectual power, marks him out for an author of perennial interest. Sir Thomas Browne, in virtue of his earliest work, is constrained to figure in the unaccustomed company of Rousseau and Montaigne and Amiel. The "Religio Medici" is a magnificent piece of egoism.

The tract on Urn Burial makes a delightful display of out-of-the-way learning. The student of folk-lore may revel in the "Vulgar Errors." But we weary for the deeper and more human qualities that endear to us the physician's confessions, where we can trace in every direction the co-operation of sentiment with reason, the ruddy hues of the heart showing through the colourless medium of pure intellect. We but faintly admire the mere feats of intellectual agility, the dexterous poising between the extremest scepticism and a credulity no less extreme. But it is hard to read without an ennobling emotion the well-cadenced words which describe the mystery of true affection, or that Night Piece which is as superior to Bishop Ken's more famous hymn in deep religious feeling as it is in exquisiteness of thought. It is to be regretted that we have no further "confessions." Above all it would be interesting to learn what was the change or series of changes which intervened between such sentiments as Biron's in Love's Labour Lost and the condition of a happy father and husband, distinguished among other men by the serenity and tenderness of his domestic life. There is a note of revolt against the order of nature in the "Religio Medici." Sex has no meaning to the writer, and love is a kind of disease which he resents as a slur upon humanity. We are grateful for this piece of self-revelation, but it cannot satisfy us, it is useless in itself, since its real use is to raise our curiosity to know how the man's matured intelligence could resolve this difficulty of youth.

The riddle must always remain. Henceforth we are to know him only in his study, and though we may readily admit that the mind of Sir Thomas Browne, like his whole house and garden, was "a paradise and cabinet of rarities," yet we must both deplore and wonder that his studies took for the most part so gloomy and macabre a ply. It seems little short of a miracle that he who had entertained so warm and almost extravagant a sentiment of friendship should come to write to an acquaintance of the death of a common friend in such cold and gross terms of physiology. For one with so true a sense of the beauty and poetry of life he has a strange relish of life in its nakedness and corruption. Sometimes you would say he was the farthest remove from all that is brutal, ugly, revolting, and sometimes he seems to haunt graveyards and the dissecting-room like a ghoul.

The secret of the antithesis is that he is in pursuit of an abstract, unearthly beauty, that has no point of contact with the beauty of humanity. Material beauty is at best only a memento of the idea, and mortality and corruption serve as remembrancers that we should not confound the eternal idea with its material adumbration. The idea is his mistress whom he loves with all his powers. And so he writes, with a lover's rapture:—"If any have been so happy as truly to understand Christian annihilation, ecstasis, exolution, the kiss of the spouse, gustation of God, and ingression into the divine shadow, they have already had a handsome anticipation of heaven; the glory of the world is surely over, and the earth is in ashes to them." And he can write, without feeling any inconsistency, "We are what we all abhor," "I have so abject a conceit of this common way of existence, I cannot think this to be a man;" and "For my life it is a miracle of thirty years which to relate were a piece of poetry," and again resolve, "Upon sight of beautiful persons, to bless God in his creatures."

POETS AS CRITICS OF POETRY.

> It is a dangerous invasion
> When poets criticise; their station
> Is to delight.—Shelley.

Of the many contrasts which divide the poetical literature of ancient Greece and Rome from the poetical literature of England, there is none more remarkable than the following. The great poets of classical antiquity, such as Homer, Pindar, Sophocles, Virgil, Ovid, and Lucretius, with the single exception of Horace, abstained from poetical criticism, while the great poetical critics of old, such as Aristotle, Aristarchus, Longinus, Eustathius, seem to have made no profession of the gift of song. The wisdom of this abstention from criticism on the part of the greatest singers of old may be justified by the very contrariety of the two principles which respectively dominate the methods of the poet and of the critic—the former working by synthesis, and the latter by analysis. Moreover, the history of English poetry affords abundant evidence to show that, while our most capable critics of poetry such as De Quincey, Hazlitt, Ruskin, Dean Church, Mark Pattison, Minto, and other critics have written little or no poetry, the poets who have ventured on poetical criticism, with the marked exceptions of Dryden, Addison, Coleridge, and Matthew Arnold, whatever may have been the cause, have often evinced injustice and inconsistency. What, for example, could be more inconsistent and unfair than Chaucer's critical objection to "the indelicacy" of Gower's stories, which are scarcely, if at all, more indelicate than those of his critic? Milton condemned the use of rhyme, as an instrument of verse, on the ground that "it was the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame metre," and yet the poet himself used rhyme in some of his own masterpieces, and even in his tragedy "Samson Agonistes," with singular sweetness and force. Equally at fault was his critical faculty, when he preferred his "Paradise Regained" to his "Paradise Lost," which, as Mark Pattison has well said, "looks like an old man's fondness for his youngest and weakest offspring." His critical condemnation, too, of "glorious John Dryden" as a "mere rimer and no poet" showed a singular uncritical estimate of that poet's great gifts. Pope, who was an avowed admirer and imitator of Horace, set up for a critic as well as a poet. Dryden he considered "poetarum princeps," and Congreve "poeta eximius." The critical value of his "Essay on Criticism" has been well appraised by De Quincey. "It is," writes this great critic and master of English style, "the feeblest and least interesting of Pope's writings, being substantially a mere versification of commonplaces. . . . The maxims have no order or logical dependency, and are generally so vague as to mean nothing." With this judgment Mr. Leslie Stephen concurs, and considers the Essay "as a coinage of aphorisms out of commonplace." Gray, the most finished poet and consummate scholar of his age, strangely overrated Cibber, Shenstone, and Churchill as poets, while in Homer and Milton he found "poetry which rolls on in sounding words with little meaning."

Of Wordsworth's uncritical criticism the most marked instances are (1) his attempt to show that the conversational language of the middle and lower classes is the proper diction of poetry, which gave rise to Byron's description of Wordsworth as one "who, both by precept and example, shows that prose is verse and verse is merely prose"; (2) his estimate of the "Faery Queen" of Spenser as "fading before Sylvester's translation of Du Bartas"; and (3) his statement that all Scott's poetry was not worth five shillings. Nor did Lord Byron show himself more trustworthy as a critic when he styled Cowper "a manical Calvinist and a coddled poet," and extolled the "Pleasures of Hope," by Campbell, and Rogers' "Pleasures of Memory" as the most beautiful poems in our language, if we except Pope's "Essay on Man." In Byron's eyes Chaucer was "obscene and contemptible," Spenser he deprecated, Tasso he preferred to Milton, and the old English dramatists he styled "mad and turbid mountebanks."

Dr. Johnson, Prior, and Waller were all inferior poets of the last century, and at times they proved themselves as incompetent in criticism as the greatest of our poets. Prior was utterly blind to the ineffable grandeur of Milton, whom he compared to "a rough, unhewn fellow, that a man must sweat to read him." Waller disparaged Milton's "Paradise Lost" as a tedious poem, with no merit but length, if that be considered a merit. Dr. Johnson described Milton's "Samson Agonistes" as "a tragedy which only ignorance would admire and bigotry applaud," and, what is more, he preferred avowedly Pope's "Iliad" to Homer's. In Milton's "Lycidas" this critical dictator found "no nature, no truth," but only "harshness of diction." In very truth the gems of Milton's poetry melt away in the acidity of Johnson's criticism as completely as did the pearls in the cup of Cleopatra. Nor is Mr. [illegible] less. Political and religious prejudice perverted the judgment of Johnson against the [illegible] singer of it did long afterwards the mind of the gentle Keble, who ranked Milton lower than Spenser, and denominated Milton's poetry as "stained by intellectual and spiritual pride." It may be, however, that such critical judgments of inferior poets are best accounted for on the principle laid down by Stanley that "bad poets make malevolent critics just as weak wine turns to vinegar." Of this an additional instance may be found in Home, the author of "Douglas," who "could see no merit" in the poetry of his countryman, Burns. Shelley, too, admired Lucan's "Pharsalia" as "a poem of wonderful genius and transcending Virgil," of Byron's "Cain" he observed that it contained finer poetry than has appeared in England since the publication of "Paradise Regained," and he esteemed Boccaccio as "far superior to Tasso and Ariosto."

Matthew Arnold, justly eminent as he was as a critic, seems to have lost his head not alone in the critical rules he laid down for translating Homer, but further, in the unfortunate examples he gave, as shown by Mr. Wright, Professor Newman, and Dr. Hawtrey, of Eton. Here is a curious instance of this great critic's eccentricity:—"I omit Homer's epithet of Morning 'fair-throned,' and whereas Homer says that 'the steeds waited for Morning' I prefer to attribute this expectation of 'Morning' to the master and not to the horse." This, to say the least, is not very complimentary to Homer. Of Mr. Swinburne's extravagance of critical judgment we may instance his estimate of Shelley as a poet "who," he writes, "outsang all poets on record, but some two or three. He was the perfect singing god, the master singer of our modern race and age, the poet beloved above all poets, being beyond all other poets." Was ever the highly-coloured verse of a poet so extravagantly extolled? The Life of our late Laureate, Lord Tennyson, abounds in critical judgments, which are, as a whole, certainly remarkable for justice and insight. It is none the less difficult to understand his opinion that the poetical diction of Virgil is inferior to that of Milton, especially as Tennyson himself praised the Roman singer as "the Lord of Language." Again, the poet is somewhat inconsistent with himself when he attacks Pope for the occasional recurrence of sibilants in his verse, while he perpetrates such lines as the following:—"And sleepers into stormy sobs and sighs," or "Come stooping o'er the sheeny shadows on the sand." Moreover, sibilant verses are to be found more or less in the very poets Tennyson admired as masters of metrical music, such as Homer, Virgil, Horace, Dante, Milton, and Shakespeare. Take, for instance, Virgil's sibilant line in the Æneid,

Perpetuis sedet patres cunctidere senatis,

or Horace's line,

Principibus placuisse viris, non ultima laus est, or Milton's,

The sword of Satan, with steep force to smite.

Lastly, it may be worth noting that Dante was a master of poetical criticism, as well as a poet of the first rank, holding as he did that "the best conceptions should be expressed in the best language."

T. H. L. LEARY.

PETER ALTENBERG, THE VIENNESE IMPRESSIONIST.

Of the young Austrian school of writers none have so quickly achieved a reputation as Herr Peter Altenberg. He is the author of neither play, novel, nor even of what is strictly speaking he called short story. His [illegible] on two volumes, "Wie ich es sehe," and "Ashantee" (Fischer, Berlin). Pregnant scenes, dainty prose lyrics, sometimes consisting of half a dozen lines, never exceeding two or three pages in length, they, nevertheless, possess a distinctive cachet, an illusive Wienerisch charm. Herr Altenberg is a Viennese of the Viennese. He knows how to depict in a few simple words every nuance of life, in the most decadent city in the world. He has keep called the Maeterlinck of everyday life. His art not only reveals the dress and bearing of a group of figures, but in one vivid flash one gets a glimpse into the soul beneath. His is essentially the genius of suggestion, and in a few lines he can indicate a truer picture of Viennese manners than could be gained by plodding through a whole library of the Austrian novels of Miss Gerard. Herr Altenberg never goes beyond those blue pine-girdled Austrian lakes where in summer Vienna bathes, boats, and makes holiday. "Ashantee" suggests travel in the land of fetishes and the grave of failures, but "Ashantee" is in the Vienna Zoological Gardens, and in a series of staccato dialogues the writer records his ethnological flirtations with dusky exotic beauties encamped there for a season. In none of his pages does the dramatic moment occur in which a man comes face to face with his fate. Men, women, and children stand on the threshold of life, decked out for life, like a bride for her bridegroom, waiting for something to happen, lacking the courage to bid their slumbering passions wake. There is in some of Altenberg's figures much that is symbolical of the passing away of the old Austrian type, and of the appearance of a newer and robuster race. The aspirations of modern Austria are enshrined in the following little impressionist picture:—

"Fishing must be very slow," remarked a grown-up young lady who knew as much about fishing as most young ladies.

"If it was slow I shouldn't fish," said the girl-child with golden-brown hair and long gazelle-like legs. She stood on the bank fishing with all the imperturbable gravity of the angler. She took the fish she had caught off the hook and dashed it on the ground.

The fish died.

The lake lay flashing in the sunlight. There was a fragrance of reeds and rushes, water forget-me-nots, and irises in the air. Through the open windows of the hotel came the rattle of plates and knives and forks. The little fish danced a short wild dance on the ground, such as savages dance—and died.

The child went on fishing with all the imperturbable gravity of the angler. "Je ne permettrais jamais que ma fille s'adonnât à une occupation si cruelle," said a lady who sat on a seat not far off. The child took the fish she had caught off the hook and dashed it on the ground close to the lady's feet. The fish died. It leapt, wriggling in the air, and then fell back dead. A simple enough death. It even forgot to dance; it just jumped into eternity without more ado.

"Oh dear!" exclaimed the lady, "how cruel!" And yet on the intent face of the cruel little angler with the golden-brown hair and the gazelle-like legs, lay promise of a profound beauty and a dawning soul.

The face of the aristocratic compassionate lady was faded, insipid—a wreck. She would never bring light, joy, and warmth into any one's life again; therefore she felt for the fish.

"Why should it die when it still had life in it?" she thought, as another fish turned a somersault, and then died a simple, quiet death.

The child went on fishing with all the imperturbable gravity of the angler. She made a charming picture with her great earnest eyes, her golden-brown hair and her gazelle-like legs.

Perhaps one day she too would be sorry for the fish and say "Je ne permettrais jamais que ma fille s'adonnât à une occupation si cruelle!"

But such tender emotions only spring up on the grave of dead hopes and vanished dreams. So, lovely child, fish on!

All unconsciously you are exercising your divine prerogative.

Kill the poor little fish, and fish on!

Altenberg's motto "Mon verre n'est pas grand, mais je bois dans mon verre!" is significant of his ideal of compression. But in his two slender volumes of pen pictures he has been successful in epitomizing all the grace and culture, the tears and smiles of modern Vienna.

Reviews.

A POET'S PROSE.

Essays of John Dryden. Selected and edited by W. P. Ker. Two vols. (Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d.)

Dryden is usually counted among the poets; but he, like John Milton, is hardly less remarkable for his prose. The merits of Dryden's prose seem to have been strangely neglected. Perhaps the reason is that Dryden plumes himself so little upon these essays; he hardly takes them seriously, but throws you them in with a play or a poem by way of preface. The same cause will account for their unaffected style; which, as we shall see, changed somewhat but not for the better as Dryden became self-conscious.

Professor Ker has earned the gratitude of all who love English literature by collecting and editing these scattered prefaces. His part of the work, we may say at once, is conspicuously good. The annotations explain allusions and rare words which might not be understood (we have noted only one omission, to "write booty," ii. 187); and his introductions deal with the value of Dryden's criticism, his authorities, and his style. There is also a bibliography and an index, and in some cases various readings are added from later editions which are most instructive.

Dryden's criticism has stood the test of time strangely well; and it is a proof of his sanity of view that he was superior to the fads of the day as few critics have been. There are points, of course, where he is vehement, and we remain cold; no one, for instance, will now take up the cudgels for rhyme in the drama, and no Crites is needed to attack it. But Dryden was on the right side in the controversy, and the time may come when he will be needed again. Again, the tendency in his day was to shackle poets with pedants' rules, and it needed some courage to ask "What, I beseech you, is more easy than to write a regular French play, or more difficult than to write an irregular English one, like those of Fletcher or Shakespeare?" Our fault is to neglect the time-honoured rules; we have plays filling hundreds of pages, extending over a whole lifetime, skipping from China to Peru; robust poets who disdain to prune, democratic poets who snap their fingers at form altogether: from three unities we have fled to no unities; and could Dryden rise from the grave he would approach dramatic criticism from another side. But he would find himself in the same place at last: he has a firm grasp of true principles, and demands a reasonable liberty, not licence. He had the insight to "venerate" Chaucer, although a curious passage in the "Preface to the Fables" shows that he could not scan Chaucer's verse. Shakespeare was to him "divine," yet he did not scruple to blame him for what he considered his faults. He does justice to Fletcher, and more than justice to Ben Jonson, whom he seems to have thought almost perfect within his limits. His contrast of Virgil and Homer is true, and he is not blind to mistakes in either. The criticism of Ovid is happy. "Ovid," he says, "with all his sweetness, has as little variety and sound of numbers as he (Claudian); he is always, as it were, upon the hand-gallop, and his verse runs upon carpet-ground." The insisting on the essential unity as that of action is perhaps his most valuable contribution to criticism; but all through these pages are scattered comparisons, definitions, and standards which are well worth pondering by critics. Even those essays, as that on "Satire," which are chiefly compiled from the work of others, are useful and interesting. Not least of his merits is a frankness which does not stick at criticizing himself. Thus he knows human nature well enough to see that elaborate utterance cannot go with strong feeling.

"No man is at leisure to make sentences and similes," he says truly, "when his soul is in an agony. . . . My Montezuma dies with a fine one in his mouth; but it is ambitious, and out of season."

The matter of these essays is always good, but the manner is golden. Dryden is master of the plain style which goes straight to the point, and with ease and self-confidence works just that effect he aims at. He has not, indeed, the magnificence of Milton, nor the exuberance of North; his verse could sting, but his prose has not the scorpion-whip of Nashe; the delicacy and grace of Greene is not in him. But to tell a plain tale forcibly no one can surpass Dryden. His strength lay in his use of language as a thing spoken, not written; and this is at the root of all good prose. He is not afraid of a colloquialism, if (to use his own words) it is more sounding or more significant than anything else; and an instructive example is the variation between them and 'em. The latter word, as all scholars know, is no vulgar clipping, but a genuine dialectic form in English; indeed for English descended from Chaucer's it should be the form used. Dryden's delicacy of ear is shown in choosing this form where it sounds better than the other, as may be seen from a sentence where both come together, which runs thus:—"He set out leisurely and softly with 'em, till he had warmed 'em by degrees; and then he began to mend his pace, and draw them along with his own impetuousness." After a dental them cannot be pronounced with ease; and so Dryden chooses the other. Another instance is the use of what are called "hanging prepositions"; a true idiom, as is clear not only from Shakespeare but from the cognate German separables. Thus we find Dryden at his best writing such phrases as "the end he aimed at," "which we are subject to"; but in later editions of the "Dramatic Poesy," which these examples come from, he alters these to a more artificial form, "to which we are subject," "at which he aimed." His feeling for rhythm was keen, but it shows itself rather in the absence of ugliness than in positive beauties. It is rare to find him careless, as in the "Dedication to the Spanish Friar," where the succession of trochaic endings is monotonous; it is not often he rises to such a high level as in the cadences of the first piece in these volumes, an address to Lord Radcliffe, prefixed to the "Examen Poeticum," or in the noble "Postscript" placed after the "Dedication to the Æneis." Strength and dignity with ease are the marks of his style; and in these respects no English author has ever surpassed him.

The interest of this collection of prefaces suggests that here is a neglected field for the bookmaker. Who will give us Gawin Douglas' prologues in a handy volume, or a batch of the inimitable Roger L'Estrange? There are scores of books which might not pay for reprinting as a whole, yet we cannot but think that two or three more such volumes as these before us would find a ready sale; and there is no doubt the writings of an age when even literary hackwork was good would have a good effect in this age of uninspired dulness.

THE ILIAD.

THE ILIAD. Edited, with Apparatus Criticus, &c., by WALTER LEAF, Litt.D. Vol. I., Books I.-XII. Second edition. (Macmillan, 18s.)

This is practically a new work. Not only does it contain nearly 200 pages more than the first edition, but the plan has been modified and improved, while in many matters Mr. Leaf's opinion has changed with fifteen years of study.

The most useful feature of the second edition is the Apparatus Criticus. A much fuller and clearer account is given of the MSS. mentioned in the former edition, the work of various hands being carefully distinguished, and a number of new MSS. are added. Five of them have been collected by Mr. Leaf himself. Moreover, the discoveries of papyri have been so numerous that the "three fragments," described as "of no critical importance," have now grown into sixteen, and have given evidence for some weighty conclusions. The critical notes are many times more numerous, and are now placed by themselves under the text instead of being mixed up with the commentary. Mr. Leaf has used a nice judgment in selection. Trifles such as the breathings and iota subscript are not recorded without special reason, and only one MS. of any well-defined group is quoted. The apparatus therefore becomes more manageable; it is shorter than La Roche's, yet distinctly more useful, and really contains more. The editor also makes quite clear what MSS. are not fully collated or not at all, so that [illegible] may see what work still wants doing. It is indeed strange, as Mr. Leaf says, that the textual record of Homer has been so much neglected. The text itself is somewhat more conservative than the first edition; Mr. Leaf even prints what he believes to be a worse reading where the evidence goes to show that it was the received reading in the sixth century B.C.; as example is πᾶσι instead of ἅπασι i. 4, where the first edition has ἅπᾶσι. This principle is part of the view that the poems of Homer were first collected, and a standard text made, in the sixth century, and probably by Pisistratus. Mr. Leaf now adheres to this view. Apart from tradition and evidence, such a recension is quite likely in the case of Pisistratus, whom we know to have been keenly interested in literature and art. Moreover, as he was no poet, this might account for the inartistic botching which the Iliad shows in its structure. But we do not feel confident that no attempt at unification was made by the rhapsodists before him. Even granting Mr. Leaf's as a working hypothesis, why, we ask, should not the text be brought closer to what it originally was, when this can be done with certainty? The digamma was certainly used when the earliest parts of the Iliad were composed; lines will not in fact scan without it. Then why not insert it? It is no sufficient reason to say the Attic alphabet knows no digamma; for it is not an Attic poem. Moreover, its absence in certain words which should have it will tell something as to dates at a glance. Mr. Leaf goes so far as to print ἕως when the verse requires a trochee; and this although the Old Attic alphabet wrote ἧος with the same symbols. He knows that ἕως is a blunder, yet persists in it, and defends it. In a note. One difficulty felt by Mr. Leaf we do not feel. There is no need to suppose that the earliest poet of the Iliad used one unchangeable form of the dative plural, -οισι or -οις for instance. Both must have been familiar in common speech, -οισι becoming -οις before a vowel quite naturally. Both could be used together, just as in Doric we find τῶν and τᾶς for accusative plural, or τας in two quantities, and as in the Gortyn Laws τὸν and τοῦν stand side by side. In one point of script we hope that Mr. Leaf will find many imitators. He writes the iota adscript, as the Greeks always did, not subscript.

The literary critic will naturally ask what Mr. Leaf's views are as to a personal Homer. What has been said will prepare our readers for the disclosure that he thinks the Iliad a composite thing; but he grants us a personal Homer, "perhaps the greatest in all the world's history," as the author of what he has taught us to call "The Wrath"—an "Achilleid" contained in Books I., XI., XV., XVI., XX.-XXII. This noble poem was built up on a heritage of heroic ballads, referring to the heyday of Mycenæan civilization, and composed after the old Greeks had been driven overseas by the Dorians. The Iliad as we have it contains several episodes, partly unconnected with the theme of "The Wrath," sometimes even contradicting it; but some of these episodes are of first-rate poetic merit. So far, this is a great advance on the extreme theory which would have the Iliad to be a fortuitous concourse of ballads; but it is not quite satisfying. We want the whole question treated in detail, by one who is a competent linguistic scholar, and at the same time has a nice critical taste in literature. It is not enough to say that such and such forms are later than such others, and that therefore the verse or book must be later than the archaic parts of the poem. We wish to know whether the general poetic conception, or the character drawing, or the imagery is worthy of the author of "The Wrath," or consistent with that poem; and we would have the question examined whether other parts may not be assigned to the same author, and if we dare suppose that the accidents of transmission are even responsible for modernizing the language. And lastly, we could wish to see the Odyssey brought into the discussion.

The notes of the first edition have been in some cases modified or omitted; but there are a number of additions particularly on language and folk-lore. In the linguistic notes, Mr. Leaf is more positive than of yore. Thus the assumed -a- and -e- in present subjunctive of thematic stems, which he formerly called rare, is now altogether denied. For folk-lore Mr. Leaf is now able to refer to Frazer's Pausanias, which is most instructive as illustrating Homer. There is important new matter in the appendices. Mr. Leaf now adopts with some modifications the views on Homeric armour set forth by W. Reichel, and shows that these explain the Homeric text as none other can. He is now able to use armour as a test of date; the corslet, for example, which was not needed behind a large shield, became necessary as soon as the small round shield was adopted. This corslet is made to condemn several lines suspicious for other reasons (p. 577.) We cannot, however, quite follow Mr. Leaf in his suggestion that χαλκοχίτωνες refers picturesquely to the shield, or that λοπάδηξ necessarily implies that the corslet was usually made of bronze (578). It may be that θώρηξ did not at first mean defensive armour at all. In Appendix D, Schulze's book on the lengthening of short vowels is summarized and briefly discussed.

Except for the new Greek type used in the notes, which is almost illegible, and not beautiful to look at, the volume is well printed and got up.

ECONOMISTS OLD AND NEW.

We can imagine few more useful tasks than that which Mr. Masterman has successfully accomplished in his selection from the most important passages in CHALMERS ON CHARITY (Constable, 7s. 6d.). These are taken from "more than a score of closely-printed volumes in which teaching on social questions is combined with a mass of theological and other matter." Chalmers' theories are not popular to-day. The general tendency of writers upon social subjects is to rely upon legislation, upon abstractions which they term the State or the Municipality, upon old-age pensions, and extensive schemes of municipal housebuilding. Chalmers "took nothing for granted, he made it his business to learn the truth about the poor, to understand the realities of their condition, to find out the things that belonged to their welfare." He spent practically his whole life in studying problems which we are nearly all discussing to-day. What he did was to show that where vigorous, tactful, patient work is available, legal charity becomes unnecessary. He laid great stress upon "the principle of locality, upon the immense amount of help which the poor give to the poor, upon the resources of men's own characters, when wise help and advice is obtainable."

> We know of no other expedient for the right solution of this great problem. We have no faith in a national board that undertakes for the pauperism of a whole country, or in a city board that undertakes for the pauperism of a whole township, or in a union with its arrangements, however skilful, for the pauperism of a whole cluster of parishes. But we have the greatest confidence in the perfect facility and success wherewith every deacon possessed of kindly feelings and common sense could manage aright the pauperism of fifty families. . . . We do understand how an intelligent and well principled man can, in a given locality of some few hundred people, so operate on the springs and principles of human feeling and human action as to maintain in that economical condition, which is the best possible, all the families who are within his confines.

Nobody who is interested in the great problem of poverty can fail to profit by reading Mr. Masterman's admirably arranged book.

Chalmers held that "the troubles of our social state were mainly due to a long course of misguided interference with the order of nature." Miss Leonard, on the other hand, with the true spirit of her period, suggests—THE EARLY HISTORY OF ENGLISH POOR RELIEF (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d. n.)—that the English Poor Law system is the real reason why "we are a law-abiding people and . . . have not suffered from violent revolutions." Perhaps she scarcely makes out her case, but then the hypothesis is not the fundamental principle of her book, and only an incidental reflection suggested by her researches. Her industry and carefulness are most praiseworthy, and she has produced an excellent bit of work which will reflect credit not only upon herself but upon the London School of Economics, to which she owes the suggestion. Her style is somewhat crude and lacking in light and shade, and her pages are so full of detail that the main outlines are somewhat obscured. But her book traces with great minuteness and care the history of English poor relief from 1349 to the reign of Charles I. We hope that Miss Leonard will give us further volumes which will bring the reader down to the present day.

With the doubtful exception of love, nothing is more calculated to drive men to madness—so we are told—than money. Sometimes it is the gaining or spending of money which produces this unhappy result. Occasionally it is merely meditation upon its nature. We fear that Mr. Mackenzie, the author of SOCIAL AND POLITICAL DYNAMICS (Williams and Norgate, 10s. 6d.), is one of its many victims. He has read a great many abstruse books, and has succeeded in writing a very abstruse book himself. The fact is that he is not a clear thinker, and his endeavours to find a moral and philosophical basis for political economy (a term which he scorns) has led him into a mare's nest. All modern economists, from Adam Smith onward, are, he thinks, hopelessly wrong. They have indeed no chance of success, for their very definitions are absolutely at fault. Money alone is at the basis of true economies, and all definitions must turn upon that central fact. Moreover when Mr. Mackenzie discusses money, he means silver—why, it is extremely difficult to discover from his book. His quality as a thinker may be grasped from some of the sentences in his introductory chapter.

> To say that food or animal life is the basis, or ultimate principle, from which to reason about social and political phenomena, is to place man's natural faculties under negation, or to have them wholly unaccounted for. . . . In contract we shall find no contradiction between mind and matter, for the one is the acting agent and the other is the subject acted upon. . . . The "labour of production" and consumption is not the principle to start with, but to contract labour of acquisition and distribution.

These appear to be the premises from which Mr. Mackenzie reels off his voluminous work—over 100 closely printed pages—and claims to subvert all political economy.

EROS AND PSYCHE.

THE STORY OF EROS AND PSYCHE, FROM APULEIUS, AND THE FIRST BOOK OF THE ILIAD OF HOMER. Done into English by EDWARD CARPENTER. (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.)

Since next to the delight of creating comes the less strenuous pleasure of retelling a beautiful tale, it seems a little strange that the love-story of all love-stories, which has floated in the finer air of the world from time immemorial, but which Apuleius in the second century was, as far as is known, the first to set forth in detail, should have inspired so little English literature since his day. With the Elizabethans, however, rests the honour of one fine translation—that of Adlington, while William Morris made the story the subject of one of the tales in "The Earthly Paradise," and Mr. Robert Bridges has paraphrased the old Latin prose-writer in verse. Lastly, there is Walter Pater's exquisite rendering of the episode as it "composed itself in the memory of Marius, with an expression changed in some ways from the original and on the whole graver."

It is with this last-named version that lovers of the tale will most readily compare the paraphrase (it is more strictly speaking a pretty faithful outline filled in at discretion) for which we have now to thank Mr. Edward Carpenter. This is to subject him to a severe test, yet it is due to him to say that he sustains it by no means discreditably. In one direction, indeed, he may be said to excel. If there is a flaw in Pater's tale it is to be found, perhaps, in an occasional break and pause in the movement due to the studious consideration of a Latin style which is at times overloaded. Of this we are seldom conscious in reading Mr. Carpenter's prose, and he has been successful in his endeavour to render the story more "transparent," as he expresses it. On the other hand, he has lost—or rather has not cared to keep—the antique flavour, and from all points of view is generally seen to be second, though a good second, to Walter Pater. With regard to the spirit of the fable, for instance. In the beautiful prose setting from which his narrative shines out, Mr. Pater somewhere suggests its "gentle idealism." "So that you might take it if you chose," he says, "for an allegory." The allegory that he has enshrined in the tale is most spiritual, most pure, most classic. He has gone beyond and behind Apuleius to capture the far-off, refined Greek essence, though he never loses touch with his original's generous humanity. Mr. Carpenter on the other hand, despite his Greek nomenclature, rather discounts the classic side of the allegory, compares the story of Cinderella, takes a more Teutonic standpoint—in fact, modernizes Apuleius. A short parallel passage from each version may serve to illustrate this latter point. Pater writes :—

> Psyche in those delicate, grassy places, lying sweetly on her dewy bed, rested from the agitation of her soul and arose in peace. And lo! a grove of mighty trees with a fount of water, clear as glass, in the midst; and hard by the water, a dwelling-place, built not by human hands but by some divine cunning. One recognized, even at the entering, the delightful hostelry of a god.

In place of this Mr. Carpenter has :—

> Now when Psyche came to herself, after her aerial flight, she found herself in some kind of enchanted garden. Lovely groves and thickets, streams and fountains, were on all sides; and in the midst stood a palace of fairy beauty, all carven in cedar-wood, ivory, and gold.

There is, of course, nothing very essential here, but the differences do sometimes extend to essentials, and while in manner the newer version is more didactic, more elaborate, more conscious of its audience, in matter it is not always quite so exquisitely choice. Pater's handling of the vulgarities of Venus, for instance, and of the jealous rage of Psyche's sisters is perfect; Mr. Carpenter's is not quite so unerring. But when all is said, Mr. Carpenter has given us a good and pleasant version.

We have left ourselves but little space in which to discuss his hexameters, but, speaking generally, he has attained those two qualities of swiftness and simplicity upon which Matthew Arnold based his advocacy of this measure as the most suitable for the rendering of Homer. One noticeable point is the occasional allowance of a superfluous and unaccented syllable at the opening of the line :—

> And birds of the air: but the will of Zeus was being > accomplished:

Whatever may be the merits or demerits of this licence, it sometimes causes confusion. For example, in the following line—

> And silent returned by the shore of the loud-dashing ocean—

it is only when we are halfway through it that we discover the "and" to be neither unaccented nor superfluous. When we have discovered it we do not, personally, like the scansion, nor, indeed, that of any of those lines which are based on quantitative principles. And the first six words of this line—

> The son of Zeus and Leto. For he with the King being > angered, are surely nothing more or less than the first half of an English blank-verse line, not of a hexameter constructed upon any principle whatever. The following are curious, reading, as they do, from their accentuation, like an old English epic. The first is almost alliterative, too :—

> Downward to Hades > many a dauntless > soul of the heroes.
> Which of the Gods then > was it that set them > to striving and fighting?
> May the Gods grant you—> who have their abode on > the heights of Olympus.

THEOLOGY.

A Critic of Christendom.

Our understanding of the conflict between Christ and the Pharisees is complicated by the fact that the followers of this sect who met with such stern treatment in the new teaching in the Gospels were devout and well-meaning according to their lights. The anonymous author of PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.) has taken this problem for his theme, and has treated it with so much freshness and acuteness that his little book deserves to rank with those two others, "Ecce Homo" and "Pastor Pastorum," that are equally removed with his from the beaten highway and the professional theologian, equally marked by the happy combination of reverence and originality. We might add to them two others of larger scope, though dissimilar enough, "Lex Mundi" and Professor Gardner's "Exploratio Evangelica." It is curious that all should have Latin titles; though the latest is less successful in describing the contents of the book.

The Pharisees, who are individually mentioned in the New Testament—Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, and St. Paul—are far removed from the hypocritical type of popular imagination.

> The average Pharisee to his heart's core was devout. Nor were these devout Pharisees self-satisfied in the sense of supposing that all was accomplished. Their law involved unresting effort and perpetual anxiety lest unconscious pollution should be incurred: they compassed land and sea to make one proselyte. Is such a creed likely to have produced smug self-content?

Against such men, who renounced the enjoyments of life, who never flagged in their effort to attain the ideal they believed to be divine, our Lord spoke His most scathing words of condemnation and derision, and at their hands he met His death. Had they lived nowadays, our author points out, we might be saying how good they were, excusing their narrowness by their intensity.

That is the problem. The more we realize the good points of the Pharisees, the more acute does the lesson of its solution become. The Pharisees battled hard, against fearful odds, to preserve from destruction the purest ethic and faith that the world then knew; nay, they made straight the highway of the Lord, teaching the Messianic hope in almost all civilized places. Yet they were evil. And their corruption was shown in their very name; they were "Separatists." They lacked respect for man as man, distrust of self, trust of others: they lacked "the knowledge that God's love is as far above us as above the vilest:" they lacked the sense of privacy in dealing with God, and "good taste, which is only the glorifying of God." In a word they did not understand love. And that was the only reason why they had no humility :—

> That the passion of love is needful to humility is proved to us by the fact that, except as the expression of love, meekness and humility are not virtues. Man seeks to inculcate lowliness as a separate grace, and produces a characteristic than which what we call "pride" is more noble. Our hearts know this, whether we are willing to confess it or not. To be poor in spirit towards man is to be mean in spirit, except in the service of love to man; in that service it is the divinest thing we know.

That is admirably put; and it is a fair example of the author's insight and judgment.

The next step is to apply the analysis of Pharisaism to current Christianity, and the author prepares us at the outset by showing that Christ expected the same perversion of the essentials of religion to take place among many of his followers. In Part 2 he sets forth the "divine ideal" and contrasts it with "human religion." Jesus lived on terms of cordial friendship with evil men as well as with good; contrast this, he says, with the estrangement of saints from the frivolous and vicious to-day. Jesus used outward rites as means of fellowship with the world, and claimed every province of human activity as his dominion; contrast this with the estrangement of religion from undidactic art in the drama, the novel, the song, the dance. Jesus recognizes that love of man for man is the essential preparation of the heart for love of God; against this we have the limitation of God's spirit by making rites and doctrines tests of spiritual life. In this way the author subjects modern Christianity in all its forms to seventy pages of searching but very temperate criticism, a criticism which, however much dissent it may evoke, cannot but be beneficial to those who make profession of Christianity.

In Part 3 the author deals with the subject of prayer, in a most interesting chapter, the gist of which is that a loving father must heed simple faith, but that it is only child-like prayer that is answered. But then, to be wise is to be child-like:—"The world is the lesson-book God gives man, and it is not child-like to reject it and expect reward for doing so." The next chapter condemns the "sin of assurance": it is of the essence of Pharisaism, this assurance of knowledge, and is indeed "separatist," being the cause of all schism in the body corporate and of exclusiveness in the individual. This leads up to the last chapter, which is rather inaptly called "Love's Scepticism." Doctrine is of less importance; "after age-long discussion as to what are the essentials of Christian doctrine, prayer remains the essential." Dogma is indeed needful, and its profoundest study, "as also a large conformity, as a matter of convenience"; but it is the chief office of the Church, according to "Pro Christo et Ecclesia," to echo the unconditional call of Jesus to immediate fellowship with him—the very friendship of God, the humility of love on God's side, the life of humble prayer on man's. "If to echo this call be the sole, or even chief, commission of the labourers, the fields are perhaps more ripe to harvest than we dream." These are the last words of a stimulating and prophetic book.

A Follower of Dean Burgon.

Dean Burgon spent much time and trouble in investigating the quotations from the New Testament made by the early Fathers of the Church, and embodied them in several manuscript volumes with an index, compiled from the Fathers which he used. These volumes are now in the British Museum, and are the chief source of a great mass of patristic evidence which the Rev. E. Miller has published in his TEXTUAL COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY GOSPELS (Part I.—Mt. I.-XIV. Bell, 5s.) In thus using Dean Burgon's researches Mr. Miller has been strictly carrying out the Dean's intentions, and has been animated by the desire to support that view of textual criticism which has always been associated with Dean Burgon's name. Mr. Miller's method is a simple and correct one. Desiring to prove that the weight of early evidence is in support of what he calls the "Traditional" text (which is almost, but not quite, identical with the "Textus Receptus"), he endeavours to set before us the evidence, especially the patristic evidence which bears on the point, and in his present volume he covers the first half of St. Matthew.

It would be a profitless task to go through this work, dealing as it does with a crowd of minute details, and detect small errors, but it is well to ask two questions of general interest. (1) How far does Mr. Miller carry out his method? (2) What effect do his arguments and facts have on the present position of the textual question? With regard to the first question, the most obvious criticism is that Mr. Miller has not noted by any means all the "readings" which most critics would consider to be ancient. Readings which have purely "Western" authority scarcely ever find a place in the commentary, and many scholars will be inclined to think that this is a serious mistake. The reason for this omission is due to Mr. Miller's opinion that the textual controversy is solely between the supporters of the "Traditional" text and the followers of Dr. Hort. This, with all deference to both those parties, is not the case; for to not a few of those who are most closely engaged in working at the text of the New Testament the arguments in favour of at all events a large number of "Western" readings are becoming increasingly strong. Does Mr. Miller make out a strong case in support of the "Traditional" text against that of the school of Dr. Hort? Dr. Hort maintained that the type of text which he called "Neutral" was the earliest and best, though he admitted that the "Western" type was also exceedingly old and widespread. The "Traditional" text, which he called "Syrian" (and which there is now a growing tendency to call either "Antiochene" or still better "ecclesiastical") he considered in the main a later blend of the "Neutral" and "Western," containing but few new readings. We do not think that Mr. Miller or any-one else has ever done anything to shake that part of Dr. Hort's position which deals with the "Traditional" text as such. But much modern research, including Mr. Miller's patristic evidence, weakens the arguments in support of the "Neutral" as against the "Western" text, and Mr. Miller, though he does not convince us that he is right in supporting the "Traditional," does succeed to some extent in weakening the position of the "Neutral" text.

A word of appreciation is due to the spirit of fairness which animates Mr. Miller's work. He has done his best in every case to state the facts telling against his own case as fully as those which support it.

The Synoptic Problem.

The Rev. A. Wright, Vice-President of Queens' College, Cambridge, has arranged an edition of THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE, xl. 230 pp., with the parallel passages so as to illustrate his theories on the Synoptic problem. It is an attractive and interesting work and will be very useful for reference. But the part which arouses the most immediate attention is the introduction, which is practically an essay on the development of the first three gospels. The investigation of this problem has been carried on scientifically for rather more than a century, and yet few critics will differ from Mr. Wright in thinking that it is still only in its infancy. Mr. Wright deals with all the various difficulties of the problem. The origin of the Triple tradition, the Double tradition, and the other well-known questions all reappear, and there are also several valuable notes on other points, such as the chronology of St. Luke, which stand outside the main question. It is impossible adequately to go through all the points of a book which contains so much in such a condensed form. All that can be done is to give a summary by way of example of Mr. Wright's treatment of a well-known point, and to offer a few remarks on the special theory of catechetical teaching which he still maintains. Modern writers on the Synoptic question, as a rule, agree that those passages which are common to all three gospels, or to two, of which St. Mark is one, are to be traced back to a source which is almost identical with the canonical second gospel, but differ as to the best method of accounting for those secondary features which make it necessary to qualify this assertion of identity. One of the ways suggested at an early stage was the supposition of an Ur-Marcus or original document of which the canonical gospel is a later edition. This is less popular now than it used to be, and Mr. Wright more than once seems inclined to despise it. But it is hard to see that his own theory is an improvement. He thinks that there were three editions of St. Mark, though he thinks that these were three editions of oral teaching and not three documentary editions—(1) Proto-Mark, used by Luke; (2) Deutero-Mark, used by Matthew; (3) Trito-Mark, which is the same as the canonical gospel. It is difficult to prove that there were not these three editions; but one objects instinctively to multiplication of sources to account for comparatively small points, and would prefer to believe that Matthew and Luke both used the same source, the differences being accounted for in much the same way as Mr. Woods used in his essay in "Studia Biblica."

But the most distinctive feature of Mr. Wright's theory is that, unlike almost all other critics, he does not believe that the source or sources mentioned above were documentary, but that they were the stereotyped lessons of catechists. Here it is difficult to criticize; Mr. Wright has called to his assistance a class of men whose existence at so early a date is scarcely proved, and assumes that they taught with all the rigid verbal accuracy of the Mahomedans. His strong a priori argument in favour of his theory is that it gives a sufficient degree of rigidity to the source to account for the close similarity of the gospels, while leaving sufficient elasticity to account for the differences, whereas the documentary theory fails in the latter qualification. No doubt Mr. Wright's theory will account for the facts, but an unbeliever in its general probability must be allowed to think that he exaggerates the rigidity of a documentary source. There is no reason for supposing that these early documents were from the first regarded as sacred. Therefore, parallels for the manner of his reproduction must be sought, not in the textual history of sacred or standard literary books, but in that of apocryphal writings; and in the text of these it will be found that the extreme elasticity of the scribes' methods is remarkable; introductory formulæ are altered or omitted, incidents are inserted, speeches are expanded. There is, however, no suggestion that this is due to the Influence of catechetical teaching. There is also another point which bears on this question. Mr. Wright has recognized the interest of certain "Western" readings, though he has not touched on the question of their relation to the Synoptic question. It is, however, a significant fact that the further back the text of the gospels can be traced the more "fluid" and variable it seems, and the less rigidity is apparently used in copying.

For these reasons, as well as for those which are usually employed against the oral theory, Mr. Wright's position does not seem satisfactory. But at the same time it is well that we should have some one to keep us alive to the importance of oral tradition. It must have played some part in the development of the Gospels. The question is how much? If Mr. Wright continues the advocacy of his present views he is not likely to allow us to make the error of under-estimation.

The Atonement.

The list of contributors to THE ATONEMENT IN MODERN RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: A THEOLOGICAL SYMPOSIUM (J. Clarke, 6s.) includes names which represent not only different religious communions, but different nationalities. The Christian World, in which the present series of papers originally appeared, is to be congratulated on having secured the co-operation of such distinguished theologians as Professors Harnack, Godet, and Sabatier, to say nothing of the well-known divines, English and American, who have taken part in the discussion. It would be interesting, of course, to note the points of contact between the different writers, and to endeavour to discover "the residuum of harmony" which undoubtedly underlies the different essays. So far as the theological position of the writers can be classified, it is only necessary to point out that, while one or two (such as Professor Harnack and Mr. Snell) seem to regard the Atonement as consisting chiefly in the moral appeal to man's heart made by the death of Christ, others raise the question—"the one serious question concerning the whole subject" in Professor Adeney's opinion—whether there is an objective element in the Atonement, and if so what that element is; some defend, and others apparently reject, the idea of substitution, which has hitherto played so large a part in Christian teaching on the Atonement. The discussion leads to some really useful results. Certain modes of conceiving the Atonement which have found favour in the past, certain crudities of statement, certain misconceptions of the meaning of Biblical statements, are definitely set aside. Again, several of the writers point out, what is undoubtedly the truth, that past theories of the Atonement have, generally speaking, represented the ideas and habits of thought common to a particular age. It is in view of this fact that Professor Sabatier thus describes the present tendency of modern thought:—

> The capital defect of the old theory lay in its legal character. The Christian thought of our time has, on the contrary, been constantly endeavouring to lift the doctrine of expiation from the forensic to the ethical point of view. It has sought to substitute in the processes of the work of redemption the realities of the moral life for the abstract fictions created by logic in the realm of human penal law. . . . The Christian conscience remains unsatisfied so long as it has not discovered everywhere the living action of the moral laws, until it has transformed expiation from a metaphysical or juridical drama into that moral action which alone can have any positive efficacy.

From a literary point of view Dr. Hunter's paper is the most eloquent and suggestive of the whole series. Dr. Horne, perhaps, goes beyond his fellow-writers in his optimistic view of human nature and its future—a view which qualifies his conception of the need, and necessary conditions, of an "atonement." On the other hand, his short paper abounds in passages remarkable alike for their power and beauty, and for a certain depth of spiritual insight which can scarcely be said to distinguish the other essays. Dr. Hunter is evidently profoundly anxious to bring the doctrine of the Atonement "into harmony with the truth and nature of things," and the keynote of his discussion is the acute remark that "the conception of natural law—law as a principle and method of vital action—has taken the place of juridical law into which past ages ran the idea of redemption."

Mr. Horne's able paper is marred by some defects of scholarship. It seems a pity that the Greek words occasionally mentioned in the volume should be so carelessly printed. We have also noticed one or two minor misquotations.

In the Days of Wycliff.

We have more than once had occasion to refer to the excellent history of the English Church, edited by the Dean of Winchester and Mr. Hunt, and now in process of publication. Owing to the Dean's finding it impossible to issue his own contribution this year we have for the present a gap between Mr. Hunt's history of the Church before the Norman Conquest and Mr. Capes' volume which is now before us—THE ENGLISH CHURCH IN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.)—but there is no reason to suppose that this will injuriously affect the success of the work as a whole. Mr. Capes has studied and written laboriously, like his predecessor, and the result is a solid if somewhat shapeless history of a period that has hitherto been little studied in detail.

We may premise that the title of the book is misleading, for Mr. Capes begins with the accession of Edward I., and the reign is so important that we think the author would have done well to mark the limits of his work more obviously. The first ten chapters give a somewhat discursive account of the history down to the primacy of Morton; the last seven discuss various aspects of the Church's life in detail. The later chapters are undoubtedly the more interesting. They group together much valuable information, from episcopal registers and visitations, as well as from chronicles, as to the monks and friars, bishops and cathedrals, schools and universities, pilgrimages, and the social influence of the Church. Mr. Capes does not sufficiently distinguish the centuries. We have, in these general sketches, descriptions derived from facts of the thirteenth century on the same page with others that belong to the fifteenth. This is likely to encourage the idea that the medieval Church had so distinctive eras of progress and decay, which is far from being the case. What is true of the reign of Henry VII. is by no means necessarily true of the reign of Edward II. The earlier chapters, again, suffer from being hardly sufficiently chronological. It is sometimes difficult to discover from Mr. Capes what was happening at a particular date. The detailed history of the fifteenth century, too, is somewhat scantily represented.

The figure which forms the centre of the book is undoubtedly that of John Wyclif, and of him Mr. Capes' study is interesting and fairly detailed. It needs supplementing, however, by Dr. Rashdall's valuable article in the "Dictionary of National Biography." Mr. Capes has studied Wyclif's works, but in his summary of their teaching he omits some important points (as, for instance, the fact that in the "De Eucharistia" he declares that a pious layman could consecrate the Eucharist, and in the "De Quatnor Sectis Novellis" adds that a priest can give confirmation and transmit orders). His account of Oldcastle is full and accurate. He attaches just the right amount of importance to the writings of Pecock and Gascoigne. Throughout, indeed, he is a safe guide. We could wish that he had treated the question of Papal jurisdiction and Roman Canon Law in more detail, in view of Dr. Maitland's notable book. We naturally look for a judgment between the Cambridge Professor and the Bishop of Oxford; but Mr. Capes does not assist us. We are inclined to think that this is due to the fact that our author has not studied the legal side of his subject, or the evidence of cathedral records (some printed by the Historical MSS. Commission, some still in MS.) in detail. None the less he has covered a wide ground with judgment and knowledge, and has made few, if any, mistakes, and the only noteworthy misprint is the repeated error in the spelling of the name of the author of "The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages."

FICTION.

Miss Wharton's New Book.

It is not often that a novel is published by Mr. John Murray; but in A Gift from the Grave (2s. 6d. n.), by Miss Edith Wharton, he has issued a work of great interest. The book is a purely introspective study. A man of delicate fibre commits a coarse act. He publishes the letters—practically the love-letters—of a woman who wrote them in utter confidence. They contain no betrayal of vulgar, compromising fact, for he has never loved the woman. It was an intellectual friendship, with boundless sympathy on the one side; on the other, the man's side, although "to be loved by her had been a state to touch any man's imagination, the physical reluctance had, inexplicably, so overborne the intellectual attraction" that he felt for her little more than a cold appreciation of her genius. The woman was famous, and her poor letters would bring him wealth. She was dead, and they would bring her no sorrow. All that the man had left out of his reckoning was himself. The thing once done, he lives in torture. He opens the printed volume.

> A familiar letter sprang out at him, each word quickened by its glaring garb of type. The little broken phrases fled across the page like wounded animals in the open. . . . It was a horrible sight. . . . A battue of helpless things driven savagely out of shelter. He had not known it would be like this.

The remorse of the man is allowed at the end to have expiated his sacrilege. After his suffering, he is absolutely incapable of such another act as that which caused it. The "Gift from the Grave" is the gift to him of a higher self, never fully his own before. The idea is not new. In fact, it is the "stepping-stone" of "In Memoriam" and something older than that. But the working-out is delicate and faithful to a degree. On the purely literary side, Miss Wharton is satisfying. She has a rare feeling for the right word. Her phrases are her own, with needlessly little of the "preciousness" that goes with such originality. Occasionally we have a strained expression, such as "She . . . began to speak, with a new suffusing diffidence that made him turn a roused eye on her." More often the sentences charm by their effect of being unchangeable. Exquisite is the best word for the book, though nobody in search of "a good story" had better open it. Nothing happens—outside the spirits of three most subtly analysed human beings. But we congratulate Miss Wharton.

A Good War Book.

The war has suggested—it would be misleading to say inspired—a good many novels and a good many volumes of short stories; but The Influence of Mars, by Eva Anstruther (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), is the first book of the kind that we have seen that possesses literary value as well as topical interest. There are no lurid battlescenes. Mrs. Anstruther has "tried to tell of certain common people here at home on whom, when War the Purifier came among us, his deepest shadow fell"; and she has achieved her task with the sure hand of the literary artist, with sympathy, and with a restraint that is very effective. The sentiment is never false, and the pathos always rings true. Slight as the book is, we class it with the best books of the year; and it certainly is far and away better than any recent book with which it can reasonably be compared. Helped by its theme it may do something to persuade book buyers that short stories as well as novels are worth spending money on, and even to persuade the editors of some popular magazines that mechanical short stories of impossible adventure are not the highest manifestations of the art.

A Cornish Village.

There is something peculiarly elusive about the Cornish character which seems to enable it to defy complete portraiture. Mr. Eden Philpotts and Mr. Charles Lee have been amongst the most successful; in a lower grade Mr. Silas Hocking and Mr. Joseph Hocking have reported to the English reader something of the life of the Cornish. We have Mr. Quiller-Couch, too, industriously observing, not without a quiet eye's deserved harvest, the little humours and tragedies of Troy Town. Yet it is little he knows of the West Cornish, the Cornish who live and delve in the tin-mines, and amongst whom the rich vernacular most bountifully survives. In Mr. Harris' tales of the life of a fishing village, Our Cove (Simpkin, Marshall, 2s.), we have another attempt to catch the baffling atmosphere of superstition, suspicion, hospitality, hardihood, gossip, and invincible hopefulness that surrounds the fishermen of Cornwall. In large measure he has succeeded. "Our New Doctor" is a true enough picture of the suspicion cherished by the Cornish of a new inhabitant, whether he be a doctor or aught else. "The Life Savers," too, is a fine piece of descriptive writing. There is much truth in the introduction of the little Breton onion boy, one of the common objects of a Cornish landscape. As a story one is disposed to rank "Hard-to-be-Found" first amongst those the book contains, but as it is concerned with smuggling it can hardly be regarded as portraying contemporary Cornish life. We have derived much pleasure also from "Companions of the Ship." Mr. Harris, in our judgment, over-rates the superstition of the Cornish, a frequent fault with the artist in search of the picturesque. Superstitious as he is, the Cornish fisherman does not habitually turn back from his fishing if he meets a woman on the way to his boat. And the "wise woman" does not loom so largely as Mr. Harris would have us believe in the life of the people. The dialect for the most part shows intimate acquaintance with the broad western speech; but "sproil" we do not know. Not to have any "sprawl," meaning energy, or "vim," as the Americans call it, is a frequent enough expression in Cornwall.

Mr. P. B. Neuman's novel, The Uttermost Farthing (Blackwood, 6s.), is a very clever piece of work. The story, though trivial and unimportant, is well put together and well told, though the probabilities are not very carefully respected. It is not very credible that an uneducated young woman of two-and-twenty, the daughter of a clerk, would, by giving music lessons and acting as cashier in a drapery establishment, earn a sufficient income to send her brother to St. Paul's School and to Cambridge. It is still less credible that the boy, being a lad of spirit, would allow her to make the sacrifice, instead of seeking some appointment with a salary attached to it. But we freely forgive the improbabilities of the story in consideration of the writer's skill in unfolding it. It is a study of the lower middle classes, not quite comparable with Mr. Gissing's similar studies, but still very good.

The Autobiography of a Charwoman, as chronicled by Annie Wakeman (Macqueen, 6s.), is the best thing of its kind we have read. Betty Dobbs, charwoman and human woman, is a living creature whom one might meet in any London street, with her faded shawl and her basket. But the average specimen will hardly be found so charming as Miss Wakeman's protégée, real or imaginary. Betty's love affairs, in her comely youth, are excellent reading. Her really high principle, combined with her decidedly lax ideas as to "marriage-lines" and like formalities, make her a whimsical but quite convincing character. We agree with the Anglican father who befriends her. "'Oh!' 'e says, 'I am not afraid, I'll trust you. As fur religion, there's many kinds. You 'ave 'ad a time o' trials, but you've never neglected your offspring. That is mother love, and love is religion.'" As for Betty's chronicler, her work is excellent. Like Gordon and his Chinaman, she has tried to get "into the skin" of her subject, and succeeded, beyond a doubt.

Agatha Webb, by A. K. Green (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is a criminal tale of the ancient kind. Most mischiefs (and there are many) are traceable to a sinister young woman with extraordinary attractions. The dénouement is far-fetched to a ludicrous degree. One incident (the placing of the dynamite bomb) is apparently forgotten by the author. It leads to nothing. "The Leavenworth Case," in its own way, was far better than this.

Miss Katherine Douglas King is a young lady who puts so much vigour and animation into her work that her successive novels come always as a pleasure and a surprise. In Ursula (Lane, 6s.) she surprises by her mise-en-scène, for she gives us a story of Russian life with which she seems every bit as familiar as she is with the life of the East-end and with the travelling circuses of her native land. So skilfully does she weave her spells, and so vivid is her character-drawing, that only after the book is finished do you realize that it is nothing but a sensation story constructed on somewhat familiar lines, and probably evolved entirely out of the author's head. And if, on the whole, we prefer Miss King's earlier studies of child-life, such as she gave us in that delightful volume "The Child who Never Grew Old," this is not to deny that "Ursula" is an excellent tale.

Daniel Herrick, by S. H. Burchell (Gay and Bird, 6s.), is that rarity, a light and readable historical novel. The period is the reign of Charles the Second. The Plague comes in incidentally and assists the plot at critical moments. The style is pleasant, like that of Mr. Burchell's earlier historical stories. He is wise to keep to this kind of novel, for few writers of the second rank succeed in being anything but tedious when they treat of "periods" and personages.

Correspondence.

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your remarks on Samuel Richardson in Literature the other day encourage me to draw attention to the want of a complete modern edition of "Clarissa Harlowe." The edition of Richardson's works in twelve volumes, edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen and published in 1883, has been out of print some years, and I believe there are only two editions at present obtainable, one of them a paper-backed sixpenny edition, and both of them greatly abridged. In spite of the length of the work it seems strange indeed that the large number of reprints of the older English novelists which have found their way on to the book market in the last eighteen months should not include the masterpiece of the father of them all. The time, the style, and the length of the novel might preclude its selling in numbers equal to "Tom Jones" or "Pride and Prejudice," but surely there are numbers of book-buyers and students who would be only too glad to have an opportunity of placing a becomingly dressed and well-printed set of the works of the first great English novelist upon their shelves.

Yours, &c.,

Southport, 28th July, 1900. A. H. CARSTANG.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The publishers, we understand, regard the resolution passed by the Council of the Associated Booksellers, requesting them to publish more books under the net system, as a very encouraging result of the step taken by them last year. It is a proof, in their opinion, that the booksellers are beginning to have more confidence in themselves; and that, after all, was the main object which the publishers had in view when they inaugurated the new scheme. A breach of the conditions of the scheme does not involve the closing of the bookseller's account, but the offender has to pay full price for all net books issued by the signatory publishers. Several of the firms which held aloof at first have now signed the agreement—publishers and booksellers alike—and there seems little doubt that the system has become thoroughly consolidated.

In the old days a book was published, say, at twelve shillings; to-day it appears at ten shillings net; the advantage being that the bookseller nowadays knows that his rival round the corner will not undersell him at a price which makes a living profit out of the question. The booksellers have asked the publishers "to take into consideration the advisability of making all scientific, technical, medical, and books of the same description, net"—a matter which will, of course, be left for each individual firm to consider. The publishers are already increasing the number of net books rapidly, and in the autumn they will doubtless be more noticeable than ever. But the time will probably never come when all books will appear in this way.

The Life of Lord Tennyson, Dr. Horton's contribution to Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co.'s "Saintly Lives" Series, will be published in the autumn. It will be illustrated by portraits of the houses and places in which he lived.

Dickens easily holds his own in the lists which have already been announced for the autumn season. We have already referred to Messrs. Chapman and Hall's edition. "Bleak House," with illustrations by Beatrice Alcock, will probably be the next two volumes in Messrs. Methuen's edition with an introduction by Mr. George Gissing, and will be followed by "Oliver Twist" in one volume, with illustrations by Mr. E. H. New. Messrs. Putnam are also entering the lists with new editions of "Cricket on the Hearth" and "A Christmas Carol." The two volumes will be ready in October, and will be similar in general style to the dainty editions of "Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" published by the Putnams last year. Their illustrations will include 24 full-page photogravures.

Captain Joshua Slocum's narrative, "Sailing Alone Around the World," which recently ran through six months of the Century Magazine, is to be published in volume form by Messrs. Sampson Low. Reckless navigators are periodically heard of crossing the Atlantic in cockleshell boats, but few would venture to sail round the world in such a craft as that to which Captain Slocum trusted. He prepared his boat at New Bedford by repairing and improving an abandoned sloop, which is supposed to have served as an oysterman something like a hundred years ago. He started alone on his long voyage on April 24, 1895, and came back safe and sound to Boston, U.S.A., on July 3rd, 1898, after crossing the Atlantic twice and touching, among other countries and continents, at Samoa, Australia, and the Cape. While in South Africa he visited Mr. Kruger, who was greatly incensed, apparently, when his friend Judge Beyers remarked that Captain Slocum was sailing round the world. "Not round the world," Mr. Kruger exclaimed, "that is impossible; you mean in the world"; for the ex-President would have it that the world was flat.

The next volumes of Messrs. Methuen's edition of Shakespeare, under the general editorship of Professor Dowden, will be "Romeo and Juliet," edited by Professor Dowden himself, and "King Lear," edited by Mr. W. J. Craig.

"Atlantis: the Book of the Angels" will shortly be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein. The author, Mr. D. B. Metchin, deals with the antediluvian world, giving the Island as the scene of the development of mankind up to the Flood and showing why it was destroyed. It suggests, under the form of an historical romance, the nuclei of the later development of human affairs, and a clue to many of the myths of the ancients. The narrative is backed by very old and curious treatises, by Biblical and Apocryphal writings, and the most ancient customs and legends.

Three volumes are announced by Messrs. Sonnenschein for their Social Science Series—"Commercial Colonial Policy," by John Davidson, of the New Brunswick University; "Workmen's Compensation for Injuries," by Professor James Mavor; and "Money, and its Relation to Prices," by L. L. Price (a new impression).

Messrs. Sonnenschein also announce, among numerous other books for the autumn, a translation of Beowulf into English prose by Dr. Clark Hall, a translation of Schopenhauer's "Essay on Morality" by Arthur Brodrick Bullock, M.A., a volume on "Commerce and Christianity" by G. F. Millin, and a translation of Clara Tschudi's Life of the Empress Augusta by Miss E. M. Cope, uniform with the same author's "Marie Antoinette," "Eugénie, Empress of the French," and "Napoleon's Mother," three of the most successful of recent biographies.

An autumn book which is sure to arouse a certain amount of curiosity is "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," to be published by Mr. Murray. It is obviously necessary, as the publisher states, that the letters should be anonymous; Mr. Murray himself does not know by whom they were written; but he believes that their special characteristics will be considered to justify their publication.

A volume entitled "North Americans of Yesterday," and a comparative study of North American Indian life, "on the theory of the Ethnic Unity of the Race," will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Putnam. The author, Mr. Frederick S. Dellenbaugh, accompanied the second expedition under Major Powell, which explored the Canyons of Colorado and the south-west. Volume III. of Professor Blok's "History of the Netherlands," translated by Ruth Putnam, will also be ready in the autumn, as well as the second volume of the official "History of the Parish of Trinity Church in the City of New York," dealing with the period between 1783 and 1816.

In the autumn the same firm will publish an authorized translation, by Frances E. Skinner, of "The Forest Schoolmaster," by Peter Rosegger. This is believed to be the first English version of the Austrian novelist's work. It is a strange story of an isolated forest community, civilized and regenerated by the life of one man.

Professor Granger has avoided the conventional method of psychology in his forthcoming work on "The Soul of a Christian," which Messrs. Methuen are to publish. We are told that instead of taking the individual alone the author regards him as showing in and contributing to the Catholic tradition. The book thus deals not only with the average religious life, but also with the less familiar experiences of the mystic, the visionary, and the symbolist.

R. L. Stevenson's books have still a vogue in France. The latest of his travel books to be translated into French is that dealing with his canoe trips on the Sambre and the Oise. This translation by M. Lucien Lemaire, with a frontispiece by Walter Crane, has just been published at Fr.5 by Lechevalier.

EDUCATIONAL.—The most important item among Messrs. Methuen's educational announcements is a new edition of "The Captivi of Plautus," with an introduction, textual notes, and a commentary. The editor is W. M. Lindsay, Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, who has re-collated all the important MSS. An appendix deals with the accentual element in early Latin verse. "A South African Arithmetic," by Henry Hill, B.A., Assistant Master at Worcester School, Cape Colony, which has been specially written for use in South African schools, is again included in the list, while a German Commercial Reader, by S. Bally, M.A., is to be added to Methuen's commercial series.

Mr. Murray announces a "Commercial French Course," in two parts, by W. Mansfield Poole, M.A., Assistant-Master at Merchant Taylors' School, and Michel Becker, Professor at the Ecole Alsacienne, Paris. Part I. is in active preparation, and consists of simple passages in French, examples of business letters, and a system of French grammar, with special reference to the verb. Part II. will comprise an advanced commercial reader. Mr. Murray also has in hand a "Technical School French Grammar," by Dr. W. Krisch, Examiner in Modern Languages to the Midland Counties' Union of Educational Institutions.

"The Romance of the Earth," by Professor Bickerton, of Canterbury College, New Zealand, to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein, is a popular account of the geological agencies at work in the formation of the earth and also of the evolution of animals.

In the autumn Mr. Gilbert Parker's new novel, the first that he has written since 1897, entitled "The Lane that has no Turning," will be published. The scene is laid in Quebec.

Messrs. Methuen are about to publish a new volume of stories by Mr. Richard Marsh, entitled "The Seen and the Unseen."

Captain Julien Viaud (Pierre Loti) was chosen by Admiral Pottier as his first aide-de-camp, and is now on board the Redoutable, en route for China.

The annual conference of the Institute of Journalists, which begins on September 8, is this year to be held in London. There is nothing in the programme so interesting as the visit of M. Zola, which was the clou of the conference of 1893. But there are to be sermons by Canon Scott Holland, Cardinal Vaughan, and Dr. Parker, a garden party at the riverside residence of Sir John Whittaker Ellis, and excursions to Reading, Windsor, and Woolwich Arsenal. Among the papers to be read is one by Mr. E. T. Reed on some subject connected with pictorial humour, illustrated by lime-light effects.

To-day is the fifty-ninth anniversary of the birthday of Mr. Robert Buchanan, who begins to be one of our veteran men of letters. Veteran is the word, for Mr. Buchanan has always been a fighter in the literary life. Perhaps the best birthday service that one can do him to-day is to remind the younger generation of the poetry he wrote in his earlier years. It is now nearly forty years since he published his first volume of poetry, called "Undertones," a pretty title, not at all prophetical of the somewhat militant and assertive manner that was in after years to mark the poet. It was followed in a year with a volume of "Idylls and Legends of Inverburn," and a few years later the poet may be said to have come to his own with his volume of "London Poems" in 1866. He was already sufficiently a literary personage to attract the genial banter of Mr. Matthew Arnold, whose references to the "ingenious young Scotch poet" are well known. A collected edition of his poems, in three volumes, was published in 1874; and another collected edition, in one volume, in 1885.

Mr. Buchanan has not unnaturally suffered in public estimation on account of his anonymous attack on Rossetti in an article in the Contemporary Review, of October, 1871, purporting to be written by a Mr. Thomas Maitland, and entitled "The Fleshly School of Poetry." The matter has been so fully discussed in the mass of literature that has gathered about Rossetti that we will not do more than refer to it. But it is only fair to recall the graceful way in which Mr. Buchanan made peace the year before Rossetti's death in the "Dedication to an old Enemy" of his novel "God and the Man."

> I would have snatched a bay leaf from thy brow,
> Wronging the chaplet on an honoured head;
> In peace and tenderness I bring thee now
> A lily flower instead.
> Pure as thy purpose, blameless as thy song,
> Sweet as thy spirit, may this offering be;
> Forget the bitter blame that did thee wrong,
> And take this gift from me.

After Rossetti's death Mr. Buchanan wrote that though Rossetti's name did not appear in the dedication, as it would certainly have done had he possessed more moral courage, it was a melancholy pleasure to himself to reflect that Rossetti had understood the dedication and accepted it in the spirit in which it was offered.

We congratulate Miss Jane Harrison on her appointment to a fellowship of Newnham College, and we also congratulate Newnham. The value and importance of Miss Harrison's contributions to archæology are undisputed; and we have no doubt that she will render further services to that science now that her researches are, in a sense, endowed.

The Students' Congress in honour of the Paris Exhibition comprised fifty delegations, and as they walked in procession to the Sorbonne their various costumes looked most picturesque. First came the Parisians, most of them wearing their black velvet Tam o' Shanter, with its tri-coloured cord, and carrying banners. The Belgian representatives of the various colleges followed, then the delegates from Bohemia, from England (Oxford, Cambridge and Edinburgh being well represented), and from Spain, Greece, Italy, Holland, Sweden, America, Switzerland, Hungary (the Hungarian delegates magnificently arrayed in velvet knee-breeches and embroidered cloaks), Finland, Russia, Australia, and Egypt. The representatives of the various French Universities wore a sash with the arms or colours of their towns or cities. In the evening Madame Sarah Bernhardt gave a free performance of L'Aiglon, in honour of the students, and was presented with a bouquet. On leaving the theatre her carriage was accompanied by the procession, most of the students carrying Chinese lanterns.

The copyright in Balzac's works expires to-day. It is a good illustration of the contention which has lately been emphasized by Mr. Lang and other prominent men of letters that in the case of men of genius their work is likely to be at the zenith of its reputation when their property in it comes to an end. Never, perhaps, since he first made a name at all has Balzac's fame stood higher than it does to-day. As M. Bourget writes in this month's number of Munsey's Magazine, both the schools between which French fiction has oscillated through the century acknowledge Balzac. From one point of view there is no more characteristic fruit of French romanticism than Balzac; yet it is from Balzac that all the greater French "realists" have sprung. His faults are not less conspicuous than they were to earlier critics; but at the distance we have since travelled we get a truer measure of the bulk of the man compared with his former, if often more faultless, contemporaries. The Société des Gens de Lettres a little while ago threatened to boycott the theatres which should refuse to pay the theatrical dues on Balzac's works after the expiration of the copyright. Has any analogous step been taken with regard to the purely literary work, which one would suppose to be of greater moment? At any rate the firm of Calmann Lévy, the owners of the copyright, are preparing for the crisis by issuing a new edition.

The autumn season at the theatres begins next week when one of two Nell Gwyn plays will see the light. This will be the adaptation of Mr. Anthony Hope's Simon Dale, made by himself and Mr. Edward Rose who was so successful in dramatizing The Prisoner of Zenda. When Mr. Hope made a play out of Rupert of Hentzau by himself unaided, he came near failing altogether. The piece will be called English Nell. Why it should so be called, it would be difficult to say. Nell Gwyn was never known as "English Nell" any more than she was known as Sweet Nell of Old Drury, which is the title of the play on the same subject that Miss Julia Neilson produces at the Haymarket about the end of the month. Plays must be named and the task of finding names is hard. But it seems a pity to give misleading titles to dramas centred round historical characters.

Mr. Alexander starts at the St. James's Theatre on September 1 with A Debt of Honour, an enlargement by Mr. Grundy of his one-act piece In Honour Bound. Nothing is said about the probable date of the production of Paolo and Francesca. Mr. Tree, however, seems more in earnest about Herod the King, the other play by Mr. Stephen Phillips which is awaiting performance. November is spoken of as the likely month for this interesting experiment. The fact is Mr. Tree has a part after his own heart, while Mr. Alexander would scarcely be a success as Paolo. But the elder brother would offer Mr. Alexander fine chances and suit his style well. Even then, however, there is a difficulty about the Francesca.

Mr. Justice Day's questions "Who is Sherlock Holmes?" and "Who is Conan Doyle?" are the more interesting from the fact that her Majesty's Judges are generally reputed to be great readers of contemporary fiction. The anecdotes show them seeking information from learned counsel about skirt dancers and racehorses, more often than about the luminaries of the literary hemisphere. At all events the ignorance of Mr. Justice Day is in pointed contrast with the up-to-date knowledge shown by the Lord Chief Justice, whose death we have to deplore, in a case in which Mr. G. R. Sims was called as a witness. "You are, I believe, 'Dagonet,' of the Referee?" was the question with which Lord Russell of Killowen set that distinguished man of letters at his ease.

* * * *

In another column we are reviewing Mr. Henley's patriotic poems. In the current Nineteenth Century there is an admirable survey of the patriotic poetry of the Victorian Era by Mr. J. A. R. Marriott. It began, as we are a little apt to forget, with Tennyson, as a protest against Cobdenism. A Cobdenite suggestion that Canada might just as well be independent roused Tennyson to vehement indignation:—

> And that true North, whereof we lately heard
> A strain to shame us, keep you to yourselves:
> So loyal is too costly! friends, your love
> Is but a burthen: loose the bond, and go.'
> Is this the tone of empire? here the faith
> That made us rulers? this, indeed, her voice
> And meaning, whom the roar of Hougoumont
> Left mightest of all peoples under heaven?
> What shock hath fooled her since, that she should speak
> So feebly? Wealthier—wealthier—hour by hour!
> The voice of Britain, or a sinking land,
> Some third-rate isle half-lost among her seas?

This is the "Imperial note," but, as Mr. Marriott points out, it is not quite the same Imperial note that is sounded by Mr. Kipling. Lord Tennyson's Imperialism is instinctive; Mr. Kipling's is reflective. The main idea in Tennyson is that "it is a magnificent thing to be an Englishman"; he dwells upon "the glory and the glitter, the sparkle and the splendour, the pomp and pride of empire." Mr. Kipling realizes these things, but also realizes the responsibilities of Empire, and "the idea of the possibilities it opens for service to mankind." The poems which occur to every one in illustration of this statement are "The Recessional" and "The White Man's Burden." But the same thought is present in earlier poems, as in the lines:—

> Fair is our lot, and goodly is our heritage,
> Humble ye, my people, and be fearful in your mirth,
> For the Lord our God most high,
> He hath made the deep as dry,
> He hath smote for us a pathway to the ends of all the earth.
> . . . . . .
> Yea, though we sinned, and our rulers went from righteousness,
> Deep in all dishonour though we stained our garment's hem,
> Oh, be ye not dismayed, though we stumbled and we strayed,
> We were led by evil counsellors, the Lord shall deal with them.
> * * * *

Kipling was not the first to write a fine hymn before action. Among the many patriotic passages scattered up and down Shakespeare's historical plays there is Henry V.'s prayer before battle, which is quoted in Mr. J. L. Etty's study of that play in the current Macmillan:—

> Oh! God of battles steel my soldiers' hearts;
> Possess them not with fear;
> Take from them now
> The sense of reckoning, if the opposing numbers
> Pluck their hearts from them.

The main purpose of Mr. Etty's article, however, is not to illustrate patriotic poetry, but to vindicate Shakespeare's characterization. Shakespeare's conception of Henry V.'s character has been questioned as unhistorical, and for this reason.

> It is possible to prove from State documents that Prince Henry was in command of the forces on the Welsh border at the time when, according to Shakespeare, he must have been living a life of riotous extravagance in London, and that he was a valued member of the Council at the time when he is accused of striking Judge Gascoigne in Court.

Seeing that Shakespeare was writing a drama and not a history these little inconsistencies do not matter. It may nevertheless be true, in spite of them, that Henry V. lived riotously in his youth, but reformed himself when responsibilities impressed him; and Mr. Etty maintains that Shakespeare often foreshadows the future King Henry V. in his treatment of the young Prince Hal. He builds up his case with quotations from Henry IV., and concludes thus:—

> There is at least no inconsistency between the Prince, whose excessive vitality in youth must find its vent in extravagant pleasures, and the King, whose superabundant energy hurries him into an unequal war with France, unscientifically carried out to a most successful issue, nor between the enthusiasm for experience in youth and the idealistic detachment of satisfied manhood. The ascetic, somewhat narrow-minded King Henry the Fifth of the picture in the National Portrait Gallery is the same man as the glorious young Prince in golden armour in the hall of Queen's College, Oxford, the Prince of whom the rebel Vernon cries :—

> I saw young Harry, with his beaver on,
> His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
> Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury,
> And vaulted with such ease into his seat,
> As if an angel dropp'd down from the clouds,
> To turn and wind a fiery Pegasus
> And witch the world with noble horsemanship.

An interesting American explanation of literary "booms" is cited and analysed in the Daily Graphic. "Diffused hypnotic suggestion" is the formula by means of which the philosopher over the water endeavours to account for the way in which the public rush with one accord to buy a particular novel when the stern eye of the critic is unable to see any particular points about that novel different from any other novel. The explanation, however, really explains nothing, but merely raises the further question, Who does the hypnotizing? A hypnotist who could specialize in this direction and show tangible results would be able to command far higher fees than do the hypnotists who merely suggest to drunkards that they should give up drinking and to idle boys that they should try to learn their lessons. The theory, in fact, is pretty much on a level with the fashionable theory derided by Mr. Percy White in "The West End" that it is the faithhealers who make the leaders of smart society look younger than they are.

* * * *

More interesting, however, than the "booms" which occur unaccountably are the booms which are obviously engineered by "boomsters"; and the most interesting feature of these is the manner in which the "boom" is often helped along by considerations which have nothing whatever to do with the literary merit of the book. Not every author has the straightforward candour of the popular novelist who sent for an interviewer, showed him a manuscript, or a bundle of proof-sheets, and frankly announced, "This is a colossal work." More often the author, or some one acting on his behalf, endeavours to awaken an interest in his compositions by means of purely irrelevant personal or biographical details. "Yes, your hair will do," was the answer of an American impressario to an English poet, who had asked him to arrange for him to deliver a course of literary lectures in the United States. And now we find an American publisher issuing a "puff preliminary" of a new novelist in which he claims a hearing for his client on the ground that he decided to "try his hand" at writing "after a year's experience as corresponding secretary of a sash and door manufacturing concern." One has only to imagine the process inverted and a tradesman puffing his wares with the announcement that, after a year's experience as novelist, he had resolved to try his hand at making doors, in order to realize the cynical contempt of the boomster for the reading public.

* * * *

It would be over sanguine, however, to imagine that we have yet heard the dernier cri of the advertising author. One of these days we shall wake up to read the announcement that Mr. So-and-So will write the last chapter of his great novel in a shop window in Regent-street. And, when this is done, the public will never suspect that the man who does it is a charlatan. They will, on the contrary, be filled with admiration for the nobility of character of the man who admits them to his literary workshop and does not charge gate-money.

Apropos of the strange titles of books, of which some examples appeared in Literature last week, a correspondent sends the following:—

> Blason des danses où se voyent les malheurs et ruines venant des danses, dont jamais homme ne revient plus sage ni femme plus pudique.

The author of the work thus quaintly designated was Guillaume Paradin, Dean of Beaujeu, and author of a "Chronique de Savoye," which contains the earliest known description of the Savoy glaciers.

Disagreable Heroines.

The Daily News gives publicity to the complaint of a novel-reading correspondent that the heroines of fiction are deteriorating. They are, we are assured, at once less beautiful, less lovable, and less lady-like than they used to be. It is a sweeping generalization; and we fancy it could only be supported from the works of lady novelists. In English fiction, at all events, we know plenty of male novelists who persist in making their heroines charming, sometimes in new ways, but often in old-fashioned ways. Sir Walter Besant's heroines, for example, are always charming—so charming, indeed, that the world has continued to welcome them for twenty or thirty years without murmuring because they are all exactly alike. Mr. Hardy's "Tess" was also charming—much more charming, in fact, than any real dairymaid would probably be found to be. And who shall say that Dolly (of the Dialogues) or Phyllis (of Philistia) were not charming? Indeed, it is the general custom of the masculine novelist to make good women charming because he likes them better so, and to make frail women fair because their fairness helps to make their frailty explicable. Where he does not do so, the fault is more often in execution than in intention. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the modern lady novelist has acquired rather a habit of drawing heroines who are either ugly, or disagreeable, or both; and it would be interesting to discover why. It would be ungallant to seek the explanation in the fact, if it be a fact, that they know their own sex so much better than men know it, and wish to show us what realism really is. The phenomenon is more probably of the nature of a reaction, or rather of a revolt. Clever women resented the idealisation of the insipid woman alike by Thackeray and by Miss Austen. They took to novel-writing in the true missionary spirit, and deliberately gave the beau rôle to women of a different and, as they deemed, a higher type. If they made their heroines physically ugly, it was for the purpose of concentrating the attention of the reader on their moral and intellectual beauties. If they made them disagreeable it was because they wanted combative and aggressive heroines in order to prove their points. The revolt may be said to have begun with Miss Rhoda Broughton and Miss Helen Mathers, who idealized the hoyden. We rather liked those hoydens, and we do not complain. Whatever their faults, and however pronounced their addiction to being misunderstood, they were not continually trying to show how clever they were, or undertaking to demonstrate that theirs was the superior sex. The modern lady novelist, with exceptions, is rather apt to do both these things. Sometimes, as in the case of Miss Fowler, she is anxious to prove that women can talk brilliantly; and then she is apt to make them talk rather more brilliantly than is consistent with good manners. Sometimes she wishes to prove that woman is the moral superior of any man who does not encourage her to neglect her household duties for the purpose of addressing public meetings on subjects generally considered unsuitable for mixed audiences; and then her heroines are apt to be pedantic and aggressive. There is, of course, no reason why lady novelists should not establish both these theses in their novels if they can and care to. The end may justify the means. But, if we may judge by the results so far accomplished, the disagreeable heroine is a means without which the end cannot be achieved.

BY THE SEA.

Deep calls to deep. The azure of the sky
Call'd to the deep blue sea,
And, list'ning to their clarion voices, I
O'erheard a call to me.
Not then the alien clamour of the mart
Deafen'd the inward ear;
I was subdued to nature, and my heart
Grew sensitive to hear.

My feeble thought, like falt'ring mist, was fused
In the great light that shone;
It was not only I who stood and mused,
Though I stood there alone,
But spirits reached their hands up from the deep,
Or fell on quivering wings,
And I was visited by Death and Sleep,
And put off mortal things.

Out of the bosom of the sea arose
The Patience of the sea,—
She bade me live, not by the good I chose,
But by the good for me.
And Peace descended from his high abode,
Till, in that hour serene,
To Peace and Patience I transferr'd my load,
On their twin strength to lean.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

The completion of the great "History of French Language and Literature," published under the direction of Professor L. Petit de Julleville, cannot but awaken in English readers a sense of our own deficiency. Nearly three hundred years have passed since Bacon noted as a gap in studies the vacant space which should have been occupied by a description of the general state of learning from age to age, "without which the history of the world seemeth to me to be as the statue of Polyphemus with his eye out, that part being wanting which doth most shew the spirit and life of the person." The history of what Goethe called "world-literature," attempted in part by Hallam, is a project too ambitious for an age when the conception of world-literature embraces the East as well as the West; but it does not seem vain to hope that what has been achieved for France may, by united and wisely-directed effort, be accomplished for our own country. During upwards of three years a fasciculus of M. Petit de Julleville's work has appeared on the fifth and the twentieth of each month, and now the final volume—the eighth—has brought the work to a conclusion. The story of a literature of nine centuries has been told with adequate learning, excellent judgment, and literary skill. "I thank the public," writes the general editor, "for the reception it has accorded to our work. At a time when commonly books find a smaller number of readers in proportion to their bulk, this has been read; and it has quickly gained a position of authority. To my zealous fellow-labourers the honour is due. Their special competence in the several matters with which they have dealt constitutes the originality of the work; their good understanding has ensured its unity, in so far as unity is possible." The editor has modestly passed over what was of capital importance—his own wise planning of the whole, his choice of competent workmen, the freedom which he granted, and the control which he exercised.

If I were a great publisher instead of a poor professor of English literature I think I should be stirred to emulation by the success of MM. Armand Colin et Cie.'s enterprise, and should feel some pride in celebrating the opening of the twentieth century by the design of an adequate history of English literature. Compared with such vast co-operative labours as the "Encyclopædia Britannica," the "Dictionary of National Biography," the "New English Dictionary on Historical Principles," the undertaking would not seem stupendous. Valuable as are the chapters on the history of the language in M. Petit de Julleville's work, corresponding chapters might perhaps be omitted from a history of our literature, and thus the task might be somewhat lightened. One comprehensive mind should preside over the whole, the mind rather of a man of wide culture and sane judgment than of a specialist. The name of a general editor under whom it would be an honour to serve, and whose generous guidance to men of letters has been recorded in a hundred prefaces, will, perhaps, occur to my readers. The list of M. Petit de Julleville's collaborateurs comprises fifty scholars of distinction. England, aided by American and Colonial scholarship, might yield an equal number of skilled workmen, and the disbanded array of writers for the "Dictionary of National Biography" would furnish not a few who have received an admirable training. No division of the work so large as a literary period should be entrusted to a single writer. Each eminent author should be dealt with by a specialist, and by a specialist who possesses literary feeling as well as exact knowledge. Minor writers should be grouped under the literary species to which they belong. It is true, as M. Petit de Julleville observes, that such a classification is sometimes arbitrary or conventional; a writer of comedy may be really a preacher of morals with the stage for his pulpit; but the classification is inevitable and is convenient. What is dead should be allowed to remain buried, unless it happen to have some historical significance; a history of literature must not become a museum of curiosities.

The conception of literature should, however, be liberal. I remember that I excited some indignation many years ago by protesting against what I called "the belles-lettres heresy"; but I remain still of my old opinion. To write a history of literature, as I understand it, is to trace the stream of the national mind as seen in books—not merely books that fall under the head of belles-lettres, but all living books that have in them at once something personal to the writer and something common to the general heart and mind of man. "The study of literature"—I ask pardon for quoting from my former self—"is not a study solely of what is graceful, attractive, and pleasure-giving in books; it attempts to understand the great thoughts of the great thinkers." And, desiring to put my view in a somewhat aggressive form, I went on:—"To know Greek literature we must know Aristotle; to know French literature we must know Descartes. In English literature of the eighteenth century, Berkeley and Butler and Hume are greater names than Gray and Collins." I do not mean merely that the study of speculative or philosophical literature indirectly throws light upon the literature of imagination in the same period. It is obvious that St. Thomas had no small hand in the wonderful structure which we name "The Divine Comedy"; that to understand Pope aright we must know something of the philosophical views of Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke; that to comprehend the thought of Shelley we must examine it in situ, that is, in the "Political Justice" of his master, William Godwin. But I go farther than this, and maintain that a body of philosophical thought, largely derived from and coloured by the personality of its author, must needs be included under the term literature. Indeed, I wonder that it is not generally perceived that not a few systems of human philosophy are in the truest sense works of art—spiritual temples or cathedrals in which men's highest thoughts and aspirations find expression and find shelter; they rise like majestic exhalations,

> With the sound
> Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet;

and sometimes, like exhalations, they become the sport of winds of change.

One valuable aid to study, which has been put to use by M. Petit de Julleville, and, in his recent "History of French Literature," by M. Faguet, lies in pictorial Illustrations. They must, of course, be of historical authority and faithful in execution. German students of literature are even more liberally taught through the eye than French; but as yet little in this kind has been done in our own country. In the New High School, Newtonville, an American teacher, Mr. A. J. George, has an "English Room," devoted to the pictorial illustration of our literature. Authentic portraits, pictures of localities associated with great writers, reproductions from illuminated manuscripts (where the grace or the naïveté of the design illustrates like qualities in the text), facsimiles of title-pages, contemporary illustrations from books in which eminent engravers had a part, pictures of the stage at various periods with its characters and its costumes—all these (and the list could be enlarged) bring the history of literature nearer to us, and render it more living for our imagination, whether we be young readers or old. Only they must be kept in subordination to what is of higher import, and be viewed not as an end in themselves, but as means to an end.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

NEW LIGHT ON SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

II.

Next to Ironside's "relacion" of the theological debate at Sir George Trenchard's—described in the first part of this article—the most important of the depositions at Cerne is that of Nicholas Jefferys, parson of Weeke Regis, who relates a sad experience:—"Some three years paste coming to Blanforde out of Hampsheire, his horse was stayed and taken for a poste horse by Sir W. Rawleigh and Mr. Carewe Rawleigh; where this Deponent entreatinge to have his horse released, for that he was to ride home unto his charge (from whence he had ben some time absent) to preach the next day being Sundaye—Mr. Carewe Rawleigh replyed that he might goe home where he woulde, but his horse shoulde preach before him or to that effecte." How the worthy parson must have enjoyed at last having his revenge by pouring the tale into the sympathetic ears of the Commissioners! Jefferys also states that he has heard of Harriott having been "convented before the Lords of the Counsell for denyinge the resurrecion of the bodye." This is important, for it is the first allusion yet found to an appearance of Harriott before the Privy Council to answer the charges made against him at the time of Marlowe's arrest.

There is another member of Raleigh's retinue about whom we hear—a Thomas Allen, Lieutenant of Portland Castle. He is probably to be identified with Thomas Allen, the distinguished savant, a Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and an associate of Harriott, of whom Fuller relates that "he succeeded to the skill and scandal of Friar Bacon." Jefferys deposes that Allen "is a great blasphemer and leight esteemer of Religion, and therabouts cometh not to Devine service or sermons." Others enter into more piquant details. Two [illegible] one occasion he "did teare two Leaves out of a Booke to [illegible] Tobacco on"—perhaps the earliest allegation in a legal document of the nefarious influence of the newly-imported weed. Francis Scarlett, the minister of Sherborne, relates at second hand a story that Allen, "when he was a huntinge and he rayned," had cried out that "if God were in the heate that he would pull him out with his teeth." And another witness repeats, also from hearsay, the still more scandalous episode of how Allen, "when he was like to dye, beinge perswaded to make himselfe readye to God for his soule," had answered that "he would carry his soule up to the topp of an hill and runne to God, and runne Devill, fetch it that will have it." Allen's ill-fame was shared, as was common in such cases, by his servant Olliver, to whom is attributed a highly unedifying piece of criticism on the Old Testament, uttered as he was returning from a sermon in the company of two good ladies of Sherborne; whereat, we are informed, "their eares did glowe," and one of them told him to "goe home and sleep."

What inferences may we draw from the "examinations"? First, we may conclude from the silence of all the deponents on the subject that even popular rumour did not associate Raleigh's "Atheism" with the revolutionary political designs attributed to Richard Chomeley and his confederates. Secondly, we may dismiss more confidently than before the repulsive allegations made against Marlowe, Harriott, and other members of Raleigh's circle. For in the report of the "examinations" we see side by side, in instructive fashion, irresponsible hearsay and authentic personal testimony. And the closer we get to the facts the more favourable is the light in which Raleigh and his friends appear. Ironside's narrative teaches us how to interpret the charge against Sir Walter of keeping "a schoole of Atheisme" at his house. Clearly the scholars who gathered there, stirred by the Renaissance speculative impulse, were wont to prove all things—to test by stringent dialectic the most sacred conceptions. The "Atheist lecture" read by Marlowe to Raleigh was thus probably a closely reasoned discussion in scholastic form of religious first principles. The spirit of the "schoole" finds utterance in the opening scene of the dramatist's Dr. Faustus:—

> Settle thy studies, Faustus, and begin
> To sound the depth of that thou wilt profess;
> Having commenced, be a divine in show,
> Yet level at the end of every art,
> And live and die in Aristotle's works.
> Sweet Analytics, 'tis thou hast ravished me.

For Raleigh and his brother Carew this kind of theological discussion seems to have had constant attraction. We hear of Sir Walter not long after the "examinations" at Cerne sitting up all night to discuss religious topics with a Jesuit. And Sir John Harington, writing in 1603, says of him that "in religion he hath shown in private talk great depth and good reading, as I once experienced at his own house before many learned men." The words might be applied to the disputation at Sir George Trenchard's.

It is easy to see how "the common voice of the country" would label Raleigh and his circle as Atheists. But while rejecting so crude a designation, one has to admit the difficulty of reconciling the sceptical position adopted by Sir Walter in the dialogue with Ironside with the orthodox tone of his published works. Raleigh in his "History of the World" draws largely upon the Scriptural narrative as one of his sources. And he who had told Ironside that he could not "bring hitherto what God is" thus eloquently in the same work describes His attributes:—

"God whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a power ineffable, and virtue infinite; a light by abundant clarity invisible; an understanding which itself can only comprehend; an essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity, was and is pleased to make himself known by the work of the world; in the wonderful magnitude whereof all which he embraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withal that one and universal nature which cannot be defined."

Possibly these concluding words throw light on the difficulty. In the disputation at Wolverton, and doubtless on other occasions, Raleigh was chiefly concerned with the critical analysis of accepted "definitions" of religious conceptions. But in an age when men did not push their speculative opinions to their logical extreme he may have accepted on faith beliefs for which he found insufficient warrant in the processes of the reason alone. One would like to know the full significance of an admission by one of the deponents at Cerne that "he hearde Mr. Carewe Raleigh saye at Gillingham there was a God in nature." And if "A Treatise of the Soul," printed among Sir Walter's works from a MS. in the Ashmolean, be authentic, we find the sceptical inquirer of the Oxford and the Sherborne days demonstrating in detail by quotations from Scripture and the Fathers the nature of man's soul, and crying shame on those "who have called the souls of women into question."

But whatever view is taken on the complex subject of Raleigh's innermost religious beliefs, the "examinations" at Cerne—above all Ironside's "relacion"—throw fresh light on his biography. And one point, in conclusion, deserves notice. As far as we are aware, no action was taken as a result of the investigations. But Raleigh must have known of the inquiry, and his mettlesome nature doubtless chafed at the affront of his table-talk among friends being rigorously sifted. The sense that even in his West-country retreat he was not safe from prying eyes and ears must have quickened his longing to set sail "towards the sunset." And so within a year he was afloat on the Spanish main, with his speculative energies diverted for the time from the search for metaphysical first principles to the quest of the equally intangible, but more illusory entity, the fabled gold of the Empire of Guiana.

FREDERICK S. BOAS.

THE REAL PRISONER OF CHILLON.

[By FRANCIS GRIBBLE.]

One is apt to think of François de Bonivard, Prisoner of Chillon, merely as the man who was chained to the pillar on which modern tourists are forbidden to scratch their names under pain of prosecution with the utmost rigour of the law. As a matter of fact he was a much more complicated character, and has far better claims to be remembered. He was a prior (though not in Holy Orders) who owed his income to ecclesiastical abuses; he was the father of history in French Switzerland—the father of lies also, according to certain of his critics; and he was the typical easy-going man whom the stern discipline of Calvin put to inconvenience. It is worth while, for once, to make light of his imprisonment, and, looking at him from other points of view, endeavour to see him as he really was.

Of his performances as a prior we can say little because we know next to nothing. We only know of his making one new rule for the better government of the priory—a rule to the effect that whenever a new monk was admitted to the privileges of brotherhood he should pay his footing by inviting all the other monks to supper. Shortly after he had made that rule he was waylaid on a country road by an ecclesiastic who threatened to murder him unless he subscribed a deed assigning the benefice to him. This Bonivard did; but a little later we find him hiring a band of mercenaries and waging a private war in the hope of getting the benefice back again. His commander-in-chief was a certain Bischebach, a butcher, who had fled from Berne because the reformers of that city had made it illegal for mistresses to be kept by married men; the second in command was a Canon Vullimanin, an unfrocked friar. The campaign, however, was unsuccessful and inglorious, and we need not dwell upon this branch of the subject.

Possibly it was during the six years of his confinement (from 1530 to 1536) that Bonivard discovered his literary abilities. At all events, it is not known that he wrote anything before his imprisonment, and he has himself told us that he occupied himself at Chillon with the composition of "any number of trifling fancies and ballads in both French and Latin." One of these was a lampoon on the Duke of Savoy, who had locked him up, concluding with the striking couplet—

> All honest men he does confine,
> But asks dishonest men to dine.

The poem was not a work of genius, but it was calculated to give pleasure to the author's fellow citizens. When they decided that the history of the city should be written, they gave Bonivard the post of official chronicler; and the Register of the Council gives us several interesting glimpses of the historian at work.

The first entry, October, 1542, is merely to the effect that "François de Bonivard is ordered to work at the Chronicles of the Town." It appears side by side with an intimation that Calvin is to be presented with a cask of wine in consideration of his public services. The second entry, June, 1546, records that "a box of sweetmeats is to be given to François de Bonivard, who is working at the Chronicles, and his servant, who writes at his dictation, is to be given a pair of boots." It jostles a resolution to the effect that, as Farel, the Reformer, is more shabbily dressed than becomes a minister of the Word, he shall be presented with a new suit of clothes. In 1547 we have this entry:—

> "François de Bonivard begs the Council to assign him, for the coming winter, a room, more convenient than his own house, to work in. He cannot, he says, write conveniently, and compose as he should, in the room in which he and his family take their meals."

The request was granted. Bonivard was allotted a room with a stove in it, and got his book finished in the course of 1552. The question of printing it was referred to Calvin, who decided against the application on the ground that the style of the chronicle was inconsistent with the dignity of history. From Calvin's own point of view there was something to be said for the verdict. He was a stylist who wrote the language of the schools; Bonivard was no stylist and wrote the language of the streets. He was the sort of writer to call a spade a shovel, and prefer a homely metaphor to any other. He said, for instance, that the Dukes of Savoy loved Geneva "as the glutton loves a good plump fowl"; and to show his readers how closely circumscribed were the Genevan territories, he observed, "One could hardly spit over the wall without spitting on the Duke of Savoy." Moreover, when he wished to mark the hour of the day at which any event occurred, he never spoke of it otherwise than in its relation to "dinner time" or "supper time."

One can understand that this sort of thing jarred upon Calvin, who had neither appetite for food nor sense of humour, and whose own prose style was marked by classical precision and severe restraint. It jarred upon him, no doubt, much as the writings of Mr. Kipling jar upon the English disciples of Flaubert. But Calvin was wrong—misled by that personal equation which misleads so many critics. He had no right to judge Bonivard's book by the classical standards of France, for the good reason that it was not the work of a Frenchman, and claimed no relation with French literature. It was Genevan, racy of the soil—almost the only, and certainly the best articulate expression of Genevan thought and manners in the days before the invasion of pastors and professors had begun to break down the barriers and make Geneva an intellectual dependency of France. Moreover, the style was the man, as it always is, and the man was a man with a singularly acute mind, and a keener capacity for penetrating sophisms and seeing things as they really were than any other Genevan man of letters of his period. Calvin, in short, never showed his limitations more clearly than when he forbade the printing of the Chronicle of Bonivard.

It was not, however, on questions of literary taste alone that Bonivard's and Calvin's opinions clashed. Questions of conduct also came between them; and the study of the archives shows us

Bonivard appearing again and again before the Consistory, or Court of Ecclesiastical Discipline, of which Calvin was the moving spirit. His gravest delinquency was an act of gallantry with a maid servant, which resulted in his being forbidden to have maid servants living in the house; but there were others. On one occasion we find him in trouble for playing backgammon with Clément Marot, the author of the first metrical version of the Psalms. On another occasion he was accused of beating his wife; but this time he defended himself successfully, proving that the beating had been deserved, with the result that it was the lady whom the assembled ministers admonished. The excuses which he offered to a charge of absenting himself from church were less acceptable; he was told that he had better get some one to carry him, as he had done when he went to the town-hall to look at some new decorations. Finally he was found guilty, in spite of strenuous denials, of lampooning Calvin, and was sentenced, if the registers may be believed, to receive the Holy Communion by way of punishment.

Saddest of all, however, is the story of the interference of the Consistory with the historian's matrimonial affairs. At the age of 69, being then, for the third time, a widower, he had given shelter in his house to a nun who had lately run away from a convent. The Consistory promptly informed him that this was contrary to good morals, and that he must marry the young woman without delay. Bonivard objected. His relations with his protégée, he pleaded, were Platonic; his age and his infirmities were such that they could never be anything but Platonic; consequently he begged to be excused. The ministers replied that this excuse was frivolous, and that Bonivard's infirmities need not hinder him from entering the holy estate. He yielded to their authority, if not to their better judgment; and three years later we find his wife arraigned before the Consistory on a charge of infidelity.

It was not Bonivard who brought the charge. On the contrary, he appeared as a witness for the defence, testifying that he had found nothing to complain of in his wife's conduct, except that she had urged him to be more devout than he cared to be, had taunted him for not preaching the Gospel, and had beaten him for inviting his friends to drop in upon him and drink a glass of wine. His evidence, however, did not save her. Her guilt was proved; and, in accordance with the cruel custom of the age, she was sewn up into a sack, and shot, like a load of rubbish, into the Rhone.

So, none of his marriages having brought him any children, the old man's old age was lonely. He was 72 when his fellow citizens put his wife to death, and he dragged on for five years more. Beyond the fact that the most comfortable house in the town was given him to live in, we have no knowledge of how his declining days were passed. The Consistory, at any rate, ceased from troubling him, and we may hope that the ministers strained a point in his favour, and allowed him to stay away from their sermons when he was indisposed, and to play backgammon when he felt inclined. But this is mere conjecture. We only know that he died, in 1570, at the age of 77, and, in spite of weaknesses and eccentricities, left an honoured memory behind him.

"THE PASSION OF THE PAST."

Readers of the Memoir of the late Lord Tennyson may recollect a conversation recorded there, in which the poet alludes to an influx of feeling often experienced by him in boyhood, and summed up in the significant phrase "The Passion of the Past." He has given expression to this feeling in more than one poem, notably in the "Ancient Sage," and in that exquisite lyric "Far, Far, Away." It is a feeling not unfamiliar to a few imaginative persons, whose childhood was at all solitary, and whom the dreamland of their own fancies often called away from the eager and engrossing pleasures of their more instinctive companions.

To the majority of the young, however, the words of Amiel in his Journal are far more applicable: "The poetry of childhood consists in simulating and forestalling the future, just as the poetry of mature life consists often in going backwards to some golden age." But the Past was the dream of all those poets who have placed their state of perfected happiness, which they called "The Golden Age," and made the pulsation of their regret the measure of its distance from the actual Present. The same feeling still lingers on in modern times in spite of the spread of Christianity, with its boundless hope in the vision of a Golden Age destined to be realized in the Future. Nay, could not even the Christian and philosophic poet Wordsworth exclaim, as he watched the little child thus wondering and forestalling the future:—

> Why, with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
> The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
> Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?

These words carry us back to the tender and pathetic strain of the great Roman poet whom Wordsworth in his later years specially loved:—

> Optima quaeque dies miseris mortalibus aevi
> Prima fugit; subeunt morbi, tristisque senectus
> Et labor; et durae rapit inclementia mortis.

Lines like these probably hit the mood of more persons than the over-confident optimism of Browning in "Rabbi Ben Ezra":—

> Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life, for which the first was made.

The "Passion of the Past" takes varying forms in different minds, and during the successive stages of life. All these can be illustrated from the poets in whom particular phases of this Passion are best typified. In Keats it showed itself in the form of a craving for the Ideal Beauty of the classics. Born and reared amidst unlovely surroundings he sought in the fair humanities of old religion for types of that beauty, which the actualities of the present failed to supply. Hence it was that he exclaimed in his sonnet "On seeing the Elgin Marbles":—

> Such dim conceived glories of the brain
> Bring round the heart an indescribable feud;
> So do these wonders a most dizzy pain,
> That mingles Grecian grandeur with the rude
> Wasting of old Time—with a billowy main—
> A sun—a shadow of a magnitude.

In this Keats is eminently typical of the artistic spirit in youth, and of youthful poets in general; for rare, indeed, is it that we come across a poet like Shelley, in whom the prophetic instinct is so dominant in early life that the Vision of the Future throws the Past entirely into the shade, and utterly dwarfs the Living Present. It is true that before Keats died "The still, sad music of humanity" was beginning to make itself heard in his strains, but his poetic life as a whole—brief as its span was—is a supreme example of the "Passion of the Past" taking possession of a most richly endowed nature, awaking its dormant powers, and kindling them into a creative energy, which impressed itself upon forms of imperishable beauty, that have caught some of the richness and glow reflected from those ancient realms of gold through which the poet had travelled. Poetry, in short, for Keats was "always in the distance," and the distance was in the Past. Such was the attitude, too, of Charles Lamb, who by a sort of inversion grew backwards, and confounded futurity with antiquity. One stanza from Wordsworth's impressive lines on "Memory" might have been written for Lamb:—

> That smoothes foregone distress, the lines
> Of lingering care subdues,
> Long-vanished happiness refines,
> And clothes in brighter hues.

It is of this refining, softening and toning power of the Past that Charles Lamb was thinking when he wrote: "I have almost ceased to hope; and am sanguine only in the prospects of other (former) years. I plunge into foregone visions and conclusions. I encounter pell-mell with past disappointments. I am armour-proof against old discouragements. I forgive, or overcome in fancy, old adversaries. I play over again for love, as the gamesters phrase it, games for which I once paid so dear. I would scarce now have any of those untoward accidents and events of my life reversed. I would no more alter them than the incidents of some well-contrived novel."

In maturity and middle age the "Passion of the Past" often takes the form of Regret. Then the loss of the bounding energies of youth, the disillusions which contact with the world has caused, the disappointment of hopes, the failure of aspirations, the loss of friends and companions produce a feeling of sadness, which even when embittered by no stings of remorse has all the intensity and directness of genuine passion. This sadness was felt by Tennyson himself, and takes the form in his poetry of Ideal Regret. Its mood is faithfully reflected in such lines as the following :—

> Dear as remembered kisses after death,
> And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned,
> On lips that are for others ; deep as love,
> Deep as first love, and wild with all regret ;
> Oh Death in Life, the days that are no more.

But, after all, it is Remorse that intensifies Regret and makes it terrible, and for the Passion of a passionless Despair it would be hard to match these lines from Byron's "Stanzas for Music" :—

Oh could I feel as I have felt—or be what I have been,
Or weep as I could once have wept, o'er many a vanish'd scene ;
As springs in deserts found seem sweet, all brackish though they be,
So, midst the wither'd waste of life, those tears would flow to me.

In old age the highest form the "Passion of the Past" takes is the Passion of Peace. This, the reward of a life spent nobly, and in devotion to noble ends, has been well illustrated during the present generation by the old age of two great men. First, by that of the great poet who towards the close of his days touched again upon themes that had delighted his youth, and reaffirmed and justified his lifelong pursuit of the Supreme Ideal in his "Merlin and The Gleam" ; and, secondly, by the old age of the illustrious statesman, and friend of the poet, who after sixty years of public life, devoted the evening of his days to the study of those literary and theological works for which quite early in life he had showed such a decided bent. For those who have never lost the sense of continuity between the different stages and experiences of their life, whose years have seen a steady progression of orderly development, for whom there has been "no pause in the leading and the light" the "Passion of the Past" becomes a Passion of Peace—they, as Wordsworth, who felt this Passion in its utmost intensity, beautifully says, steal to their allotted nook—

> Contented and serene ;
> With hearts as calm as lakes that sleep,
> In frosty moonlight glistening ;
> Or mountain rivers, where they creep
> Along a channel smooth and deep,
> To their own far-off murmurs listening.

C. FISHER.

THE DEATH-KNELL OF FRENCH SYNTAX.

A philological revolution has just taken place in Paris. By the fiat of the Minister of Education French syntax is declared to have outlived its time. Henceforth a foreigner writing to a Frenchman need not be dissuaded by any feeling of false modesty from plunging in medias res into the intricacies of expression in the French tongue. If it is not yet quite true that his blunders in orthography will pass unnoticed, and if there be still certain idiomatic conventions which he must observe, yet in general he is left to the largest liberty of utterance. He need not have any more scruples as to the agreement of past participles, or hesitation over the genders of words like aigle, amour, orgue, délice, automne, enfant, gens, hymne, œuvre, or orge. He may write them indifferently in the masculine or feminine. He may drop the article before certain Italian family names as freely as an Anglo-Saxon ; no longer will it be a fault to write Tasse or Corrège instead of le Tasse, le Corrège. Henceforth, by the Ministerial decree, du, de la, or des may be used in place of de before a substantive preceded by an adjective. Thus you may say de or du bon pain, de bonne viande or de la bonne viande, de or des bons fruits. And as for a whole class of adjectives, such as nu, feu, ci-joint, ci-inclus, y compris, the ignorant French schoolboy or the helpless foreigner need have no fear ; these adjectives may be made to agree or not with the noun, just as one likes. Thus you may say je vous envoie ci-joint, or ci-jointe copie de la pièce. If you wish it you may put cent in the plural and say quatre cents treate hommes. On the thorny question of the agreement of verbs there is the largest licence. You may even say sa maladie sont des vapeurs and le général avec quelques officiers est sorti or sont sortis. But it is in doing away with the heart-rending difficulties over the agreement of past participles that M. Leygues' decree is a veritable godsend for the foreigner. Nothing has been changed in the rule that a past participle used as an epithet must agree with the qualified word, and used as an attribute with the verb être, or that an intransitive verb must agree with the subject. We are still bound to write des fruits gatés ; ils sont tombés ; elles sont tombées. But when the past participle contains the auxiliary avoir, we need have no concern as to its agreement. It agrees or not as the mood strikes you. We may write indifferently, la peine que j'ai pris or prise ; elles se sont tu or tues ; les coups que nous nous sommes donné or donnés. The negative adverb ne may now be used or not after empêcher, défendre, éviter que (thus, défendre qu'on vienne or qu'on ne vienne), craindre, désespérer, avoir peur, douter, contester, nier que, &c. Of difficulties or subtleties in the construction of a French phrase there remains only one class of obstacles—namely, the choice of the preposition à or de after the verb.

The plastic, clean-cut quality of expression in French—as regards the written or the printed page—is certainly compromised by this reform. French prose has always possessed a greater precision and lucidity than English. It may be that it was owing partially to the way in which, by constant agreement, adjective and verb and noun dovetailed into one another. The contour of the French prose surface is now shattered as by a seismic wave. No such revolutionary movement has ever been attempted in philology anywhere. Needless to say that the Ministerial decree has upset the Academy, and last Thursday week it voted that it was eminently desirable that it should be asked for its opinion before the application of the reform became irrevocable. Some of the Academicians, and among them some of the most eminent philologists in France, were members of the Upper Board of Education which is responsible for the reform. We may anticipate, therefore, an amusing conflict. M. Leygues, however, has signed his decree. It is henceforth an historic document. Where Bismarck failed to override the recommendations in 1876 of the Prussian Minister of Education, who by a similar decree carried out a reform which was the result of four years of patient discussion, it is not likely that the Academy will succeed. M. Leygues, as one writer has put it, has drawn up the Declaration of the Rights of verbs, nouns, adjectives, articles, participles, and even of adverbs. His decree is the proclamation of the liberty of words. The names of the members of his commission should be known. They are MM. Gaston Paris, the president, Gréard, the head of the University of Paris, Croiset, professor of Greek, Paul Meyer, the head of the Ecole des Chartes, Henri Bernès, Clairin, Deschat, and Comte.

THE ICONOCLAST.

CHRISTIANITY AND MYTHOLOGY. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON. (Watts and Co., 8s. 6d. n.)

Mr. Robertson is well known as a writer with a somewhat pronounced taste for iconoclasm. But in these rationalistic times it is impossible to ignore the arguments of those who attack the strongholds of religion in a scientific spirit, though we might wish away a certain note of truculence which from time to time has characterized Mr. Robertson's utterances. The feeling of despondency which he professes on giving to the world the present volume—a volume representing fifteen years' hard work—is scarcely what we should have expected from the author. Prospectively he divides his readers into two classes. On the one hand he sees a huge army of more or less educated men, whose interest it is to resist most of his conclusions by every means in their power, and who are powerful by their numbers and organization, and by the influence exercised by them over a large section of the laity. Bishops, and clergy, and ministers of religion generally will either toss him aside as a reproducer of cavils which have been refuted over and over again, or will answer him in the time-honoured fashion—by conscious sophistry of various kinds, by calling him bad names, and by appeals to sentimental tradition. On the other hand, there is the comparatively limited body of serious and open-minded laymen to whose candour and interest in the quest of truth such works as the present should primarily appeal. "Unfortunately," says Mr. Robertson, "the open-minded laity are in large part satisfied to think that traditionalism is discredited, and so take up an attitude of indifference to works which any longer join issue with it." We do not so read the signs of the times. All this might have been said with truth some thirty or forty years ago, but, even while Mr. Robertson has been writing, the world has been moving. Every one now recognizes that the attempt to keep the sacred writings isolated from the general mass of literary and historical material is a futile one. It was once thought that all would be over when once the fence was demolished and the boundary effaced. Nothing is less true. The process of reconstruction—of fitting together the disjoined fragments of truth, and interpreting each by means of its long lost complement, and of testing the work when done—is a slow one, because a difficult and hazardous one. All who work at it with an adequate equipment for the task may be sure that, however limited may be their achievements, and however scanty their rewards, their efforts will meet sooner or later with recognition, and in this sense Mr. Robertson may rest assured that he has no cause for despondency.

Mr. Robertson's volume consists of three parts, each containing a separate and independent treatise. In the first, he sketches the history of the rationalistic treatment of religious myths from Euemeros through Macrobius and the Christian fathers down to modern times, summing up and criticizing the contributions made in previous generations by writers like De Brosses, Dupuis, Heyne, and K. O. Müller, and more recently by Max Müller, Cox, Forlong, Tylor, Forchammer, Spencer, Lang, and J. G. Frazer. Part II. is entitled "Christ and Krishna," and is devoted to an examination of the hypothesis that the Krishna myth is largely founded on the traditions of early Christianity—a hypothesis which most of Mr. Robertson's readers will probably agree with him in rejecting. Unlike Christianity, the cult of Krishna is traceable to prehistoric times; and Mr. Robertson even pronounces its earliest form to be distinctly non-Aryan. Instead of the Krishnaite Birth Festival ritual and the pictorial representation of the babe Krishna as suckled by his mother being borrowings from Christianity, Mr. Robertson holds that the corresponding parts of the Christian legend are borrowed from Krishnaism.

Nor can we without defying all probability suppose that such motives as the "ox-and-ass," the "manger," the "tax-paying," and the "Christophoros" were borrowed by the Hindus from Christianity, which itself unquestionably borrowed the first two and the last from Paganism. The fair surmise is rather that the third was borrowed from India; and the necessary assumption, in the present state of our knowledge, is that the others also were ancient in India, whether or not any of them thence reached Christism in its ebullient stage. It is further possible that the introduction of shepherds into the Christian Birth-legend in the late Third Gospel was suggested by knowledge of the Krishna legend. The converse hypothesis has been shown to be preposterous. The myth of the massacre of the innocents is the more to be regarded as pre-Christian in India because it connects naturally with the motive of the attempted slaying of the God-child.

In the third and last part of the volume, entitled "The Gospel Myths," Mr. Robertson resumes the discussion of these incidents in the Gospel story, and goes on to investigate the remainder of the narrative. He is largely guided by the principle, sound enough in its constitution though liable to abuse in its application, that myth has in general been founded on ritual, not ritual on historical or mythical events, and founds his argument mainly on the almost total absence from the impassioned and highly controversial writings of St. Paul of any accurate knowledge of the Gospel history as set forth in the Gospel authors. He argues that the greater part of this history is mythical, and represents an accretion of spurious information gradually accumulated in response to a natural demand on the part of early Christian votaries. St. Paul knows only an unsuccessful "Messiah," who bore the common Jewish name "Jesus," who suffered death as the consequence of his ambition, but rose from the dead, and ascended into Heaven. In filling up this meagre outline the "Christists," as Mr. Robertson terms them, largely borrowed from the traditions of other religions, both of the West and the East—especially from the latter—which were at the time competing for the devotion of the Roman world. Thus the Temptation has a close analogue in the Temptation of Buddha, and a remoter parallel in that of Zarathustra; and in one of its aspects it strikingly recalls a legend of Jupiter preserved by the Christian writer Lactantius. The Water-wine miracle, as Dupuis pointed out long since, may well have been adopted from the popular cult of Dionysus, who, as the maker of wine, was also the force which changes water into wine by transmuting sap into grape-juice, and totally altering the character of grape-juice by the process of fermentation. The Walking on the Water embodies a conception already familiar in the myths of Poseidon and Hercules. Dionysus, again, who gave the power of miraculously producing by touch corn, wine, and oil, led his army through a waterless desert against the Titans, "a procedure," says Mr. Robertson, "which would involve the supernatural production of liquids"; and the friendly Libyans, according to the legend as preserved by Diodorus, furnished his multitudes with food "in superfluity." The Riding on the Ass and Foal may be yet another reminiscence of the Dionysiac mysteries. The Holy Supper was possibly borrowed from the popular cult of Mithra. Mr. Robertson applies the same method to the illustration of the parables and the "doctrinal myths" which fill so large a space in the Fourth Gospel.

It is impossible to do more than indicate in the space at our command the bare outlines of this work, which has been executed with great thoroughness, and evinces not only learning and ingenuity, but a determination to get, if possible, at the truth of things.

MR. HENLEY AND PATRIOTIC POETRY.

It was argued in a Quarterly Review article, on which we commented last week, that the Transvaal war is a poor theme for poetry. The dictum is at the mercy of any poet who may hereafter prove that he can write worthily about the war; but it has not been confuted up to the present, and it certainly is not confuted by Mr. W. E. Henley's collection of verses, FOR ENGLAND'S SAKE (Nutt, 1s. n.). This collection does not strike us as being worthy of Mr. Henley's best moments. One or two of the poems are reprinted, for example the verses beginning with the now familiar refrain :—

What have I done for you,
England, my England ?

In the new poems we think that the triumphant spirit in which the author regards the war is a little overdone. It is only where he drops the grand style that his verse really rings true.

In so far as it has been responsible for "red ruin and the breaking up of homes" this war, indeed, may lend itself to the purposes of the poet as well as any other war. One felt that strongly in reading Mrs. Anstruther's war stories, which were poetical in everything but form. But the war, though necessary, is not one of the wars that appeal on general principles to the imagination. It strikes one as a disagreeable duty rather than as an heroic enterprise. It does not seem, like the Spanish Armada for instance, to furnish a really adequate occasion for the banging of the big drum : and Mr. Henley bangs the big drum so persistently that one begins to wonder what instrument he would have performed upon if he had flourished in the age of Waterloo.

Sometimes he bangs the drum sanctimoniously :—

We are the Choice of the Will : God when he gave us the word
That called us into line, set at our hand a sword :
Set us a sword to wield none else could lift and draw,
And bade us forth to the sound of the trumpet of the Law.

Sometimes he bangs it blatantly :—

By the dismal fords, the thankless hills, the desolate, half-dead flats
He has shepherded them like silly sheep, and cornered them like rats.
He has driven and herded them strength by strength, as a hunter deals with his deer,
And has filled the place of the heart in their breast with a living devil of fear.

This rings very falsely when one considers the doings of De Wet, and the "regrettable" incidents, though it is useful in making it clear for whose benefit Mr. Kipling, whose faith in England is no less robust than Mr. Henley's, wrote "Lest we forget." In truth Mr. Henley's patriotic poems only please us when he drops the "high falutin," which he interlards with colloquialisms often landing him in bathos, and essays an unambitious song. There is, at all events, the right lilt and the true tone in this :

Storm along, John ! All your Britains are out :
Melbourne and Sydney get up with a shout ;
Wellington, Ottawa, Brisbane their best
Send, with Cape Town and the riding Nor' West.
Horse, men, guns for you ! India's aflame !
How the lads of Natal have been playing the game !
From Gib to Vancouver, from Thames to Yukon,
The live air is loud with your—Storm along, John !

It is not poetry of the highest grade ; but of its kind it is good. Of the same grade, and also good of its kind, is a little sheaf of war verses that comes to us from Australia, BALLADS OF BATTLE, by John Sandes (Melbourne, Sands and M'Dougall). We have seen no better ballad of recent battles than this from which we quote, and of which we should have liked to quote the whole. Oom Paul speaks :—

Lay my rifle here beside me, set my Bible on my breast,
For a moment let the warning bugle cease :
As the century is closing I am going to my rest,
Lord, lettest thou thy servant go in peace.
But loud through all the bugles rings a cadence in mine ear,
And on the winds my hopes of peace are strowed.
These winds that waft the voices that already I can hear
Of the rooi baatjes singing on the road.

But now from snow-swept Canada, from India's torrid plains,
From lone Australian outposts hither led,
Obeying their commando, as they heard the bugle's strains,
The men in brown have joined the men in red.
They come to find the colours at Majuba left and lost,
They come to pay us back the debt they owed ;
And I hear new voices lifted, and I see strange colours tossed,
Mid the rooi baatjes singing on the road.

The old, old faiths must falter, and the old, old creeds must fail—
I hear it in that distant murmur low—
The old, old order changes, and 'tis vain for us to rail,
The great world does not want us—we must go.
The veldt and spruit and kopje to the stranger will belong ;
No more to trek before him we shall load ;
Too well, too well I know it, for I hear it in the song
Of the rooi baatjes singing on the road.

THE STORY OF FULHAM.

In the three handsome volumes of FULHAM, OLD AND NEW (The Leadenhall Press, £3 3s. n.) Mr. Charles James Féret has, once and for all, shown how the history of a London suburb ought to be written. A more complete or a more systematic example of topographical literature has never been printed. Everything has been set forth in this spacious book, every chronicle remembered, every record searched, yet the result has nothing of the stodginess of the old-fashioned topographer. The volumes are bright and light—in all save avoirdupois—and abound in good reading even for those who have never set foot in Fulham. Mr. Féret's success is the more remarkable and the more praiseworthy since Fulham is by no means the most interesting of the famous suburban parishes. It lacks the literary and social savour of Hampstead or Chelsea, Chiswick or Richmond, and the fact that it is more populous and more metropolitan than most of those classic spots has added enormously to the labour and difficulty of dealing with it.

Mr. Féret meets this difficulty by starting with the picturesque central fact of the presence of the Bishops of London at Fulham—a fact around which the whole history of the place revolves. Fulham Palace has been the Manor-house since the Conquest, or earlier—Mr. Féret finds, indeed, that the Bishops have been seated there for eleven hundred years at least. It is true that it was grievously treated by Bishop Terrick and Bishop Howley after him, and that, so far at all events as regards three of its fronts, it is one of the ugliest and most depressing houses in England, a mere box of yellow bricks pierced with windows. Standing upon the lawn of Fulham Palace it is difficult to associate the ruffianly Bonner or the gentle Laud with such a scene of eighteenth century banality ; but the place is overflowing with historical reminiscences nevertheless. There is still the famous cork tree planted by the botanical Compton, and the dismal apartment round which is ranged the library collected by Porteus ; in the Fitzjames Quadrangle are the rooms in which Laud lived and still, they say, haunts ; hard by is the orchard where Bonner scourged his unhappy prisoners with his own hands ; around the domain runs the moat which all authorities ascribe to the Danes. On the other side of it lies the parish church with its ancient tower and very modern body, full of interesting old monuments carefully preserved and removed from the former building—those of Mordaunt and Ranelagh Jones, sundry Bishops of London, and the son of that Colonel Carlos who went into the Royal Oak with Charles II. Lying within a few yards of the river, the churchyard offered exceptional advantages to body-snatchers, and there is still living the inevitable "oldest inhabitant" who witnessed the last exploit of the resurrection-men, while it is little more than half a century since newly-made graves had to be watched lest the convenient Thames should bring some Burke or Hare the first dark night. Fulham, like Chelsea, had some olden distinction for its pottery, and the ware which Dwight produced is, to judge by the best-known examples, well deserving of the high prices which collectors are willing to give for it. John Dwight had a strange and perverse mania for hiding things in his pottery at Fulham. He concealed his tools and some of his specimens, and stowed away money in every cranny that was capable of receiving it. In holes under fire-places, in corners behind doors, and under furnaces were tins and pots full of guineas, and his private note-book contains minute accounts of the exact position of these hoards, and the dates when they were concealed.

As elsewhere within the metropolitan area most of the historic houses of Fulham have disappeared, yet the story of their glories and of the careers of those who lived in them provides material for some of the most attractive portions of Mr. Fèret's book. The most notable literary resident the parish has ever had was Samuel Richardson, who lived successively at The Grange in the North-end-road—one-half of which was occupied in our own time by Burne-Jones—and at Parson's-green. Brandenburgh-house, however, was unquestionably the most famous dwelling-place in Fulham, with the single exception of the episcopal palace. There lived that ambitious and sycophantic mediocrity, George Bubb Dodington, the romantic Margravine of Anspach, whose autobiography is so delightfully self-conscious, and afterwards the ill-regulated Queen Caroline. The house has vanished, and here (for the only time) we have hit upon something that Mr. Fèret omits to tell us—viz., that the staircase down which Queen Caroline was carried to her stately funeral is now in a country-house in a Northumbrian village. Another interesting building, happily still standing, is Lonsdale-house. We have it on the authority of Mr. Gladstone himself that he proposed to Miss Glynne on the lawn there and, he added, nearly half a century afterwards, "I could point out the very spot by the yew trees." At Parson's-green abode both Mrs. Fitzherbert and Mrs. Jordan; while, as in most other fashionable London suburbs, there are traditions that Nell Gwynne once lived in the parish. Mr. Fèret has naturally much to say of Hurlingham, another fine house which, thanks to the love of polo and the less defensible "sport" of pigeon-shooting, still exists, a beautiful oasis in a district which has lost an enormous proportion of its amenities during the last quarter of a century.

Fulham is fortunate indeed in its historian. If most of its historic sites have vanished, the memory of them is preserved in this book with a fulness of detail and a scrupulous accuracy which are beyond praise, and have obviously entailed the most minute and pains-taking labour. Well-written, admirably and systematically arranged, beautifully printed, and embellished with some five hundred illustrations, this is the most all-embracing book of parochial topography with which we are acquainted.

THE "HADDON HALL" LIBRARY.

Our Forests and Woodlands.

The various uses of forest trees are of such importance in the economy of a country that the attempt made by Dr. John Nisbet in OUR FORESTS AND WOODLANDS (The Haddon Hall Library) (Dent, 7s. 6d.) to improve their condition deserves all encouragement. England may be said to owe her proud position among the nations on land and sea in no small degree to her forests and woodlands. Her old archers, taught their trade by hunting the deer, were always at hand to render yeoman's service in her early struggles, while her hearts of oak are naturally associated in the mind with the glorious times of Blake and Nelson. And though bows and arrows have become merely playthings, and British oak has had to give place to teak from India and Burma, the uses of the forests remain, and our love of sport, with the skill in marksmanship it involves, is still helping us to win our battles.

It is the duty of a physical geographer to point out to us that, instead of impoverishing the surface soil, plantations actually improve it by their autumn fall of leaves; that they screen the soil from the heat of the sun's rays, and give shade and shelter to men and beasts; and that they hold the rain, distributing it again more gradually in the springs formed at their base, and in the moisture evaporated from their leaves. Indeed, the famine still raging in India is largely due to the unhappy clearing of mountain slopes, for in old days the forests absorbed much of the rain which now goes straight to the sea.

England, like most other countries, has been reckless in disafforestation. As Dr. Nisbet says:—

> Our humid climate has saved us from the agricultural consequences of excessive clearance of woodlands; but we are now probably very soon about to reap commercially what we have sown in the wholesale destruction of timber.

It furnishes food for reflection that we should have paid to other countries nearly twenty millions sterling in 1899 for pine and fir wood, while at the same time some sixteen million acres in Great Britain and Ireland are now lying waste, which could quite well grow all the coniferous timber we require.

> Heroic measures to replace the woodlands destroyed can only be undertaken on a sufficiently large scale by receiving considerable encouragement and assistance from the State, but private enterprise can do a good deal, partly in replanting waste lands, but chiefly in improving the woods we have. For though we have often been stigmatized as a nation of shopkeepers, yet in the matter of planting and preserving our woodlands English landowners have thought far more of their beauty and of the enjoyment to be got out of them than of their commercial possibilities. Every country house is flanked and guarded by its magnificent old trees, and every small villa has its shrubs around it, many of them of rare beauty. And when large plantations are made, the coverts are usually so arranged as to attract and hold as many game birds as possible, and to enable beaters to drive them out on all suitable occasions, without any regard at all to the amount per cubic foot which the trees may ultimately fetch. Rabbits are encouraged in every way, though the mischief they do even to large trees in a hard winter is incalculable and irremediable, and all the forestry work has to be crowded into February and March, so as not to interfere with the shooting or the nesting season.

The interests of the forester, however, need not be antagonistic to those of the sportsman, though they can never be identical. If they are to work harmoniously together, the sportsman must agree to keep rabbits down, and to allow summer pruning and thinning, and autumn preparation for sowing, while in return the forester should give up special plots in large woods to be reserved and specially treated for pheasants. Both should combine in the making of broad rides, which are always useful in the beating out of game, and are necessary for the proper conduct of forest operations according to a fixed plan. In making fresh plantations both would agree in the planting of copse woods, with occasional standards; for copses furnish one of the best ways of growing oak, ash, and larch, and all trees which demand plenty of light, and at the same time are better suited for pheasant shooting than any other system of management.

In private plantations some such rules of give-and-take may be followed as are here sketched out, but the re-afforesting of large wastes, which can scarcely be undertaken without State assistance, is the point on which the writer justly lays most stress. This great work will have soon to be taken in hand with all the scientific exactness of method in which the Germans have much to teach and we to learn.

Hunting.

We have rarely met with a book on hunting, or any other field-sport, so free from crotchets as Mr. J. Otho Paget's HUNTING which, is also published in the "Haddon Hall" Series. Mr. Paget shows considerable knowledge both of the practice and of the literature of the sport. Throughout Mr. Paget trusts more to his own experience than to traditional views, and his remarks on the much vexed question as to whether certain pastimes, such as hunting the carted stag or shooting pigeons from a trap, can be regarded as sport are those of a writer who has thought the matter out for himself.

> Hunting the carted stag and the drag may be pleasant and harmless amusements, but they are not sport; and the same may be said of a bagged fox. To further illustrate my meaning, I should say it is sport to hunt the rat with terriers on his own ground, but to first catch that animal and then turn him out before dogs is not sport. Shooting pigeons from a trap is certainly not sport, but it is a very nice point where the line should be drawn in shooting pheasants that only the evening before have fed from the keeper's hand. Of course it is only the feeling and the idea, but if once a man shoots for any other reason than the love of sport, he loses more than half the pleasure, and is no longer a sportsman. A little competition certainly enhances the pleasure of all sport, but too much may destroy the real thing altogether. They who hunt solely for the pleasure of a ride should devote themselves to drag-hunting, and they who shoot to exhibit their skill should find as much satisfaction in shooting pigeons as any wild game.

Mr. Paget's practical point of view is no less marked in dealing with the farmer problem:—

> I have heard it said [he writes] that the farmer ought to encourage hunting because of the money it brings into the country. . . . The money thus spent may eventually help the sale of some product that a farmer grows; but it is only one in twenty that feels the direct benefit, and the other nineteen may very likely see their farms more ridden over than the lucky one. What advantage is it to Giles who has a grass-farm across which hounds run every week if his neighbour sells oats to a hunting man?

In a note on this subject, the Editors of the "Haddon Hall" Series, the Marquis of Granby and Mr. George A. B. Dewar, state that "the damage done to both farmers' stock and crops by thoughtless persons is often considerable," and Mr. Paget thinks that, among other things, "what the farmer wants is that all forage used in hunting stables should be grown in the neighbourhood, and not imported from other countries." But it is difficult to see how that plan could "work out" in the event of farmers demanding a higher price for their forage than the current market price for the same quality of "foreign stuff."

On introducing us to the hunting field itself the author has much to say on the etiquette of the field which young huntsmen would be wise in consulting. Coming to the actual working of the hounds, and the tactics of foxes, he says:—

> I am quite certain every fox has a different scent, just as every human being has, hence the power of a keen-nosed dog to trace its master even though his "scent" may have been crossed hundreds of times. In the case of the fox the importance of bearing that fact in mind comes out in the chase. . . . I have endeavoured to prove that the hound possesses the power of distinguishing one scent from the other, and our task is to instil it into him that by noting this distinction and adhering to one line he is most likely to catch his fox.

The duties of an M.F.H. are well explained. It is no great exaggeration to say that "to be perfect" he "must embody all the virtues of a saint with the commanding genius of a Kitchener and the tact of a diplomatist." But we are not so inclined to agree with Mr. Paget in the statement that there are no good portraits of dogs in existence. "Until," he writes, "there is a breeder and lover of the animal who is a skilled workman with the brush, we can never hope to see a hound painted with life and symmetry." Certainly no good photograph of a hound has ever yet been seen, but surely the late Rosa Bonheur's figures of hounds are perfect, Mr. J. Noble's "Otter-Hounds at Rest," nearly so, and Mr. Arthur Wardle's illustrations to Lee's "Modern Dogs" beautiful and accurate in every detail, in general form and natural expression.

No book on hunting is complete without a good story or two, and here is one worth quoting about a fox "playing possum" (shamming death) which, as it is short, may be reproduced:—

> I put the terrier in the earth, and a few seconds later a beautiful fox was noosed by the huntsman's whip, but as there was still another inside, we decided to catch both and sacrifice the worst. I therefore held the first fox whilst the second was being captured. Before the second had bolted into the deftly handled noose, the one I was holding had apparently died from strangulation by my whip. I was very much concerned at having, as I thought, killed a fox, and loosing the whip, held him up by the back of the neck. The eyes were closed, the jaws gaped, and the body hung limply down from my hand; every appearance of death was there. I laid him down on the ground, as I thought, a corpse, but the instant I let go of his neck he jumped up and dashed off into the covert. There was no doubt about it being a case of shamming death, and the only question is had he reasoned with himself that this might prove a means of escaping.

HISTORIES OF PHILOSOPHY.

Ancient.

Of histories of philosophy there is no end, but the merits of Professor Windelband's "Geschichte der Alten Philosophie," forming part of the series of Müller's well-known work "Handbuch der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft," have long since been recognized by all competent scholars and his history acknowledged as a standard book on the subject. Dr. Cushman therefore deserves the thanks of those who are unable to peruse the original for his translation, THE HISTORY OF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d. n.). He may be congratulated, on the whole, on the manner in which he has acquitted himself of a difficult task. He has also made some additions, especially in the English department, to the fairly exhaustive bibliography which was appended to the German edition. Dr. Windelband's method of expounding philosophical systems, as part and parcel of the general movement of the age to which they belong and not as isolated phenomena, like Topsy, mysteriously sprung into existence, has always commended itself to us. We admit that a history of philosophy as a process of intellectual evolution in its genesis, relationship to each preceding and succeeding stage, and gradual development, has its raison d'être. But its interest would be purely theoretic and academic, and, after all, philosophy, unless we confine the term to metaphysics and its pursuit to a select esoteric circle, is wisdom with some practical meaning in it.

There are two or three other features which distinguish Dr. Windelband's work from other books of the kind. In the first place he separates Pythagoras from the Pythagoreans, discussing the latter under "Efforts towards reconciliation between Heracleitanism and the theory of Parmenides." The distinction between the founder of Pythagoreanism and his school is a familiar one to all students of philosophy. Röethe, for instance, in his "History of Western Philosophy," differentiates the master and his genuine disciples, whom he christens as "Pythagories," from his spurious followers, whose teaching, made known through Philolaus, so greatly influenced the Platonic philosophy, and was such an important factor in the philosophical eclecticism of Alexandria at the eve of the Christian era. Of Pythagoras himself little or nothing is known. A political reactionary, as opposed to the extreme democratic spirit of his day, and a religious mystic, he was above all a moralist in whose eyes philosophy was in the first place a rule of life and not a speculative system. That he was the founder of the mathematical school and himself a highly distinguished mathematician, although the doctrine that "numbers are the principles of all things" did not in all probability emanate from him, may be readily admitted. The secret of the school appears to have been sold as a pot-boiler:—"Quum quidam Pythagoras opum suarum jacturam fecisset, concessum fuisse homini propter hoc infortunium, ut a Geometria quaestum faceret." Professor Windelband's contention that the Pythagorean number theory was dictated by a desire to mediate between the Eleatic doctrine of being and "the perpetual flux and reflux" of Heraclitus is very ingenious but cannot be historically substantiated. In truth, Pythagoreanism, which, as has been shown, partakes of the nature of a transition from physiology to metaphysics, occupies a lower platform than the system which combined the one and the many in the higher unity of "Becoming."

Another of Dr. Windelband's innovations for which a good deal more may be said is his juxtaposition of Democritus and Plato. M. Brochard in an interesting essay on "Protagoras et Démocrite," written as far back as 1889, in which he maintained that the philosophy of Democritus marked an advance on that of Protagoras inasmuch as the latter's theory of relativity made any knowledge impossible, had already pointed out certain analogies between the laughing Abderite and the sombre and severe Plato. "Tous deux en effet ont poursuivi le même but : maintenir contre la critique négative du sophiste les droits de la science. Dans cette œuvre commune ils ont dû nécessairement se rencontrer en bien des points . . . les deux philosophies sont la protestation du dogmatisme idéaliste ou matérialiste contre le relativisme réaliste de Protagoras." It is true that Plato never makes the slightest allusion in his writings to Democritus. The author, dismissing the suggestion of philosophical antipathy or literary jealousy, attributes the omission to the probability that "Atomism" was not fashionable among the Athenian thinkers at the period, but considers it extremely doubtful that Plato was unacquainted with the works of Democritus. The reason for Plato's silence must of course remain a matter for conjecture ; the interesting point more or less successfully established by Dr. Windelband is that notwithstanding the violent differences between the two systems there are great similarities.

Another deviation from the ordinary presentation is the treatment of the Hellenic-Roman philosophy as "a progressive application, first ethical and then religious, of science." Philosophy loses gradually its speculative character, or rather its speculations are made subservient to moral and religious exigencies. We have not space to follow Dr. Windelband any further, but we have said enough to show the extreme interest and value of the work before us.

Modern.

In A History of Modern Philosophy (Macmillan, 30s. n.) Dr. Harald Höffding, Professor at the University of Copenhagen, whose "Psykologi i Omrids," translated by Mary E. Lowndes, was highly commended at the time, has now laid the English public under a further debt of obligation by affording it the welcome opportunity of making the acquaintance of his "Den Nyere Filosofis Historie." The author claims for his book two distinguishing features, as differentiating it from other works of the kind. Holding with Fichte's saying, "Tell me what a man's character is and I will tell you the kind of philosophy which he will adopt," he is of opinion that in the study of a given philosophical system the personality of its expounder is a factor by no means to be overlooked. He accordingly prefaces his account of the several philosophical theories with a biographical notice and characterization of their respective authors. The second requisite which he considers indispensable to the thorough understanding of a particular body of doctrines is a knowledge of the intellectual environment in which it originated. "The history of philosophy," he justly remarks, "forms a part of the general history of culture." He has therefore devoted some space to the consideration of the intellectual atmosphere of successive periods and their influence on speculative thought. The chief fault of these extremely able volumes is a certain want of definiteness, arising no doubt partly from the vastness of the subject, but also from a somewhat irritating tendency to verbosity. An illustration is furnished by the introductory remarks to Descartes, the father of modern metaphysics. Descartes, although bitterly opposed to the Church and the pretensions of theology to override science, was imbued with the spirit of scholasticism, and his speculations were influenced by the mechanical theory of the world current in his day. Dr. Höffding takes two-and-a-half pages to state so obvious a fact. As an instance of a lack of perspicuity, take the author's exposition of the Cartesian doctrine of innate ideas. The reader would never gather from the account given that Descartes held distinctly that the mind had certain ideas,—such as the idea of God, of a triangle, and of all those ideas which represent to us immutable and eternal essences, antecedent to experience. Elsewhere in the sketch of Locke's philosophy, his theory of the universality and necessity of certain ideas or of the relativity of our knowledge is not clearly brought out. To give one more instance. In discussing Herbert Spencer's test of truth we read :—"The validity of our knowledge is not absolutely guaranteed by the fact that its fundamental assumptions are the result of the experience of countless generations." Spencer's criterion is the impossibility for the Individual to conceive otherwise, owing to uniform experience. A very inadequate account, too, is given of Spencer's ethics. But, despite its blemishes, the book is a perfect storehouse of information, accurate on the whole.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

A Boer Pro-Briton.

Mr. C. H. Thomas, the author of Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.), is a burgher of the Free State who, though of Swiss origin, has spent forty years in South Africa. His book is written to prove that the Boers have been in the wrong throughout their quarrel with us. It does not really tell us much that we did not know before ; but that would have been difficult, seeing that the subject has already been thoroughly threshed out by many writers. The important thing is that here is a writer who knows the facts, and is free from Imperialistic bias, endorsing all the gravest charges in Mr. Fitzpatrick's indictment. He quotes facts to show that Boer officialdom is a hotbed of corruption—e.g.,

> On one occasion a rather highly-placed official obtained a contract for repairing certain streets in Pretoria for £60,000. The work being worth £20,000 at most, the difference went to be shared by the several official participants.

Mr. Thomas demonstrates the reality of the Uitlander grievances. He exposes the machinations of the Afrikander Bond ; and he expresses the belief that Mr. Chamberlain did his best to avert a war. At the same time he argues that Boers are worthy of our respect for other reasons than their prowess in the field, holding that the Hollander element has been the cause of all the mischief. His conclusion is—

> That Hollander element comprises the most insidious menace, and, like a cancer, must be unsparingly excised from South Africa, unless encouragement is intended to be given for an attempt to go one better next time, with a repetition, or rather an aggravation, of the horrors of war and the cost in life and treasure. . . . As to the Dutch language, it will not entail any excessive hardship if it is equally banished as an official language, seeing that English is, on the whole, not more unfamiliar to the bulk of the Boer people than pure High Dutch is, and seeing that the dual right accorded to Dutch as an official language in the Cape Colonies implies that High Dutch had yet to be learnt there, but had been intended to be used for Bond objects, and as an instrument for sedition and conspiracy.

Though written in quaint and rather tangled English, Mr. Thomas' book is a notable contribution to the literature of the South African controversy.

The Epic.

In A History of Epic Poetry (Post-Virgilian) (Oliver and Boyd, 5s.) Mr. John Clark has a great opportunity in dealing with a literary question which has been unduly neglected, and he realizes the scope of his task. We wish we could add that he had fully carried out his conception of it, but, unfortunately, in two respects he does not succeed. His taste is good, as we gladly admit, in awarding praise or blame to the various poets whom he passes under review. He is judicious, free from exaggeration, and has an eye for essentials. But his definitions lack crispness and completeness, and his own style is affected and rough. To define the epic as "a tale of dignity about individuals" hardly meets the case; it does not insist on unity of theme, on rapidity of action, or on beauty in the embellishments. In his manner, again, there is a great deal of hollow rhetoric, which perhaps he has caught from the later Latin epic. There is also a general striving after effect, as in his words of Aeneas:—"He was not a mere religious missioner, and colporteur of his ancestral penates. . . . He is not a poor little Trojan mouse with a mission." In a word, the style is ugly, and this is most unfortunate in a critic of style.

But when all is said, Mr. Clark's book is distinctly interesting. The Introduction, which sketches the rise of the epic, and describes briefly the ancient poems of that kind, is indeed a trifle inconclusive; but the body of the work deals with writers who are not often studied critically, but are used in scholastic work chiefly for "unseens." Plots and characters are discussed, and typical passages given, all being translated. Mr. Clark can point a contrast well. Thus of Apollonius Rhodius he says:—

> Jason's prowess, if in part a natural ferment, is also the calm and calculating virtue that is shown by a heart fortified by a belief in the offensive science adopted, in this case, that of witchcraft. Beowulf, though a moody man, fights the fire-drake without prearrangements or safeguarding.

The charm of Virgil he finds to be a "thoughtful not a sensuous one." About Milton he says a new thing, and a true thing:—

> When one reads him aloud, and stops at the pausing places, what is a common experience? Why, the music continues; it sings on in the ears, it undulates harmoniously in the air, and dies away in a euthanasy of sound.

When he comes to the lesser lights of the epic, Latin, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, he is quick to seize on an excellence, and to illustrate it by examples. He is especially happy on Lucan, whose intellectual strength he recognizes while admitting that he assayed an impossible task. Here and there a sentence is illuminating. Of Morris' Jason, for example, he says:—"One breathes the very air of romance, and to me its languorous verse sounds like the very dirge of the old epic manner." In short, in spite of the faults to which we have alluded, there is a great deal in Mr. Clark's book that is worth bearing in mind.

Three Little Englanders.

LIBERALISM AND THE EMPIRE (Brimley Johnson, 3s. 6d.) consists of three political essays by Mr. Francis W. Hirst, Mr. Gilbert Murray, and Mr. J. L. Hammond. The essayists give us the impression of being clever young men fresh from the University; perhaps they belong to the "intellectuals," as they have been called, of the Palmerston Club. At all events they bring a knowledge of Greek and Roman history to bear upon the facts which they gather from newspapers and Blue-books, and write in a style which will seem very convincing to those who are already convinced. Sometimes they actually prove things. Mr. Hirst, for example, who writes of "Imperialism and Finance," proves beyond the possibility of contradiction that a large army costs more than a small one, and that our military expenditure has considerably increased during the last fifty years. He also locates the responsibility for the various additions to the military and naval budgets. Mr. Hirst's mistake is in thinking that, when he has proved this, he has also proved that it would be better for the country to run its army and navy on the cheap. Surely, if history teaches anything at all, it teaches that starving armaments is false economy—at all events when the alternative of keeping them strong enough to smash possible enemies is feasible. Nor is it quite accurate to say that the increased armaments of Great Britain have "forced the pace" on the Continent. It would be just as true to say that the Continent "forced the pace" by introducing compulsory military service, or that France "forced the pace" by allying herself with Russia and making it desirable that we should be prepared to meet the French and Russian fleets in combination. However, though we do not agree with what Mr. Hirst says, we admit that he says it well. His essay is the best of the three. Mr. Murray's essay on the exploitation of inferior races is too academic to be very profitable, and there are a good many generalisations in it that will not stand analysis. "Enslaved people," says Mr. Murray, for example, "very largely tend to despair and die." On the contrary the savage peoples that die out in the presence of a higher civilization are just the peoples that are not enslaved—the Maories, the Eskimoes, and the Red Indians, for instance. The others generally increase and multiply to the point of presenting politicians with rather a hard nut to crack—as witness the "'black peril" question in the United States, and the rapid increase of the Bantu race in South Africa. Mr. Hammond's paper on "Colonial and Foreign Policy" is a violent attack on Mr. Chamberlain, who seems to be the incarnation of everything that is objectionable to Mr. Hammond.

Dr. Japp's Doxy.

We close SOME HERESIES DEALT WITH, by Dr. Alexander H. Japp (Burleigh, 6s.), with a feeling of regret that a book showing so much ability and honesty of purpose should be so little calculated to enhance the writer's reputation. The "heresies" here denounced by Dr. Japp are the published opinions of such writers as Mr. Andrew Lang, Dr. Westermarck, Sir Henry Maine, Lord Avebury, Mr. Goldwin Smith, Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. Addis, editor of the chronolype Hexateuch, Mr. Flinders Petrie, Mr. Rhys Davids, Miss Mary Kingsley, and Professors Rhys and Margoliouth on certain very disputable points of ethnology and history. It would be easy to fill several volumes on this "omnibus" principle with attacks on questionable opinions put forth by eminent writers. It would be difficult to crowd into one such volume more blunders in taste, judgment, and elementary scholarship than Dr. Japp has contrived to do in this. Dr. Japp appears to be a Scotchman. Few of his compatriots, we venture to say, would be guilty of such stuff as the following:—

> But to put things square about a confirmed and ignorant and shameful confusion as regards Jahvé and Elohim was not a small matter, but radical so far as a large section of Mr. Grant Allen's book went. But Mr. Lang there knew no more than his author. Author and critic were alike in their nescience there, which just shows the depths to which learning and science have fallen in England; Arcades ambo they of English ignorance, conceit, pretence, and the self-assertion to which literary men can show themselves capable in thus vying, vying outright, with the politicians and the "statesmen"—so they all hang together great men and great thinkers in England; but—nowhere else.

Surely Mr. Lang is a Scotchman, though we believe him to have been educated in England. We dare say that Dr. Japp is right, and Mr. Lang wrong, on the question whether the Israelites did or did not at one time burn their children as offerings to their deity or deities. Yet even Mr. Lang has his merits. He does at all events write tolerable English and put the proper accents on his Greek. Dr. Japp, for the most part, prudently leaves his Greek unaccented, and in the rare cases where he inserts accents the result makes us stare. His Hebrew, which he parades wherever he has a chance, makes us both stare and gasp. We have some doubts whether he could write out and point correctly the first dozen verses of Genesis. Yet he presumes to lecture not merely Mr. Andrew Lang, but Canon Driver and Professor Margoliouth, on the origin and meaning of the name Yahweh. He is evidently unaware that scholars are practically agreed that it is a simple derivative from the verb formed by the three last of its four letters. The only question is whether it is a Hiphil or a Qal form—the meaning in the one case being "the Creator," in the other "the Eternal One."

The Truth about Baronets.

A considerable portion of A History of the Baronetage, by Francis W. Pixley (Duckworth, 10s. 6d. n.), is taken up with patents. One patent alone occupies thirty-one pages of small print in the Latin language, and probably could not be translated, even with the help of a dictionary, by some of the baronets of the present day. Other pages are devoted to reports of the indignation meetings which baronets hold from time to time to protest against infringements of their privileges, and to correspondence on the vexed question whether the eldest sons of certain baronets are or are not entitled to receive the honour of knighthood without performing feats of arms, or changing their politics, or subscribing to the party funds. Mr. Pixley is of opinion that the man who desires a baronetcy desires a good thing; and he indignantly repudiates the "most absurd contention" that "Baronetcies were indiscriminately sold to any one willing to provide funds for the Royal founder's pecuniary necessities." They could not have them without qualifications somewhat similar to those formerly required of Fellows of All Souls—bene natus, &c. It is admitted, however, that "pressure was undoubtedly put upon gentlemen of position" to accept an honour for which they would have to pay into the Exchequer the sum of £1,095 in addition to the charges of passing the patent—a fact which seems to indicate that the original baronets were less dazzled by the dignity of the degree than Mr. Pixley is.

After Mr. Lecky.

Mr. John Patrick Gannon attempts, in A Review of Irish History, in Relation to the Social Development of Ireland (Unwin, 6s.), to "explain historically some of the difficulties suggested by the present state of Ireland." The book is a commentary, or a sort of "leading article" in 282 pages, on the history of Ireland from the earliest epoch to the end of the nineteenth century. Not a single date is mentioned. Each century of the long roll covered by the book is indicated as events unfold themselves; but for details one must refer elsewhere. In his preface the author acknowledges his indebtedness for the facts of modern Irish history to Mr. Lecky. Mr. Gannon owes more than that to Mr. Lecky, who is the model of his style, and inspires many of his conclusions. Mr. Gannon thinks that Ireland would have had a happier fate had she fallen under the domination of a Latin, and particularly a Celto-Latin nation, like France. But he advises his countrymen to "bow to accomplished facts." "Obviously it is the interest of the Irish people to cordially embrace English civilization, while retaining a healthy Irish spirit, and softening with the light Celtic touch the harsher outlines of English life." Mr. Gannon, following in the footsteps of his great exemplar, Mr. Lecky, delivers his opinions with the cold neutrality and something of the dogmatism of the impartial judge. But those who desire a rapid and on the whole a sound estimate of the historical causes which have made the Ireland of to-day what it is will find it in this brightly-written work.

FICTION.

Certain Circulation.

Their own particular public awaits the books of many a novelist, and nothing that the critics may say will check their rapidly moving fingers. Among those who "having writ" move on to the immediate production of another long book is Mr. S. R. Crockett, who, in the few years in which he has bound to him an enormous following, has produced close on a score of books. "Joan of the Sword Hand" was with us yesterday, to-day comes Little Anna Mark (Smith, Elder, 6s.). Like the books that have gone before it is, in its way, a thoroughly satisfactory piece of work. A vigour informs the narrative, there is a picturesque feeling running through it, and there is, above all, a sense of what the public wants. If it be granted that the skilful use of the cliché is the last word of the novelist's art, then Mr. Crockett will shine among the most brilliant of his fellow writers of "historical romance," for he is a master in the sublimation of the commonplace.

Mrs. J. H. Riddell's public also await her books. It would, perhaps, be indiscreet to ask how long has this lady been a popular author, but, whatever the time, she approaches the agreeable task of writing her thirty-third novel with wonderful freshness and avidity. The Football of Fate (White, 6s.), if a little old-fashioned, is a sound, well-made story on conventional lines, such a novel as one has some right to expect from the capable pen of the author of "George Geith of Fen Court."

Miss Rosa N. Carey has a considerable reputation, we understand, as a writer of what are called "wholesome romances." Life's Trivial Round (Hutchinson, 6s.) should add to this celebrity, for it is a simple piece of work, incisive, clear, and faintly entertaining, which tells, from a housekeeper's point of view, of a few of the more superficial loves and trials of life. Those who dread the psychologist in fiction may turn to Miss Carey for refreshment or a sedative.

Possible Circulation.

Experience in novel writing should bring cunning to the hand of the writer, but Vanity's Price (White, 6s.) goes to prove that a lady who has written several novels can still present us with a striking example of commonplace, amateurish, ill-considered work. Miss E. Yolland's history of Clare Almlie is dulness long drawn out, her method of presenting the story is quite unskilful. The idea of a lady of fortune with a hatred of old age and a determination to avoid association with it might have been agreeably developed, but the point is wasted. "'Tis an old maxim in the schools, that vanity is the food of fools," quotes Miss Yolland, and perhaps after all she has provided pabulum for the majority.

The exact "placing" of Mr. Francis H. Hardy's new book To the Healing of the Sea (Smith, Elder, 6s.) is rather difficult. Although cleverly written, the strange happenings which befall Carroll Livingston, the soulful adventures and the material sensations of a gambling stockbroker, are not wholly convincing. "To the Healing of the Sea" has a made-up air unknown to the most successful forms of fiction. But the author works with a will, and his book, if not a work of art, should at least be found interesting.

One of Many, by Vera Macha (Digby, Long, 6s.), has the distinction of being the most amateurish novel we have read for many a long day. This is how Ester Armytage, who writes her autobiography and draws the picture of her own virtues, addresses her guardian who asks why she should leave his house to go and be a governess—"Oh, spare me, father! Don't make the wrench more terrible. God alone knows fully how great the trial is to tear myself away from such loving, faithful friends; but duty sternly beckons, and I cannot, must not, turn away my gaze. I must answer to the call." The call was not in the least imperative, but Ester always puts things that way. "One of Many," if taken with sauce of satiric humour, may be made amusing.

It is some years since "Lady Audley's Secret" set a fashion in melodramatic fiction, but there are echoes of it yet. The Beautiful Mrs. Leach (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) has some far off sounds of that old music, but the style is not the style of Miss Braddon. Thus of the heroine—"Cristina's was a face to dream of—to glorify, if possible, on canvas, from the chin, sweetly rounded, to the brow crowned by waves of golden hair." We don't quite know what it means, but we are certain Miss Winifred Graham, the author, feels that she is helping us to realize this lady who is capable of "damnable villainies" and comes to an honest Adelphi bad end. Those who like weak melodrama in a novel should read "The Beautiful Mrs. Leach"; we think it would cure them.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The public library may be said to have reached its jubilee. The first Public Libraries Act was passed on July 30, just fifty years ago, and the progress of the libraries since is, on the whole, a matter for congratulation. At first no great advantage was taken of the powers conferred by Parliament. A few Lancashire and Midland towns established libraries, but in the rest of England the Act remained practically a dead letter for years. In London, only one public library existed—the Westminster Library, started in 1852. But, since 1880 the public have awakened to their opportunities, and in 1899 there were something like 187 libraries at work. In the past decade this number has increased by 150. The metropolis is still the most inert of all municipalities.

In proportion to its population Wales has the largest number of libraries. The mining and manufacturing districts in both England and Wales are considerably ahead of the agricultural areas. Scotland and Ireland are backward, but in Scotland the large sparsely-populated districts militate greatly against the establishment of libraries, and in Ireland the partial nature of the existing Acts proves as little inducement to the rural districts as did the halfpenny rate in England during the few years it was in force.

The twenty-first anniversary of the Wigan Public Library was an appropriate day for conferring the freedom of the county borough of Wigan on the Earl of Crawford, who is chairman of the library and has enriched it with many gifts of rare books. The borough have done well to recognize Lord Crawford's many services not only to the nation, in the encouragement of astronomical science, but also to their own locality, with which the Lindsays have long been closely connected. Mention was, of course, made of Lord Crawford's bibliographical work and of his own library, perhaps the finest private collection now in existence. The library, which is so well cared for by the present earl, was begun by his grandfather and largely increased by his father. In an interesting speech Lord Crawford spoke of the long-standing interest of his family in libraries. One of his ancestors, 300 years ago, had built up what was, for those days, a great collection of books and the most important library in the North of Scotland. This unfortunately became dispersed when the family fortunes suffered in those turbulent times.

The Guildhall Library has had some good fortune during the past year. A collection of books relating to Sir Thomas More, formed by the late Mr. Cock, Q.C., has been presented by Lord Justice Collins and others. The late Dr. Willshire bequeathed his very complete and valuable collection of early prints, playing cards, and books illustrating the history of engraving, and it is proposed to exhibit some of the examples. A collection of Cruickshankiana and a library of dramatic literature are other valuable accessions. The museum has been equally favoured. In contrast to the majority of library reports, that of the Guildhall records a substantial increase in the attendances of readers.

Her Majesty's Stationery Office has decided to make further grants of Government records and publications to the public libraries and learned societies. The list includes most of the volumes of the Rolls series and the Calendars of State Papers. It is to be hoped that the fate of these publications will not be to repose unseen in out-of-the-way corners on dusty shelves. Having received the books could not our libraries make some effort, in the shape of indexes and annotated hand lists, that would better advertise their possession of these works?

A Bill has been introduced in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales to incorporate the National Art Gallery and Public Library at Sydney under one body of trustees, and provide for the management with an annual endowment of £1,000. This step is rendered necessary to carry out conditions laid down by Mr. D. S. Mitchell, who has already presented some 10,000 volumes, and has declared his intention of ultimately handing over the whole of his library. It is a collection of Australasian books of remarkable completeness and world-wide renown.

The first report of the Acton Public Library is for the most part devoted to the history of the movement which resulted in the opening of the building on January 3 of this year. The figures in this report show that the library already enjoys a considerable popularity which will doubtless spread as the institution and the books it contains become better known. The library has been declared exempt from the payment of local rates.

"LA VIE EST VAINE."

La vie est vaine—
Un peu d'amour,
Un peu de haine,
Et puis—bonjour.

La vie est brève—
Un peu d'espoir,
Un peu de rêve,
Et puis—bonsoir.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I send you, on the chance of your caring to make use of them, two versions of Montenalken's lyric, of which you published some translations in your last number. These are selected from a dozen (which in turn were selected from nearly 500) that appeared in the Journal of Education, March, 1900:—

Life's fruitless way!
A little mating,
A little hating,
And then—good-day.

Life's brief delight!
A little hoping,
A little moping,
And then—good-night.

To the second I may now "own up":—

Our life's a stage;
A while we play
At love and rage,
And then—good-day!

Our life's a gleam,
A swallow flight;
We hope, we dream,
And then—good-night!

It is, as you say, an insoluble problem, and it is easier to point out where your correspondent fails—by giving up the antithesis of love, hate, and by substituting "grief" for "hope"—than to "cap" him.

I believe I was the first to call Mr. Du Maurier's attention to the lines which so exactly express his philosophy of life, and I remember well his repeating to me at the Athenæum the free paraphrase which afterwards appeared as the epilogue to "Trilby," a paraphrase which like Dryden's Horatian Ode betters any translation.

Yours faithfully,
Aug. 12. F. STORR.

Sir,—I venture to send you another translation of the French verses of which you publish translations in last week's Literature, which, if less graceful than those you give, is, perhaps, somewhat closer to the original.

This life is vain:
Love's fleeting sway,
Hate's passing pain,
And then—good-day.

This life is brief:
Hope's short delight,
A dream's relief,
And then—good-night.

Faithfully yours,
MARY GRACE WALKER.
3, Hammersmith-terrace, London, W. Aug. 13, 1900.

Sir,—May I offer a version of "La vie est vaine"?

Our life is vain,
We love, we fight,
Make up again,
And then—good-night.

Our life is short,
Brief hopes flit by,
Brief dreams, brief sport,
And then—good-bye.

Yours truly,
J. D. ANDERSON.
17, Blakesley-avenue, Ealing, W., August 11.

We have also received two more versions.

How vain is life!
Love's little ray—
A little strife—
And then—good-day.

How life fleets by!
A little light—
A little sigh—
And then—good-night.

C. E. M.

All life is vain:
The old, old lay
Of love and pain—
And then—good-day.

All life is brief:
A dreamy view
Of hope and grief—
And then—adieu.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Daily Chronicle states this week that "if Mr. Chamberlain consulted the publishers they would beg him not to insist on a general election this autumn." No doubt this is true to a certain extent; but a general election is a necessary evil, and there are publishers, we know, who think that the sooner it is over and done with the better. The cloud which has hung over the book trade for the past twelve months seems likely to remain during the autumn; the elections, it is thought, could not make matters much worse; and it would be a great relief to start a new year with a fair course ahead.

There has been, as we said last week, some talk of the half-crown novel taking the place of the six-shilling novel. But should this idea lead to anything, it will probably be some time before it would take practical shape in the majority of publishing firms. Certainly there is no sign of an impending change in the autumn arrangements already made known, though it has been hinted that Mr. Murray's new half-crown series is intended as a step in the new direction. We can state authoritatively, however, that this is far from being the case. Mr. Murray, as the Publishers' Circular remarked last week, does not pretend to give a six-shilling article for two-and-six. The novel of orthodox length he publishes at the orthodox figure, and his list proves that he is making a feature of the six-shilling story. The demand for Miss Marie Corelli's new six-shilling romance "The Master Christian," which has compelled Messrs. Methuen to print 100,000 copies before publication—the book is to appear on the 29th inst.—shows that if the public wants a book it is prepared to pay the regular price.

Messrs. Hutchinson also have arranged to publish nearly thirty new six-shilling novels during the autumn by well-known authors. The list includes books by Mr. Richard Whiteing, Madame Sarah Grand, Mr. J. A. Steuart, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mr. Joseph Hatton, Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne, Miss Arabella Kenealy, Mr. B. L. Farjeon, Mrs. Hugh Fraser, Mr. J. S. Fletcher, Mr. Tom Gallon, the late Mrs. Lynn Linton, Mr. William Le Queux, Mr. Carlton Dawe, Miss Adeline Serjeant, and Mr. Richard Pryce.

We understand that the first serial novel to appear in Mr. Murray's Monthly Magazine will be a new work by Mr. Anthony Hope, entitled "Tristram of Blent." The motif is that a man may mar his life by doing one great wrong and yet be a very worthy fellow at heart. The story will run through twelve numbers of the review, appearing in volume form in the autumn of next year.

Sir Walter Armstrong's life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, which Mr. Heinemann has in preparation, is the most sumptuous art volume yet announced for the autumn. It will be uniform with Sir Walter Armstrong's "Gainsborough." The seventy photogravures and six lithographs in colour illustrate the development of the painter and are reproductions, where possible, of the less known and less readily accessible examples of his art. The excuse for a new life of Reynolds is that the century and more which has elapsed since his death has allowed a "more final" judgment to be formed, both of the man and his art, than was possible when Leslie wrote, or even when Taylor prepared Leslie's work for the press.

Mrs. Ady's new work on "The Painters of Florence," which we have already announced as coming from Mr. John Murray, will, we understand, differ in character from Mr. Berenson's well-known "Florentine Painters," and other books of a similar kind. It is not in the nature of critical essays, but consists of biographical sketches of these masters. It embodies the results of the researches in the Florentine Archives which have been undertaken with so much success during the last twenty or thirty years, by the late Signor Milanesi and other German and Italian writers. No Lives of Florentine Masters have appeared in English since Mrs. Jameson published her "Memoirs of Early Italian Painters." Mrs. Ady's book will be fully illustrated with reproductions of frescoes and pictures in Florence which have been carefully selected so as to give an idea of each master's style and characteristics, and of the progressive development of Renaissance art.

Mr. Swinburne is stated to be making good progress with the revision and grouping of his verse for the collected edition which will probably appear next year in six or more volumes. He has also written a dedicatory poem for a second edition of "Rosamund," which Messrs. Chatto and Windus are to publish in the autumn.

Another attractive item which Messrs. Chatto and Windus are preparing for the autumn is a volume of recollections by Herman Charles Merivale, entitled "Bar, Stage, and Recollections." The same publishers now have in the press Volumes III. and IV. of the "History of the Four Georges," by Justin McCarthy, M.P., and Justin Huntly McCarthy, completing the work; and, as already announced, they are preparing a new edition of Volume V. of "A History of Our Own Times," uniform with the first four volumes of the Cabinet Edition and bringing the narrative from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. Among other books included in their programme are another volume on Old London, by Mr. C. W. Heckethorn, entitled "London Memories: Social, Historical, and Typographical," and a new edition of Pierce Egan's once popular "Tom and Jerry: Life in London," with an introduction by John Camden Hotten. Sir Walter Besant's book on "East London," uniform with his "South London" volume, will not be ready before the spring. A portion of it has been appearing in Scribner's.

In fiction Messrs. Chatto will start the season on September 6th with Sir Walter Besant's "The Fourth Generation," to be followed a week later by Mark Twain's new volume, "The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg" and other stories and sketches. On September 20th they will publish "Philip Winwood," a novel on the War of Independence by an American author, Mr. Robert Neilson Stephens, embracing events which occurred in New York and London during the years 1763 and 1786. Mr. Ernest A. Vizetelly's edition of Zola's "Conquest of Plassans" (based upon the old translation) will also be issued early in September. The remaining items in Messrs. Chatto's new list of novels include "As Luck Would Have It," by W. Westall; "The Second Adam," by M. P. Shiel; "The Blue Diamond," by L. T. Meade; "The Bag of Diamonds," a volume of four stories by F. Manville Fenn; "The Strange Adventures of Mr. Verschoyle," by W. T. Speight (the Gentleman's Annual for 1900); and "A Missing Hero," by Mrs. Alexander. Messrs. Chatto, by the way, have taken over three more of Mrs. Alexander's works from Messrs. F. V. White—"A Fight with Fate," "Mrs. Crichton's Creditor," and "Barbara, Lady's Maid and Peeress"—and are bringing them out in three-and-sixpenny editions.

The end of the autumn season will see the first volume of the translation of the Memoirs of Chateaubriand, which Mr. Freemantle has in preparation. It is somewhat surprising that the publication of a complete translation of the eloquent autobiography which Chateaubriand produced in his years of retirement, fifty odd years ago, should have been left to the enterprise of one of our youngest publishers. There are to be six volumes altogether, to appear quarterly. The translation is being done by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos.

Mr. Elliott Stock adds to the list of Dickensian items for the autumn which appeared in last week's Literature the announcement of "The Minor Writings of Charles Dickens," to be published in the "Book Lovers' Library," under Mr. F. G. Kitton's editorship. New information concerning the more ephemeral writings of Dickens is promised, and an appendix will be added of the numerous spurious publications which Dickens endeavoured to suppress.

The third volume of Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible" will be published by Messrs. T. and T. Clark on or about August 25. The volume extends from Kir to Pleiades.

Two of the Norse Sagas, "King Helge" and "Aslog," are to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein in dramatic form, written by Mr. F. J. Winbolt.

Mr. Heinemann has in preparation an English translation of Leroy Beaulieu's "La Renovation de l'Asie." The book will be edited and prefaced by Mr. Henry Norman.

A fourth volume of "Sixpenny Belles Lettres" will be published next week at the Sign of the Unicorn. The new book, like the three which preceded it, is the work of Mr. T. W. H. Crosland, author of "Literary Parables." It is to be called "The Finer Spirit," and will consist entirely of serious pieces.

The facsimile of "Julianna Berner's Boke," of St. Albans, published some years ago by Mr. Elliot Stock, is being reissued in a cheaper form, with the late Wm. Blades' original preface.

Mr. George Kenning, the Masonic publisher, is bringing out "Masonic Muslings," by Dr. Chas. F. Forshaw, of Bradford, containing upwards of two hundred poems having Freemasonry for their topic.

"A Spider's Web," by Mrs. Aylmer Goring, will shortly appear in Mr. Burleigh's half-a-crown series of fiction by well-known authors.

"D'Aubise: a Reminiscence," is the title of a new novel by John C. Shannon, to be published by Mr. Burleigh.

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons are publishing a book of adventures on the Broads entitled "Bunce the Bobby and the Broads," containing some 40 humorous illustrations by the author, Fritz Zorn.

DEATH OF MR. STEINITZ.—Mr. William Steinitz, the celebrated chess master, died in an asylum on Sunday last. He was born in 1836. In 1862 he came to England, and in 1866 played Anderssen a match, by winning which Steinitz became world's champion, and he maintained this position for nearly twenty-eight years. He wrote elaborately on the game, editing chess for some time in the Field. For fifteen years his home had been in the United States.

Problem No. 44, by O. Duras, Prague.—White (4 pieces), K at K R 3; Q at K R 8; B at Q 3; Kt at Q 6. Black (6 pieces), K at Q R 2; Q at Q 4; Kts at K Kt 2 and Q R 6; B at Q B 4; pawn at K B 2. White to play and draw.

THE EARLY DAYS OF CHESS.—The following is the conclusion of the notes by Mr. Branch:—Chessmen of ivory, now at the East India Museum, were found in Sind, India, in 1856, in excavating the ruins of a city destroyed by earthquake in the Eighth Century. With the chessmen were Arabic coins of about 750, also human bones, pottery, dice, carvings, &c., all deep under ground. The Arabs had, not long before the earthquake, invaded that part of India. But the chessmen and a fragment of a board are believed to be Indian. If it could be proved that the Arabs brought them there, so much the better for the argument for greater antiquity of chess, because it is certain that chess did not originate in Arabia. You will see a note on these chessmen in the August British Chess Magazine. To sum up—Chess was invented in India probably before the Sixth Century. It was brought to Eastern Europe, Italy, and Spain—possibly Spain first—I think in the Eighth Century. It was known in the South of France soon after it was well known in Italy. It was known to the Danes and Norsemen certainly in the Eleventh Century, probably in the Tenth, and possibly late in the Ninth. It is generally agreed by modern authorities that it was probably known in England about the year 1090, and I should rather be disposed to fix the date of its introduction 80 or 90 years earlier. There are references to chess in MSS. written in England soon after 1100, and we never find any mention of its being a new game, or of its having been recently brought from another country. There are earlier references to chess in the literature of Italy, Spain, and Germany, and never anything implying that the game was new.

Then, it is not likely that we have, still preserved, all the European MSS. that contained references to chess. Many works are lost; many, no doubt, that once existed have never been heard of by the moderns. There may well have been in Italy, Spain, France, &c., allusions to the game, or directions for playing it, or problems, written down earlier than the oldest reference we know of. That, in Europe, is said to be of 950. It is Latin, written probably in North Italy, and found in South Germany about 1840. Another, German-Latin, is of 1030-40. V. de Linde admitted, after he had written his first work, that chess was known in Spain early in the Ninth Century.

THE MUNICH TOURNAMENT.—This tournament is in the main concluded. A curious result was a tie of three players—Maroczy, Pillsbury, and Schlechter—for first prize, which will have to be played off, as the first prize winner takes the Prince Regent's silver trophy and 1,000 marks. Maroczy retired after one defeat by Pillsbury. Schlechter and Pillsbury then began a match of four games, of which Schlechter won the first. Scores:—

NOTES OF THE DAY.

General Cluseret, whose death is announced, was one of the generals of the Commune, and also a Fenian, and an organizer of strikes; but literature is indebted to him for a volume of memoirs, containing much interesting information, published in 1887.

* * * *

The Daily Express is responsible for the statement that the author of that charming book "Elizabeth and her German Garden," which was followed by the equally charming "Solitary Summer," is Princess Henry of Pless, who until she married in 1891 was Miss Cornwallis West. If this be a fact, the Princess is to be congratulated upon a most delightful style and upon having won the hearts of thousands of readers. A year or so ago every one who keeps up an acquaintance with current literature was talking about these fascinating records of out-door life in Pomerania. "Elizabeth" had an original vein of humour, as well as a pen skilled to transcribe the varied harmonies of nature, and she and her babies, and her husband, and her garden and her neighbours, provided material in plenty for her two volumes of desultory musings and recollections. The Princess might well paint for us other aspects of German domesticity, though now that she is known her cheerful garrulity may receive something of a check.

M. Marcel Prévost has recently been explaining his views on the novel of the twentieth century to a representative of the Temps. He notes that recent French stories are ceasing to be merely love stories, and deal with moral, political, or social questions. Witness M. Prévost's own work. Moreover, French writers are no longer afraid to imitate Englishmen, and to abandon the form of the conte which de Maupassant did so incomparably for more serious studies, with a wider range of observation. M. Prévost cites M. Paul Adam and D'Annunzio, but again he might quite as well have cited himself. He is indignant, as might be expected, against the mania, as he calls it, of certain critics to blame French novelists for their frequent histoires d'adultère. The subject "est un peu epuisé," he says:—

> A propos, ces vertueux romans anglais qu'on s'obstine à nous objecter (Adam Bede, le Vicaire de Wakefield, tant d'œuvres de Meredith) ont généralement des matières assez scabreuses en somme: une séduction de jeune fille, une lutte périlleuse entre le devoir social et la passion. . . . Pour l'instant, nos romanciers, nos psychologues délaissent l'adultère; ils ont l'esprit tourné vers ailleurs; mais rien ne prouve qu'ils ne se reprendront point un de ces jours aux sujets de ce genre, et, alors, ils n'en auront pas moins conscience d'accomplir honnêtement leur besogne de peintres des mœurs.

M. Prévost believes, however, that the next century's novel, or rather the novel of the immediate future, will be more and more social. This will not prevent the advent of a great scientific novelist. And as for the style it will be more and more what M. Prévost calls cursif. M. Anatole France, he remarks, suggestively, has really found in anticipation the form and style which are to suit the taste of the future, in his Histoire Contemporaine. On the French woman novelist, M. Prévost says:—

> Notons, en terminant, un phénomène curieux, l'entrée en scène, chez nous, des femmes romancières. Elles arrivent, innombrables, à l'instar de l'Angleterre. Il faut admirer leur labeur ingénu, leur fécondité, le goût qu'elles ont d'observer les très petites choses. Et tout sera très bien, pourvu qu'elles consentent à ne pas faire des romans d'hommes, à ne pas ruser, pourvu qu'elles se réduisent à faire gentiment des romans de femmes!

The 129th anniversary of the birth of Sir Walter Scott was not allowed to pass without notice, in Edinburgh and Glasgow at least. In accordance with a practice of recent years, the Edinburgh Sir Walter Scott Club placed a large wreath of laurel leaves, draped with Royal Stuart tartan, on the pedestal of the monument in Princes-street. In Glasgow the Scott monument was decorated with flowers and foliage, the base being festooned with wreaths of holly and other evergreens. Among those who sent flowers were Lord Rosebery, Lord Aberdeen, Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, and Dr. William Jacks. In the evening the Glasgow Male Voice Choir sang several choruses at the base of the monument, and the band of the 1st Lanarkshire Volunteer Artillery rendered several pieces of instrumental music, chiefly Scottish.

The changes which the Corporation has decided to make on its Bloomsbury estate will probably sweep away several houses which are filled with literary associations. It is proposed to do away with North and South crescents and carry Alfred-place into Tottenham-court-road at two points, and this will probably involve the demolition of the small houses at present standing in Alfred-place. It was in Alfred-place that Thomas Campbell had lodgings, a few years after resigning the editorship of Colburn's New Monthly Magazine. Now that we are waiting to see how another poet, also of a patriotic turn—Mr. Newbolt—will edit another new monthly magazine, it is not uninteresting to compare Campbell's experiences in this rôle.

* * * *

His services were engaged by Colburn in 1820 at a salary of £500. No doubt Mr. Newbolt will succeed as an editor better than poor "Procrastination Tom." He is not far from the beginning of his literary career, while Campbell was nearing the end when he edited the New Monthly and had reached the limit of his powers. "The Pleasures of Hope," "Ye Mariners of England," "The Battle of the Baltic," and the poem which Scott voted "the finest verses that have been published these fifty years"—"Hohenlinden"—had all been written a score of years or so before, and the next best period of his literary life closed in 1819, when Murray published his "Specimens of the British Poets." Yet it was during his editorship of the New Monthly that he brought about "the only important event of his life's little history"—as he was fond of putting it—the foundation of the London University. He was not a success on the New Monthly, though he managed to fill the post for ten years. "Though a great man," says Mr. Hall in his "Retrospect," "he was utterly unfit to be an editor." He was succeeded by Lord Lytton, then known only as Edward George Earle Bulwer, and a few years later he accepted the editorship of the Metropolitan Magazine, which proved a failure.

* * * *

Sheridan Knowles lived at No. 29 about the same time that Campbell had lodgings in Alfred-place. His father, James Knowles, the lexicographer, who did not begin his dictionary until he was seventy years old, and then suffering from a painful disease, died at his son's house in 1840. Later still came W. R. Sheddon Ralston, the Russian scholar, who lived in Alfred-place for some twenty years and died in North-crescent about ten years ago.

A list of "sequel stories" which is being published in instalments in the Library World shows us how ingrained is this habit of writing sequels in the novelists of all ages and all countries. Critics, it is true, are rather apt to censure them for indulging in it, but they refuse to be intimidated by the critics; and the critic, in his more human moods, must admit that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the policy. There are limits to the inventiveness of all writers, even the most imaginative. Even a Dumas cannot be continually creating new characters as striking and attractive as d'Artagnan; Dr. Conan Doyle may despair, for a period, of improving on Sherlock Holmes. But it is only natural that a novelist should wish to regard the inventions of his youth as enduring tools for the work of his later years. He is repeating himself, no doubt; but, in the other arts, it is the rule for the artist to repeat himself. Corot painted the same pictures over and over again. The same cornfields reappear year after year on the canvasses of Mr. Leader, and the same white marbles and blue skies figure in many works of Mr. Alma Tadema; and the public welcome them as old friends. Why should it be less proper, and less artistic, for the story teller to pursue the fortunes of the same personages through several volumes?

* * * *

The usual allegation is, of course, that sequels are conspicuously inferior to the stories to which they are tacked on. This is by no means invariably the case. There are those who prefer "Twenty Years After" to "The Three Musketeers." Many young readers differ from the critics in preferring the second part of "The Pilgrim's Progress" to the first. Alike in the Chronicles of Carlingford and the Chronicles of Barchester some of the later volumes will stand comparison with the earlier ones. And every reader will be able to cite similar instances of pleasing sequels from his recollections of his own reading. But even if the allegation could be sustained, it would not constitute a very grave objection to the sequel. No novelist can be always at his best; and it is just as well that he should be at his second best in relating the "further adventures" of characters in whom he has interested us, than introducing new characters whom we may not greatly care to know.

* * * *

One thing one notices in the evolution of the sequel. Originally it was more or less of an afterthought. The writer, casting about for something to write, would have a happy inspiration, and say to himself, "Suppose I invent another story about d'Artagnan"—or Christian, or Ernest Maltravers, or whoever it might be. In these days, however, fiction, like history, tends to become "scientific," and the so-called sequel is, in many cases, the premeditated development of a deliberate philosophy of life—a sequel much in the sense in which Mr. Herbert Spencer's "Principles of Ethics" is a sequel to his "Principles of Psychology." The example was set, long ago, by Balzac; imitations have recently been very numerous. In France there have been, and are, Paul and Victor Margueritte's cycle of novels on the Franco-Prussian war, M. Huysmann's cycle of novels on Roman Catholicism, and M. Marcel Prévost's cycle of novels on feminism—to say nothing of M. Zola's cycle of novels on things in general. In England there are, among others, Mr. George Moore engaged on a cycle of novels expounding his views concerning the artistic temperament, and Mr. Morley Roberts producing a cycle of novels to expound his attitude towards Imperialism and the political situation. That the experiment is equally interesting in the cases of all of the writers we do not assert. But it is a development of the practice of the art of fiction which it is interesting to note and necessary to respect.

A correspondent sends us the following Notes on some recent Finnish literature:—"The literary activity of the Finns does not appear to have been appreciably lessened either by their recent political troubles or by the severe censorship of their Press. Some of the Finnish novels and tales, however, published in 1899, have a distinct bearing on political events, and this feature is markedly noticeable in Juhani Aho's "Katajainen kansani" (My Elder-Bush Nation). This volume is a series of patriotic tales, some of them depicting the feelings aroused, first in 1891, by the direct attacks of the Russian Press on the Finnish Constitution, and lately, in February, 1899, by the issue of the Imperial Manifesto. The characters of the tales, though supposititious, may be easily indentified. Aho brought out also a fourth series of his "Lastuja" (Chips), short pieces of great descriptive merit, especially as regards the forest and its associations. Under the title "Kunnan miehiä" (Rural Politicians) Kalle Kajander published a sketch of provincial life; and "Huutolais-tyttö" (The Girl Sold by Auction), a narrative of hard times, was produced by Heikki Meriläinen. The earliest part of this last work is full of promise, but the interest is not sustained throughout. Among other writers of tales may be mentioned Aino Suonio for her "Kuloa ja kevättä" (Autumn Leaves and Spring), a set of novelettes, which, if not deep in thought, are at least clear and good in style.

* * * *

"Among writers of verse attention may be drawn to Juhana Henrik Erkko, whose "Runoelmia ja ajatelmia" (Poems and Contemplations) are full of poetic feeling. Larin Kyösti, i.e., Kyösti Larson, in his "Ajan kiäntecssä" (At the Crisis), has produced patriotic songs and ballads, of which many have already become favourites. His "Kulkurin lauluja" (A Vagabond's Songs) are a collection of lyrics, several of them composed in the style of folk-songs. Eino Leino also has published a set of patriotic odes, styled "Ajan aalloilta" (From the Billows of Time), and a dramatic poem, entitled "Tuonelan joutsen" (The Swan of Tuonela), the subject being taken from the episode of Lemminkäinen in the Kalevala. Among recent original dramatic writers we single out Jalmari Hahl for his Françoise d'Aubigné, in five acts, a play constructed on a singular subject for the Finnish stage, but not without merits as an apology for Madame de Maintenon and as a description of her times; Arvid Järnefelt for his historical play, in four acts, entitled Samuel Cröell, in which the author, a champion of Tolstoi's principles, appears in the new guise of a dramatist; Alpo Noponen, whose tragedy of Ahab, in five acts, though poetical in diction, lacks originality of thought; and Teuvo Pakkala, for his Tukkijoella (On the Log-Floating River), a popular comedy, in four acts, which vividly depicts rural life and has been often produced on the boards of Finnish theatres.

* * * *

"As examples of works of a more serious character may be mentioned Hannes Gebhard's "Maanviljelijäin yhteistoiminnasta ulkomailla" (Agricultural Co-operations Abroad), a remarkable production in the field of national economy; "Uudenaikaisen filosofian historia," the first part of a comprehensive "History of Modern Philosophy," by Arvi Grotenfelt, founded to some extent on his own investigations; "Mordvalaisten pukuja ja kuvioja" (Dresses and Ornaments of the Mordvinians), by A. O. Heikel, an admirable ethnographical work, brought out under the auspices of the Finnish-Ugrian Society, with descriptions in Finnish and German and coloured illustrations; and the "Suomen kartasto" (Atlas of Finland), published in Finnish and Swedish and in French by the Finnish Geographical Society, and containing orographical, geological, meteorological, botanical, agricultural, statistical, and many other maps of the Grand Duchy, with a volume of text in Finnish, Swedish or French."

* * * *

We are glad to hear that there is to be a new edition of Mr. Whymper's "Scrambles in the Alps," in the autumn. It is the best of all the climbing books, and it has long been out of print, with the result that copies fetch about thirty shillings in the auction room, and a good deal more in the booksellers' shops.

* * * *

There are a good many more books, however, belonging to the period when climbing was just beginning that ought to be reprinted too. We have those of Mr. Leslie Stephen, and Professors Forbes and Tyndall; we want to see announcements of Wills' "Wanderings in the High Alps," Girdlestone's "High Alps Without Guides," and King's "Italian Valleys." The last-named book is, we believe, out of copyright. Will not some publisher oblige? There are also some privately printed Alpine books that should be published—notably, A. W. Moore's "Alps in 1864," and Mr. Freshfield's "From Thonon to Trent." Both books are wanted by collectors and are practically unprocurable.

* * * *

Never, perhaps, have so many foreign works of fiction been translated into French as during the last few years. "With Edged Tools," by H. S. Merriman, is to run shortly as a serial in the Echo de Paris; "New Grub-street," by George Gissing, is also to be published in the same way in Les Débats; and "The Unclassed," by the same author, is now being translated for publication by Ollendorff.

* * * *

Mr. Gordon Craig's magazine the Page, which we noticed not long ago, has an imitator in the Tulip, a quarterly, which a little band of Oxford men, determined to be in le dernier bateau, are producing between them. The woodcuts, all by the same hand, are grotesquely ineffective. Mr. Gordon Craig's attempts in this line had some cleverness, but his imitator, like all imitators, copies merely their bad points. The rest of the magazine suffers from the same defect of amateurishness as the cuts. There is a nice little amateur song, some quite inoffensive amateur verse, and an amateur mystic fable, which suggests as much and means as little as even Mr. Arthur Symons could desire. This is the longest contribution to the Tulip, and it is announced that the writer, who veils his identity under a nom de guerre, will contribute a complete story to each number. He certainly has a faculty for picking up with some cleverness a current fashion in the minor literature of the day. But experiments of this kind are seldom sincere and never very interesting. We fear the Tulip, which by the way is published by Martin Klingender at Shortlands in Kent, is not a very hardy specimen.

Dramatized Novels

Though the intimation that one of Balzac's novels is to be dramatized for the English stage arouses hopes, it also arouses fears. Balzac's work is, in a sense, dramatic, but it is not theatrical. It abounds, that is to say, in dramatic ideas, but not in dramatic situations; and it is of situations and not of ideas that plays are made. One can imagine a dramatist taking Balzac's ideas and writing plays to illustrate them; but one feels that such plays, to be effective, would have to be something very different from dramatized versions of Balzac's novels. And to say that is not, in any way, to disparage Balzac. The art of the dramatist and the art of the novelist are two very different arts; and there is no doubt in the mind of any competent critic that, given the conditions of the contemporary stage, the art of the novelist is the higher of the two. The novelist is not trammelled by the exigencies of stage carpentry; he is not obliged to write down to the level of the most stupid man before whose notice hazard may bring his work, but may wait for the right reader to pick it up in a sympathetic mood; he need not sacrifice subtle points for fear lest they should be missed in the gallery; he has not the same temptation to be obvious, and to flatter the vulgar by reiterating hackneyed sentiments. He can criticize life with a freedom and, above all, a completeness, which the dramatist does not enjoy; and the more thoroughly and conscientiously he avails himself of his superior opportunities the less likely is it that a dramatic adaptation of his stories will do him any sort of justice or give real pleasure to the play-going public. It is true, no doubt, that many novelists of great eminence have not been satisfied with writing novels, but have hankered after the triumphs of the stage; but one imagines that it is the personal rather than the artistic triumph that allures them. It is the kind of triumph that is most flattering to the vain man's vanity; and most authors, even the gravest, have something of the actor in their composition. Even the devisers of new philosophies must sigh sometimes for the homage that is freely paid to the writers of new farces; and the writers of novels are naturally more anxious for flattery than philosophers. The fact remains, however, that, though many novels have been dramatized with conspicuous success, the most successful adaptations have been those of bad, or at any rate of indifferent, novels. If there have been adaptations of such writers as Thackeray and Flaubert, they have never attracted any particular attention. Victor Hugo, who shone both as a novelist and as a dramatist, did not make his plays out of his novels; and the melodramas which other people have made out of "Les Misérables," though well enough in their way, do not do, and could not do, justice to Victor Hugo's genius, any more than Mr. Buchanan's Sophia did, or could do, justice to the genius of Fielding. On the other hand, there is one sort of novel which does not suffer by adaptation, and which, when adapted, generally succeeds. It is the novel hinging on a particular kind of false sentimentalism which enjoys an evergreen popularity. The story, for example, of the erring wife who repents and comes home to die is equally sure of a cordial reception in a book and on the stage. Halévy wrote that story in Frou Frou, and Frou Frou has run a good deal longer than Charley's Aunt. Mrs. Henry Wood wrote the story, strengthened by the introduction of a consumptive child, in "East Lynne," and the book had the largest circulation of any novel in the English language. To adapt the novel for the stage it was only necessary to cut it into lengths and "write in" a comic policeman; and "when in doubt put up East Lynne" has been the motto of provincial touring companies ever since. Analogous cases are those of Mother and La Dame aux Camélias. Here, again, false sentiment, though not quite the same false sentiment, was the lever by means of which the world of playgoers was moved. In each case a bad but popular romance made a bad but popular play, the romance in each case containing none of those subtleties that cannot be rendered on the stage. Balzac, however, has many such subtleties and no false sentiment worth speaking of. Consequently, we are not sanguine that even "George Fleming" will make a good play out of La Peau de Chagrin.

SONG—TO-MORROW.

Oh, child unborn that mortals love to gild
With Hope's rare alchemy,
Thou never art, though on thy birth we build,
But ever art to be!
Our thoughts like Heralds we to greet thee send,
New joys from thee to borrow,
But thou wilt die ere we shall meet, my friend,
To-morrow!

Thou art a phantom none may overtake;
The shadow of to-day,
So closely dost thou follow in its wake,
As ages roll away.
We dream of rapture thou art sure to bring,
But lo! thy freight is sorrow!
Time bears thee ever on his pauseless wing,
To-morrow!

F. B. DOVETON.

Personal Views.

THE FRENCH SCHOOLBOY.

The French schoolboy, especially in private life, is a charming fellow. Even a penitential system of education cannot check his fine spirits or his sense of fun. He accepts the austerity of his school life philosophically, although he rarely looks back to it with the affectionate remembrance common to Englishmen who have passed through the happy gates of a public school. He resigns himself to his fate, and makes the best of his chances of cheerfulness. His hours are long, his food is coarse, he sleeps in a huge "dortoir" like a recruit in barracks, and to increase the military illusion wears a neat uniform, the badge of all his tribe, but he is none the less a very human boy. There are in France many excellent private schools which are conducted in a far more liberal spirit than the Lycées, but whether he receive his early training at a great State school or at some "Institution" such as that so admirably described by Du Maurier in "The Martian" the French boy is always more or less a creature in half humorous revolt against surroundings in the shaping of which he has no voice. His happiness is almost entirely found in his home life; his education appears to him in the light of an unpleasant necessity which the traditions of his country have taught him to accept with resignation. Whilst the surplus vigour of the English lad is absorbed in cricket and football, the energies of the French boy which the long hours of the classroom have not exhausted find what vent they can in the affairs of the world as reflected in his "dortoir" and schoolroom. Often he is a premature politician, the student of smuggled newspapers with fierce views on such questions as the Dreyfus case or the general iniquity of British policy.

It takes some weeks for the foreign professor to get a glimpse under the surface, but when he does he discovers a strange world with a life entirely its own. He hears the murmur of an elaborate and constantly changing school slang of singular ingenuity and wit. He finds that his pupils take the measure of their masters with surprising accuracy. Instinct tells them who are the Professors and maîtres d'études, whom it is possible to embêter. "Embêter le pion" is the favourite pastime of the Lycées, and an excellent preparation for the politics of his country. In France the recalcitrant schoolboy is an expert at an organized "row." "Chahuter" is the verb which he uses to describe his most exciting amusement. He can overthrow a Professor as his elders overthrow an unpopular Ministry. The classes are very large, and every untried master must be tested before his discipline is accepted. The custom is for the Professor to dismiss from his classroom the impertinent pupil, but the little Frenchman plays his game cleverly, and it is not always easy to decide the point where chaff begins and the desire for instruction ceases. Thus it often happens that a new master without suspecting it is for some days the victim of juvenile irony. But a day comes when his "Silence, Messieurs!" is followed by the faint rustling of feet and half suppressed laughter; the sound gradually increases in volume; desks are slammed, ribald murmurs reach the angry professor. It is revolt. Possibly he dismisses the class without detecting the ringleaders, and complains to the Proviseur, in whose hands college discipline lies, thus preparing a débâcle for his own authority. I remember several cases of unpopular or feeble masters quelled by their pupils in a sheer spirit of fun, tinctured with an infusion of real malice on the part of the chief conspirators.

In the well-known college where I discharged the duties of junior English teacher my senior colleague was not an Englishman. He carried quite cheerfully the ponderous name of Rackelboom, and came, I believe, originally from Flanders. He had married an English wife, possibly to equip himself for his profession, and spoke our language with an accent which marriage never cured. For scholastic purposes his name was even more unfortunate than his pronunciation. It was a constant temptation to young Frenchmen in whom the frolic spirit had destroyed the higher virtues of justice and politesse.

It chanced that there was an annual fair in the town to which itinerant merchants flocked from various parts of France to sell their wares. It was not deemed "good form" for the college to have serious dealings with the cheap-jacks who offered bargains to staring peasants. My unfortunate colleague, however, had no exclusive prejudices, and he was actually seen purchasing articles of crockery by one of the day boys, who carried back the interesting intelligence to his friends. Now it appears that M. Rackelboom had discovered this youth a few days before in an out-building, endeavouring to smoke a cigarette manufactured from some mysterious fuel extracted from a pair of elastic-side boots. This offence the Professor indiscreetly reported to the authorities. The victim vowed vengeance. The professor's domestic purchases suggested its dramatic form. The lad composed the following simple song in two languages:—

Rackelboom! Rackelboom!
Achète des soucoupes
To fournishe son room!

When the Professor appeared before his class after the muse of mischief had thus inspired his enemy all discipline was destroyed. "Rac-kel-boom!" murmured the chorus, "Rac-kel-boom!" Feet were stamped in unison and desks drummed; "on chantait," and in the end the owner of the formidable name fled before the storm. The onomatopœic fascinations of it finally led to his resignation. A hero might have carried it with dignity, but it was too much for a teacher of English.

There was a certain usher of melancholy mien whom the boys identified as "l'hermite du gazon," from his habit of marching up and down on the same side of the flagged courtyard. The "hermit" was very popular. So long as silence was maintained in his étude he made no inquiries as to the character of "the preparation" which he supervised. With Dupont the lazy pupil might say—

Courbé sur mon pupitre, en secret je lisais
Des bouquins de rebut achetés au rabais.

The "hermit's" room was the happiest in the whole school; all manner of forbidden fiction was devoured under cover of to-morrow's neglected task. One day, however, the Proviseur made a sudden descent on this pleasant oasis and unearthed a copy of "L'Assommoir," and the "hermite" soon after disappeared into private life.

The spirit of snobbishness, so far as I could ascertain, was non-existent in our school. The pupils were of all classes, but complete equality existed between them. One of my boys of the name of Huby was the son of a little grocer who sold sugar in his own little shop and wore a blouse. Huby was known as "l'épicier du coin," but the name carried no visible slight with it. A big, fat, good-natured fellow and an externe, he used to present his schoolfellows with cakes of chocolate looted from his father's counter. His gifts made him highly popular. The "th" sound in English was an insurmountable barrier to his progress in the language, and as a pupil he did me no credit. In class he was somnolent. Whatever may be the drawbacks of the French system the French schoolboy in Latin and mathematics and arithmetic is on the whole in advance of his English contemporary. Mathematics are taught on a saner principle, and the decimal system removes a very dismal stumbling-block from the paths of the youngest boys. Modern languages there, as with us, are the weakest point. On the other hand Latin is not nearly so dead a language as it seems to the English lad, and in the higher classes the meaning and value of style in literature is taught, a subject which in English schools is entirely overlooked. As a shirk the lazy French boy is far more original than the English. So long as they could keep their names and the nature of their excuses out of my report book my pupils were as daring as the little boy in Daudet's story, who discovered that the Pope was dead to divert his aunt's attention from the breach of domestic discipline which his manœuvre covered. We read "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Rivals," and "The Vicar of Wakefield" as school books. The last was the least popular. The primitive manners prevailing in the good vicar's household excited derision. The high spirits of Sheridan's play, however, were appreciated, and Bob Acre's method of swearing, elaborately explained in the foot-notes by the editor, created diversion. In those days the spirit of the "revanche" was still strong with the boys. An Alsatian with a large head who was known as "le gros Prussien," much resented the name as très méchant, whereas to be described as "l'épicier du coin" was held to be an inoffensive piece of chaff. The German professors, who both came from Hanover, for diplomatic reasons pretended their origin was Swiss. For some obscure reason they were known as "les mangeurs des pommes de terres." The general ignorance of all things English among the boys was extreme. I had great difficulty in persuading an intelligent and inquiring lad who had spent a fortnight at Folkestone that croquet was not our national game. He had seen it played with hoops and mallets, and cricket also begins with a "c."

A country probably gets the system of education which it deserves, and certainly the logical and alert intelligence of the French is in a measure due to theirs. The boys are forced to work; lessons are the only outlet for energies, and education with the French parent is a serious question. He expects as much as he can get for his money. This attitude also visibly influences his son. Moreover, the shadow of the baccalauréat is always before the eyes of the French lad. "To be plucked for an exam" is not regarded across the Channel in the jocular spirit with which it is accepted in the average English household. French Lycées have not a little to learn from our public schools, but if mental culture be regarded as the main object of instruction we are in no position to bombard them with the stones of critical superiority.

PERCY WHITE.

THE LATE SIR HENRY PARKES.

Few statesmen of our time have risen with such determination and success from the lowest rung of the ladder as the late Sir Henry Parkes, the Birmingham artisan who was destined to become Prime Minister of an adopted land, New South Wales, no less than five times. Among the recent publications of the enterprising Sydney firm, Messrs. Angus and Robertson, is a book entitled AN EMIGRANT'S HOME LETTERS, which gives a vivid picture of the future statesman's early struggles. For though the potential reader might not suspect it from the title "the emigrant" is none other than Sir Henry Parkes. In this sheaf of early letters, written by the poor, overdriven, young Warwickshire workman on the eve of his enforced emigration to Australia, we have a far more moving tale of the "still, sad music of humanity" than any but the greatest of literary artists in fiction can produce. These so-called "Home Letters" have been preserved and garnered with infinite care and affection by the deceased Sydney statesman's daughter, who may take to herself the inward consolation that in this humble and unpretentious little book she has raised the best and truest memorial of her father, one likely to outlast all his own political speeches and literary productions, and even, in a sense, the splendid record of his political achievements.

Miss Parkes contributes a brief Preface, and a few sentences of essential Introduction, admirable alike in brevity and good taste. We learn that on the 11th July, 1836, Henry Parkes and Clarinda Varney were made man and wife at Edgbaston Parish Church, and that after the almost unwitnessed ceremony the young people slunk back to Birmingham, to dwell together in poverty in the one little room where the bride had previously lived alone. She had left her own home, in the beautiful wooded county of Warwickshire, owing to the persecution of her step-mother; her father never again recognized her. At the time of this lowly marriage of mutual affection and, as the worldly would say, rash improvidence, Henry Parkes was twenty-one, and his wife some two years older. Parkes was by trade an ivory-turner, and very soon after his marriage came up to London, where, finding existence as hard and difficult a problem as in Birmingham, he decided to emigrate with his wife and young child to Australia, then only known to English folk as "Botany Bay" a happily remote island of convicts and black-fellows.

Nearly all of these early letters of Henry Parkes were written during this brief perturbed interval of time that he and his young wife passed in London preparatory to their emigration. They are addressed for the most part to his favourite eldest sister, of whom at her death, more than twenty years afterwards, the colonial statesman wrote to his wife in Sydney: "Next to you and our dear children, I have now lost the dearest creature that remained to me upon earth." These pathetic words were wrung from Sir Henry Parkes by his dead sister's bedside; he was then in England with the late William Bede Dalley on a political mission.

The first of the "Home Letters" is dated Sunday, 27th November, 1836, and describes the then slow and melancholy train journey from Birmingham to London in the open and exposed cattle-trucks reserved for the poor at that time. "For the first fifty miles of the journey," he writes, "the rain and wind beat through the naked windows." Arrived in the vast and appalling metropolis, the sturdy young artisan left his wife at an obscure coffee-house while he sought for permanent shelter for their heads, which he finally succeeded in doing somewhere in the region of Hatton-garden.

We have a furnished room and a good sized dressing closet, where we keep our bread and cheese and our coals, &c., on the fourth floor for six shillings per week, and find our own linen and crocks. Staying at the coffee-house was very expensive, but I was afraid of going to strange lodgings, and am glad I did not. We have got out of about 2ls. since we have been in London, though we have been as careful as we could.

Parkes did not write again till early the following month, and we are left to conjecture the manifold rebuffs and bitter disappointments of the unrecorded interval. It is always the word unexpressed, the regret untold, which makes the pathos of such a lot. Parkes hid from his sister as far as he could the tale of his rapidly arriving destitution. Whatever may have been his failings as a statesman and they were not few—Parkes was pre-eminently a man. At times a groan may escape him, but how quickly it is followed by some word of real or assumed hopefulness! Even when unable to find the money to redeem his lathe and workman's tools, he yet writes to his sister cheerily :—

> My expectations of London have met with disappointment in nearly every particular, but I will not talk of that. You will remember that I hinted to you that in case I did not succeed in London I should go further. I had almost forgotten that I ever had such thoughts among the fresh and astonishing scenes of this strange, glorious place till it seemed as if there was no place for me among the countless multitude of its inhabitants. My thoughts then returned to emigration.

Though a man of intense, and even petty, personal vanity, Sir Henry Parkes had little or nothing of the snob in his composition. In conversation he would often dwell on these early times when he almost starved in the Hatton-garden region ; and he was in the habit of wandering for hours alone over London to try and trace the scenes and localities of those youthful days of bitter struggle and indescribable disappointment. In the midst of these early struggles, as afterwards, when his life passed in the whirl of public affairs, there is nothing more remarkable than his persistent and sincere love of literature. There is a passage in one of these "Home Letters" which is particularly moving. It is where he briefly writes to his sister of the necessity to sell off his few remaining books :—

> With regard to the books, if you can sell any of them or exchange any of them for cloth for shirts, &c., I should be glad. "Caleb Williams" and the "Works of Shakespeare" I should like for myself, but, of course, can do without them.

The late Sir William Windeyer, who had known Parkes from his own boyhood, always regarded his personal affection for books as amounting to a disease. When Parkes was still a struggling workman in Sydney, he has been known to spend the whole of his week's wages on his way home on a Saturday night in some second-hand book-shop, which had the same fatal fascination for him that the public-house had for too many of his fellows. Books, literary relics, authors' autographs, rare prints and engravings—these were the besetting sins of this strange colonial statesman who, to his dying day, was always in pecuniary difficulties ; and this, though for the greater part of his life he was a strict teetotaller, never belonged to a club at any period of his career, and had none of the idle, spendthrift amusements of the bulk of humanity of all classes.

When Parkes found that nothing stared him in the face save starvation in London, he at length boldly announced his fixed determination to emigrate ; but he does so, not like a beaten craven in the battle of life, but rather as a conquering warrior proclaiming a forthcoming campaign.

> I am in high hopes of Australia, as well I may be when I compare my chance of living there with my chance of doing so here : but I cannot give you much information now or I should be up all night. [He probably had no more to give.] The colony of New South Wales is three times as large as England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and as beautiful a country as this. The soil produces almost everything which this produces, together with pomegranates, oranges, lemons, figs, &c. Land can be bought in some of the towns for seven pounds an acre, in the second town in the colony for twenty pounds, and in some parts of the country for five shillings per acre. Mechanics can get forty and fifty shillings a week, and buy sugar for two shillings a pound ; tea for two shillings ; beef twopence a pound ; wine sixpence per bottle : rent four shillings per week. Sydney, the capital of the colony, contains 25,000 inhabitants. However, my hopes are not extravagant, though I make sure of getting rich and coming over soon to fetch all of you. I had forgotten to say the climate is the healthiest in the world.

However, "red tape" put all sorts of difficulties in the way of his getting a free passage to this promised land :—

> They would not give me a passage at first because I was a turner, as persons of such a trade as mine must, when they get to Sydney, work on their own account . . . There are crowds of applicants every day at the emigration office for them to choose out of, and they keep them back and put them off from time to time very vexatiously it seems to me.

Even the Circumlocution Office could not stop such a man as Henry Parkes.

When he at length reached Sydney, after a terribly tedious voyage, with his brave young wife and sick child, he found the greatest difficulty in getting a livelihood for them. He was by turns farm labourer, tide-waiter, ironmonger, toy-shop keeper, journalist, and at length politician and Prime Minister. He began to scribble verse in the columns of Robert Lowe's Sydney journal, the Atlas ; and, as he always declared, he was mainly instrumental in getting the future Lord Sherbrooke elected for the metropolis in the old Legislative Council of New South Wales. Parkes then kept a small toy-shop in Hunter-street, Sydney, and scribbled his amatory verse for the Atlas on the counter.

None of these moving themes, of course, are touched upon in these beautiful homely family letters of Sir Henry Parkes. But even in these early domestic records, in this tale of penury and struggle, we get many a glimpse of the real soul-felt love of literature and culture in the breast of this virile and gifted man. Parkes published two small books of "occasional" verse, in which he displayed a tendency to amativeness that sometimes reminds the reader of an unmelodious Tom Moore masquerading as Thomas Little. But Parkes' love of books, his devotion to his literary ideals, his kindly help to struggling local authors, were not the least attractive traits in his powerful but complex personality, the key of which is truly presented to the discerning reader of this delightful book.

A. PATCHETT MARTIN.

THE MUSIC OF VOWEL-SOUND.

We are seldom aware how subtly we are influenced by the mere music of vowel-sound, which often holds the quintessence of the meaning of the word containing it. Vowel-sounds unconfined by their bonds of consonants, thrill each with a single, easily-defined emotion, which rings out even in the most incongruous combinations. The long-drawn "o" sounds enfold the melancholy of loneliness ; the "oo" sounds lull the senses, and induce moods that have the soothing influence of dew ; while many of the frail and exquisite things of April and of Spring—lilies and daffodils, and slim silver willows find an interlinked sweetness of expression in one common vowel. In his essays Coventry Patmore speaks "of sounds having a subtle correspondence to things." He says :—"The language of poetry—the only real speech—of all nations and times has largely consisted of a mixture of phonetic and objective imagery." The word speaks to the mind, but the vowel to the soul, and even without digging into the philology of the matter, it should not be difficult to trace some of these mystic parallels.

At times the special preferences of a poet in vowel-sound give a key to his characteristics. Most poets, however, prefer delicate and elusive combinations to simple melodies ; but even so, one note, not so much by reason of its persistency, as by reason of its stridency, may often dominate the rest. In the extremely varied and resonant harmonies of Swinburne, it is always the vowel sound "i" (as in fire) that rings longest in the air—a vowel-sound shining with light and life, chiming always a high exhilaration. What vitality is given to his "Song of the South-West Wind" by the employment of this vowel!

Wind whose might in fight was England's on her mightiest warrior-day,
South-west wind, whose breath for her was life, and fire to scourge her foe,
Steel to smite, and death to drive him down an unreturning way. . . .

This is the wind of the "widening winds gigantic," of the "darkening brows divine." There is the triumph and the brine of the sea in this song: the brightness of salt. To take a converse instance, Keats' metaphor of the bluebell—"sapphire queen of the mid-May"—jars on us, because it fires a flower with over-sparkle of being.

It is strange to find that this virile vowel-sound was Ernest Dowson's favourite. "His ideal of a line of verse," Arthur Symons tells us, "was the line of Poe—

The viol, the violet, and the vine."

Here, however, we notice that the brightness of the vowel-sound is veiled by the slow languor of the consonant, and a wholly different key of music is thus produced. The images appeal each with delicate persuasion to the different senses, and in view of circumstances there is something curiously pathetic in their choice. As we should expect, it is the consonant rather than the vowel that allures Dowson. "The letter 'v,'" he said, "is the most beautiful of the letters, and could never be brought into verse too often." As it happens, there are very few lovely words in our language attaching to this letter; the extreme rarity may give to its use an additional thrill. We have to seek before we find such lines as "viewless violets," or "quickening with vision the eye that was veiled."

Consonants would seem to have less power over the "o" and "oo" sounds; they cannot mitigate the cold northern loneliness of the one, nor vex the southern softness of the other. "O" holds in its note all the melancholy of ocean, so closely allied to the genius of our people; often we find this clearly enunciated:—

On that lone shore loud moans the sea—

but so strongly is it always implied that we find a special fitness in connecting the thought of woe with Maeterlinck's image of the ocean:—

"Faut-il plaindre celui qui pleure certains soirs, au bord d'une mer infinie, ou celui qui sourit, sans raison, toute sa vie, au fond d'une petite chambre?"

The most haunting lines that Keats ever wrote are big with the "o" music:—

Magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn.

"Forlorn!" the poet exclaims, "the very word is like a bell to toll thee back from thee to my sole self." So funeral bells, that are the very speech of loss and loneliness, in Mrs. Browning's "Rhyme of the Duchess May," recurringly "toll slowly." It is, of course, unnecessary to refer to the birds of loneliness—to the "moping owl," and the "moping heron motionless and stiff."

After the lofty asceticism of this vowel how sweet to pass to the soothing "oo" music; to hear George Meredith's doves, "Through the long noon coo, crooning through the coo"; to listen where "the long-backed breakers croon Their endless ocean legend to the lazy locked lagoon." The heaviness of summer is in the sound, the languor of afternoon, the dense peace of twilight in woods, where are "dark bluebells drenched with dews of summer eves."

Is it merely a personal preference that of all sounds the changes that ring in the words lily, willow, rivulet, liquid, crystal, silver should appear most exquisite? It would seem not; of all our mouth names John Burroughes has deemed April loveliest, though there is adequate representation of other vowels in May, June, and July. What jewel has so tender a designation as "amethyst"? And do we not transform our inchoate London into dim beauty by calling it, with Mrs. Marriott Watson, "city of mist"? In this sound there is something so keenly fragile that it seems to respond to vibrations from the invisible; you can make delicious music by merely stringing words woven of it together—"slim lilac fingers," "misty vistas," "the shrill spirit of the wind." Though it should occur but once in the line, it thrills with some poignancy delicate and mysterious, "remembered kisses after death," "some bewildered swallow," "the fringe and fray'd hem of the sea." Mr. George Meredith's poetry affords a good illustration of its liquidity:—

A limping minnow rillet ran
To hang upon an ivy foot.

The following lines of Mrs. Meynell's, also exquisitely liquid, have in addition a remote brilliance and peace:—

. . . The tide comes again
And brims the little seashore pools, and sets
Seaweeds afloat, and fills
The silent pools, rivers and rivulets
Among the inland hills.

William Blake uses this vowel to interpret the white freshness of the lily of the valley—a quality almost too spiritual for the coarse mediumship of words.

Thel answered "O! thou little virgin of the peaceful valley . . .
Thy breath doth nourish the innocent lamb; he smells thy milky garments. . . ."

And has not Mr. Henley built a whole ballade on the coolness of the sound?

Fountains that frisk and sprinkle
The moss they overspill,
Grass that the breezes crinkle,
The wheel beside the rill
With its wet, weedy frill. . . .

Of course, in the greatest passages of our poets, we are carried beyond the consciousness of vowel-sound, beyond the consciousness of the mediumship of words, into the very core of the moving tragedies of life and death. There is music there, too, but it is music beyond our analysis, sometimes beyond our comprehension. Many things are so far above us that to define them is to lose them; they elude the attempt to bind them in finite bonds. But in many exquisite beauties of our literature we have free liberty to take the same critical joy that we take in the sounds of Nature herself, Nature who has built up so many of our words to the roll of the ocean, to the coo of doves, and to the whisper of willows.

ETHEL WHEELER.

A SWISS BAUERNSPIEL.

It would be interesting to learn when the last folk-play was performed in England—a play, that is, conned and acted by villagers for their own amusement, and not for gain or the patronage of the local "quality." By the merest chance I had the pleasure of attending a volksschauspiel in the Canton Thurgau the other day; and, though it had unique attractions of its own, and Switzerland was overrun with visitors, I was the only alien in the audience. The fact is, they have no village Greet or Benson at Diessenhofen, and all that summer afternoon trains and boats went up and down the Rhine in happy ignorance that there was a play afoot. The casual tourist as he passed Ermatingen may have turned a languid eye in vain for the ruins of Reichenau, where the monk Ekkehard spent his comfortable exile under the thumb of an imperious duchess; but Diessenhofen went unnoticed—certainly unvisited. The village is the last calling-place for steamers going down the Rhine from Constance to Schaffhausen; and though it is as pretty a spot as any on the journey, it has to take its notions of the outside world from a chance pilgrim with a knapsack or the scurrying cyclist. But the native cheerfully meets disregard with disregard—a not infrequent bargain between Arcadia and the stranger.

It was the fourth Sunday of July and perfect weather; the countryside had turned out in a body to see the fun, and the hamlet looked its best. The robust voices of the players as you left the station came across the fields with a ring of businesslike invitation, and everything in that well-filled meadow was primitive—from the ill-curtained stage which stretched along one side of it, to the rickety, rough-hewn benches which had been marked off into squares at a franc apiece. Entrances and exits the players made by steps at either end of the rambling stage, and the scene-tops were overhung by rustling elm and poplar. As was to be expected in a land which so jealously preserves its national dress traditions, the costumes were correct and excellent. There were enough hauberks and bannerets to make a gallant show, and for the frequent salvos there was a brass gun which was punctual and efficient. Indeed, that worthy piece of ordnance deserves to be promoted to higher dramatic fields. I tried to obtain a list of the chief actors, but there was none available, and personal inquiry was useless; the play was the thing, and the 250 members of the cast desired to go unrecorded. All they would tell you was that they were drawn entirely from Diessenhofen and the neighbouring villages. There was little or no prompting—certainly none audible; the scenery was roughly effective; and the audience drank its beer with heroic satisfaction.

That the play was patriotic is shown by the title—Karl der Kühne, und die Eidgenossen. It was written by Dr. Arnold Ott, of Lucerne, and published by Gebhardt there a couple of years ago in a paper-covered quarto of 200 pages. But this was the first representation, and the author (who took his "curtain" very modestly) had been at some pains to cut the work down to a four-hours' limit. The conflict of cantonal dialect makes it hard reading for a foreigner, perhaps, and the difficulty is not to be overcome even by the vigorous elocution of Diessenhofen. But subtract the dialect, with all its humour and savour of the soil, and you still have a play which more than repays a reading. It may very well stand trial as Switzerland's latest contribution to the historical drama of Europe, and when we consider how scanty, outside the pages of Philippe de Comines, are the materials relating to the wars of Charles the Bold, Dr. Ott's researches can hardly fail to be of future importance, even to the chronicler. It was a learned friend at St. Gallen who drew my attention to the play, and it was pleasant to learn from him that for months before publication the manuscript had been read in a small circle with enthusiasm and enjoyment.

The author is evidently of the school of Schiller, and, indeed, in a country where no youngster leaves school without knowing Wilhelm Tell by heart, it would be impossible to find a more appropriate model. The more serious passages of the book are written in blank verse, which despite occasional rhymes is well-tuned, skilfully broken up, pliant and descriptive. Now and then Dr. Ott shows a partiality for the unrhymed and irregular dactyl, and there is a sufficient relief in the form of prose dialogue and frequent lyrics. Sometimes in these the influence of Heine's faults and too few of his merits is apparent to the degree of enervation; but others are strong and serviceable in the progress of the story. The first act is one of semi-barbaric pomp in the Burgundian Court, where Charles, backed by the Papal legate, receives a Swiss deputation with stinging arrogance, and works them up to a dramatic challenge. The second is laid among the mountains, where the covenant of the cantons takes shape, and the plan of campaign is laid. The third and fourth are fighting acts, at Grandson and Murten; and the last leads up to the Monarch's death near the field of Nancy, with the flight of his Italian hirelings and the victory of the federal troops. Here there is a smack of King Lear observable, for the author makes a loyal elegist of the Court jester, Le Glorieux, and one of the respectful speeches of the Swiss leaders over the poor fool's body is touching in its happy irony:—

> Ihm folg' der Narr zum ewigen Gericht!
> Sein seelenkund'ger Anwalt sei er dort;
> Denn weiser war er, als sein Kleid verriet.

The patriotic fervour of the piece was unmistakable; the delight of the simple onlookers it would be hard to forget. The acting, making all allowances, was not unworthy the high literary level of the play. I had just left the chief theatres of München—Wagner's Tristan at the Hoftheater and Hauptmann's Versunkene Glocke at the Gärtnerplatz—and I had seen in the interim the greatest tragedy in the world at Ober-Ammergau. Yet this unpretentious sequel had nothing of the anti-climax in it. Instead of hyper-Promethean agony there was the sunny patriotism of a peasants' holiday. Instead of great and sweeping orchestral effects one listened to quaint old strains from the municipal band of the nearest town, and the burly speech of untutored villagers had to supply the modulations of a great declamatory actor like Josef Kainz. But it was sound feeling and honest work, the parents of true art; and out of those rude strains one could hear fine music taking strong and healthy wing. Inverting Oertzen's phrase about making an idle toy of love, these folk had drawn passionate love of country out of an artistic pastime; and I came away wondering how long we should have to wait in England before the men of Avonside took up Twelfth Night or As You Like It for a summer entertainment, or the boatmen of Devon and the Dart fashioned themselves a play on the theme of Drake and the Spanish Main. I am afraid there is no need for Mr. Newbolt to be alarmed; his captain "sleeping there below" is likely to go undisturbed for a long time yet by the rude applause of a canvas booth. And Warwickshire is too busy with its new-born ambitions as a first-class county to exchange the wicket-keeper's pad for the buskin of Shakespeare.

J. P. COLLINS.

BOOKBINDING IN 1900.

Fashion is an important factor in the book trade, even if, as Mr. Heinemann would have us believe, it has nothing to do with the chances of a novel. Especially is this the case with the externals of a book, and in fiction more than in any other department. It is the fashion to dress a book boldly, to give a striking effect by the simplest means. Strong outlines and glowing colours have been gradually changing the complexion of the bookstall during the last two seasons, and as, generally speaking, it costs less to produce these covers than the sober patterns of a year or so ago, they have probably come to stay. The war, with its fine opportunities for brilliant shades and broad effects, undoubtedly gave an impetus to the new movement, and the Chinese peril will probably lead to further audacious developments. But publishers were beginning to take a greater interest in their covers before the South African troubles began. A striking design, it is admitted, has an appreciable effect on the sale of the average book, and even some of the more conservative publishers, who would have looked askance at anything approaching unconventionality a few years ago, are making daring experiments in this direction nowadays. The tendency seems to be to put less and less gilt work on cloth covers. A better result can be produced without it in most of the new designs, and the saving of expense—for giltwork is costly and often wasteful—is an important consideration when books are demanded at cheaper prices every year. Leather binding, of course, is another matter; here the gold leaf must remain supreme. Last year, to give one instance only, the waste gold leaf and the sweepings from the binding-house floor of the Oxford University Press, where the leaf is laid on the covers, yielded a lump sum of gold which sold for £130.

The Oxford Press, by the way, has a wonderful collection of elaborate bindings at the Paris Exhibition, and as an artistic specimen of English book-binding it has never been excelled. The forty-seven volumes are priced at sums ranging from £4 to as much as £150, the cheapest being an Oxford miniature Milton and the most expensive "A Century of Oxford Almanacks." Altogether the forty-seven volumes are valued at £1,000. The inlaid bindings are extremely ornate, and charming effects are produced by the various colours in the levant morocco, calf and pig-skin sides. As stated in Literature some months ago the Society of Arts has taken up the subject of leather for bookbinding, conscious that much of the leather binding of to-day is in serious need of improvement. On every hand, it is argued, complaints of the rapid decay of bindings are heard, and an examination of a library of any size would show that the leather on a large number of books bound during the last fifty years had perished. The report of the committee appointed to investigate the matter should be of considerable interest. One of the chief causes for the early decay of the leather now in use is said to be the use of sulphuric acid in clearing and dyeing. It is also urged that excessive finish is not only useless to bookbinders, but injurious to the leather. Leather for bookbinding, said Mr. Douglas Cockerell in his recent lecture on the subject before the Society of Arts, is so tortured and worried in finishing and graining that most people hardly know that each of the various leathers has a characteristic and often beautiful grain. We find now, he continued, that instead of leather made from sheep, calf, goat, and pig-skins, each having, when finished, its own characteristic surface, that sheep-skins are got up to look like calf, morocco, or pig-skin; that calf is grained to resemble morocco or so polished and flattened as to have but little character left; while goat-skins are grained in any number of ways, and pig-skin is often grained like levant leather. Some of these imitations are so clever that it takes a skilled expert to identify them. A suggestion has been made that a system of testing and hall-marking should be established, but it is not easy to see how such a scheme could be made practicable. It would be simple enough to stamp the skins in the first place, but unless every book could be marked the system would virtually be valueless. Besides, there is many a book lover who would not be convinced that he could ever accept an imitation leather for the genuine article, and who might object to the branding of his bibliographic treasures.

GERMAN ART IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

La Peinture Allemande au XIX^e^ Siècle. Par M. le Marquis de la Mazelière. Ouvrage accompagné de cent trois gravures hors texte. Paris. (Librairie Plon, Fr.20.)

In this handsome volume, the latest publication of the Maison Plon, we have the most complete and exhaustive history of German painting in the nineteenth century that has yet seen the light. Its appearance is singularly opportune at the present moment, when the brilliant and striking display of contemporary German art in the Palais des Beaux Arts is exciting so much admiration among visitors to the Paris Exhibition. Never before has so full and representative a collection of modern German pictures been brought together. Never have the great and varied qualities of Teutonic masters been so generously recognized by French critics. As an introduction to this interesting section of fine art in the present Exhibition the book before us cannot fail to be of great use and assistance, while it will prove of the utmost value to the student who attempts to grapple with the complex and intricate problems of German art.

M. de la Mazelière is remarkably well fitted for the task which he has undertaken. He has a wide acquaintance with the different schools of modern painting, and is equally familiar with the contemporary literature of France, of England, and of Germany. He deals incidentally with the art of English Pre-Raphaelites and of French Impressionists, and examines the influence which the poetry of Rossetti and Swinburne, of Victor Hugo and Baudelaire, the novels of Zola and Tolstoy, the philosophy of Nietzsche and Ibsen, the music of Wagner and Berlioz, have, each in turn, exercised on the development of art. The author approaches these subjects in a calm and unprejudiced spirit and discusses them in a clear and intelligent manner, discovering the fundamental principles which lie at the root of human civilization and tracing their gradual evolution in contemporary painting. The art of a nation, he holds, corresponds with the manners and customs, the beliefs, and ideas of thought prevalent in the age to which it belongs, and is the best record we possess of the mental history of successive generations. Not only in his choice of subject and composition, but in his technique, the artist reveals the true spirit of his times.

> L'art d'un peuple reflète ses crises philosophiques, sociales et politiques; l'évolution de l'art allemand correspond à celle de l'Allemagne elle-même (p. 393).

Step by step M. de la Mazelière follows the transformation in art and society that was effected on parallel lines during the peaceful times after the close of Napoleon's wars and the troubled period which culminated in the Revolution of 1848. In the latter half of his book he describes the development of material and commercial prosperity, as well as the reawakened sense of national independence, which succeeded the foundation of the new German Empire. During the eighteenth century German artists were content to imitate the style of French and Italian masters. Mengs copied Raphael and the Bolognese painters by turn, Watteau inspired Chodowiecki's "Fêtes Champêtres," and Tiepolo decorated the Palace of Würzburg with his frescoes. It was only in the nineteenth century that German artists began to think and paint for themselves. In this way the history of the modern German school acquires a special importance, for the national art may be said to begin and end with the nineteenth century. It has attained its final evolution in the present day, when we see artists rejecting the traditions of the past and boldly proclaiming their absolute independence. First of all we have the Idealists, such as Carstens and Cornelius, who, in the opening years of the century, took classical statues and monuments for their models, or those who, like Overbeck and the Nazarenes, found inspiration in the Christian art of the old Italian masters. Rome became the centre of both of the schools of German art. Closely allied to them were the landscape painters who took Claude for their guide, and painted classical myths, set in the scenery of the Roman Campagna or the Isles of Greece. These Idealists were succeeded by the historical and romantic school—Schnorr of Carolsfeld, who decorated the palaces of Munich with the history of Charlemagne and the Nibelungen myths; Kaulbach, who, under the influence of Hegel's philosophy, depicted the progress of humanity on the walls of the Berlin Museum; and the Düsseldorf masters, Lessing, Rethel, Steinle and Schwind, who illustrated Goethe's ballads and the legends of the Rhine. It was the second generation of historical painters who, by abandoning romantic themes and philosophical ideas for the representation of individual heroes and the costumes of a given period, prepared the triumph of the new school, and effected the transition from idealism to realism. Chief among these were Piloty, the Munich painter (1826-1886), whose famous "Death of Wallenstein" hangs in the New Pinacothek; Hans Makart (1840-1884), the master who filled the galleries of Vienna with his vast compositions; and the great Hungarian, Munkacsy, whose "Ecce Homo" has been repeatedly exhibited in London.

> Cette transformation de la peinture (writes M. de la Mazelière) eut son origine dans la transformation même du pays. L'école de Piloty fut contemporaine des grands événements qui produisirent l'Allemagne moderne: les guerres victorieuses de la Prusse, l'Autriche séparée de l'Allemagne, la fondation de l'Empire, le développement du commerce et de l'industrie, l'instruction rendue obligatoire, la diffusion de l'enseignement technique, le mouvement vers les colonies. . . . A l'idéalisme, à la peinture d'histoire succède le réalisme, dont les deux formes extrêmes sont le naturalisme et l'impressionnisme.

The second half of the century's art may be said to begin with the foundation of the Empire in 1870. During the first fifteen years of this new period (1870-1885) Bismarck reigned supreme, and military and official painting flourished under his sway. The galleries and palaces of Berlin were decorated with battle pieces, and the Court-painter Werner illustrated the proclamation of the Empire at Versailles, the Congress of Berlin, and the Triple Alliance in a series of large compositions. The most interesting development of art during this period is to be found in the portraits of Lenbach, the Bavarian master. Our author devotes a chapter to this veteran artist, who has painted all the most illustrious personages of the Vaterland, besides Pope Leo XIII., Mr. Gladstone, and our own Queen. Bismarck and Moltke, Mommsen and Helmholtz, Döllinger and Begas, Liszt and Wagner, with whom he lived on terms of intimate friendship, have all sat to Lenbach in turn. And like our great portrait painter, Mr. Watts, this master has always aimed at giving a faithful representation of the whole man, and has made character rather than beauty the object of his study.

In the last fifteen years German art has been profoundly affected by the new movement which has made itself felt alike in politics and literature. The disappearance of Bismarck from public life became the signal for a reaction against military and official thraldom. The democratic and socialist ideas in the air, the spirit of revolt that was abroad all helped to produce the new school of naturalist and impressionist painting. For a time rustic life became the favourite theme of artists; Kraus and Vautier painted village funerals and festivals and rustic weddings; in imitation of Courbet and Bastien-Lepage, Liebermann adopted plein d'air painting in his peasant pictures and inferior artists rivalled the eccentricities of Besnard and Manet in technique. But the chief representative of the new peinture de mœurs, which has become so popular in Germany, is the Prussian master Adolf von Menzel. His great picture of the Laminoir, or Iron-Works, of Königshütte in Silesia, produced an immense sensation when it was first exhibited in 1876, and marks a new era in the history of German art. Since then a host of followers have found material for their pictures in the streets and factories of Berlin, of Dresden, and Hamburg, and have devoted their art to the reproduction of the life of labour, and the desperate struggle for existence that goes on in the slums of our great cities. Among those artists who are busy with this oft repeated tale of human toil and misery, but who strike a deeper and a higher note, are Fritz von Uhde and Eduard von Gebhardt. Both of them are the sons of Protestant pastors, and both set before us the same image of a human and suffering Christ, surrounded by rude peasants and toiling men and women who hang upon his words and seek hope and comfort from His teaching. Nietzsche, says M. de la Mazelière, is the apostle of modern Germany, and the worship of force and negation of ideals which he professes are reflected in the realism of modern German art. But already this excessive naturalism and hopeless pessimism has produced the inevitable re-action, and a new school of symbolists has sprung up with Arnold Böcklin at their head. We may not agree with our French author when he declares this Bâle master to be the greatest genius which Germany has produced since Albert Dürer and Holbein, but it is impossible to deny the power of this remarkable man's weird conceptions, and the beauty of some of his mystic dreams.

In conclusion, M. de la Mazelière ventures on a prophetic forecast. Having ably summed up the art of the nineteenth century he is bold enough to give us a sketch of art in the twentieth century. The painting of the coming age, he believes, will be frankly realistic, but will avoid the excesses of baser naturalism. It will be an art of synthesis rather than one of analysis, and will find new modes of expression and new forms of beauty, wholly independent of old traditions and preconceived ideas. It will be largely decorative in character, and will concern itself more and more with cities and with city life, until some new Rousseau, weary of civilization, shall arise to discover Nature again, or some Millet fresh from the fields, shall find out the old paths, and bring man before us once more as part of a great and changeless order, set in the midst of eternal realities.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM IN FRANCE.

In another column Mr. Percy White gives us his "personal views" on the effect of the Lycée system on the French schoolboy. Mr. White's experience is that of an Englishman who has taught in a French school. It is not uninteresting to compare the remarks of a Frenchman, Monsieur Paul Lacombe, in his ESQUISSE D'UN ENSEIGNEMENT BASÉ SUR LA PSYCHOLOGIE DE L'ENFANT (Colin, 3fr.), on the present state of education and the means by which it might be improved. Monsieur Lacombe condemns the system, but his judgment must not be taken too seriously, as he has a hobby of his own to exalt. His remarks apply to the whole system of education in France, and not to the Lycée alone. He wishes all education to be founded on psychological observation. The child, he thinks, should be trained scientifically, like a horse or a rose bush. We will not deny that such ideals may come more within the range of practical considerations in the future, in England as well as in France, but at present they belong rather to the kingdom of Utopia. So long as education has to be carried on on a large scale, and 20 or 30 boys are taught at once in a single class, the same amount of individual attention as a gardener gives to his rose tree cannot be easily bestowed upon a single boy. The master who already has to divide his attention between keeping his form in order and carrying them rapidly through the numerous branches of learning which stretch their weary length before the eyes of the modern schoolboy has little time, we are afraid, for psychological observation. Due praise, nevertheless, must be given to M. Lacombe for having pointed out the national danger there is in France in not preparing boys' minds to discuss and sift evidence. His chapter on the teaching of history is worth meditating. What he says on Greek and Latin is less acceptable. His utilitarian ideal makes him despise Homer and Vergil. To learn how to read the foreign intelligence column in a daily paper seems to him more important than to commit to memory the Doric dative in order to commune with Theocritus. We cannot help thinking that the greatness of a nation is partly due to a great waste of energy. To have one Anatole France, one Renan, one Taine you must consent to let hundreds of boys yawn over a Latin Grammar. The gardener who produces a wonderful variety of tulip will tell you the time and expenditure it has cost him. And a Renan, after all, is worth more to a nation than scores of Madagascar planters or Sudan traders.

The work to which Dr. de Fleury gives the rather encyclopædic title of LE CORPS ET L'AME DE L'ENFANT (Colin, 3f. 50c.) first appeared in a series of Figaro articles. It is a most interesting book, saying in the lucid, brilliant French style all that doctors, scientists, and moralists have said with less effect. How to cure a hasty temper; how to change an idle child into an active youth; how to make a child brave, truthful, the difficult problems a French father faces with terror, are easily, because scientifically, solved. Some of the chapters are pre-eminently written for French parents, and those on food, dress, holidays, are amusing to English readers. Thus we are told that little Jules or little Victor, who plays all day in the Tuileries gardens, is by no means to sleep in a narrow recess looking on a dark and dingy court in a Paris flat, because it is injurious to health not to breathe properly and not to see a ray of sun ten hours out of twenty-four. The advice about boys who are naturally of a bad and morose disposition sounds also strange to Anglo-Saxon readers.

Last week we discussed the flat of the French Minister of Education with the object of simplifying the French syntax. How to simplify French spelling is the kindred problem faced by Monsieur Louis Favre in OBSERVATIONS SUR LA RÉFORME DE L'ORTHOGRAPHE (Firmin-Didot). There is, as is well-known, an official spelling: that of the "Dictionnaire de l'Académie"; but in this system M. Favre finds some perplexing discrepancies, arising probably from misprints. If, for instance, you look out bien you will find the word biens-fonds (with an s), and if you look out fonds, bien-fonds (without an s). The Academy write Saint Mathieu (under the word evangéliste) and Saint Matthieu (évangile), tomber en ruines (abbaye), and tomber en ruine (ruine), &c. The reform pleaded for by M. Favre after many other eminent Frenchmen will scarcely succeed, we think, because the majority of those that have learnt spelling, after many years' labour, are loath to forgo the only intellectual advantage they often have over their fellow-countrymen. With his little pamphlet on reform in spelling may be noticed his voluminous DICTIONNAIRE DE LA PRONONCIATION (Firmin-Didot) which has the disadvantage of not using the phonetic alphabet; thereby making the task easier for a reader in a hurry, but depriving the work of all scientific value. The volume includes a very curious, learned, and entertaining article of M. Gréard's on spelling reform, reprinted from a University magazine.

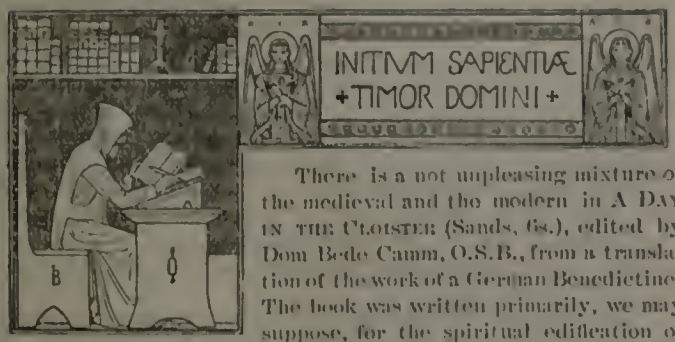
BENEDICTINES, ANCIENT AND MODERN.



There is a not unpleasing mixture of the medieval and the modern in A DAY IN THE CLOISTER (Sands, 6s.), edited by Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B., from a translation of the work of a German Benedictine. The book was written primarily, we may suppose, for the spiritual edification of guests; and therefore we ought not to complain that they are called upon to view everything through rose-coloured spectacles. The author (or the editor) himself admits that the abbey described is no existing monastery, but an imaginary one formed on the ideal sketched in the Rule of S. Benedict. In such circumstances, though the life may in general be faithfully portrayed, it is often difficult to be sure that the particular customs mentioned are in use in modern houses of the Order. The supposed visitors are highly favoured. The arrangement of the "Hours" and of High and Low Mass is devoutly explained to them; they are shown the Treasury of Relics and the gorgeous vestments in the Sacristy; they are admitted to the discipline of the Chapter and the ceremonies of Reception; they peep into the Abbot's Lodging and into the cells of the "Fathers" during the hours of labour. Nay, more, they share in the silent dinner, which, by the way, is the only meal mentioned; they join the various circles at Recreation in the garden or calefactory; they watch the students in the Library, the scholars in the Art School, the Lay Brothers at the forge or in the fields. Punishments are rare and mild, for no one apparently is ever guilty of more than a trivial offence. It is all described with an artless and pious enthusiasm, which will edify many and may possibly fire some to emulation. None can deny the beauty of the ideal, or the services rendered by the Benedictines to mankind in the early Middle Age. Then they were leaders in the civilizing of Europe by their instruction of the young, their example in agricultural labour, and their preservation of precious MSS. But throughout this book there is an undercurrent of assumption that only in the cloister is the perfection of the Christian life attainable; and men may naturally ask why the leaven that should leaven the whole lump should be enclosed as it were in an iron case, which is far less permeable now than in simpler and ruder times. There is much food for reflection in the thoughtful remark of Guizot—that the Rule of S. Benedict, though severe, was more humane and moderate than the barbarous laws and manners of his day, and that his monks were better governed within their own walls than they would have been in civil society. The conclusion, implied though not expressed, is hardly in favour of the modern revival of the Order.

In his WESTMINSTER ABBEY (Methuen, 3s.) Mr. Troutbeck has given us a really first-rate guide-book. It is a work which no travelling pilgrim to our greatest national fane "should ever be without," and is fitly published simultaneously in Boston and in London. The size is conveniently small for the pocket, and in addition to the mass of information so lucidly arranged by the author, it is very well illustrated by Mr. Bedford. We reproduce below his drawing of the beautiful effigy of Eleanor of Castile, the beloved Queen of Edward I., the original of which is in gilt bronze, and, though not of course a portrait, is an exquisite piece of work. Mr. Troutbeck writes with full and sympathetic knowledge of the glorious architecture and of the sepulchres and monuments of "the mighty dead"; but he does not allow his readers to forget that the Abbey is more than a mausoleum of the nation's great men. Though it touches at innumerable points the history both of Church and State, it has a private history of its own which the casual visitor is perhaps too apt to disregard. For nine hundred years, with varying fortunes, indeed with intervals of complete desolation, a famous Benedictine house stood on this "terrible place," as the thickets of Thorney Isle were once called; and even now, more than three centuries after its displacement by a collegiate foundation, the memories of its former occupants cling to many parts of the splendid pile. Mr. Troutbeck gives full details of the three Royal founders—Sebert, Edward the Confessor, and Henry III.; and in his description of the Cloisters, Refectory, Chapter-house, &c., he finds space to recall some features of the conventual life of their former inmates. He reminds us that the House of Commons frequently sat in the Refectory during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The "Mother of Parliaments" has doubtless increased in loquacity with her increasing years; but it is curious to think that so much talking took place in precincts where at meals no monk might speak at all, and even a guest might not venture beyond a whisper.

LOCAL HISTORY.

Seventeenth-Century Bristol.

In THE ANNALS OF BRISTOL IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY (Bristol, William George's Sons, 15s. 6d.), Mr. John Latimer, the indefatigable historian of Chatterton's city, completes the work which he has long been doing in so thorough and interesting a fashion. Beginning with the nineteenth century he has gradually made his way backwards to the end of Elizabeth's reign, when Bristol was already losing some of the prestige it enjoyed in earlier times when, outside London, the country contained only three or four towns of importance. The plan of the book is excellent. It takes the form of a chronological record of every event of interest in the history of the city, and the material, is, to a great extent, supplied by the archives of the Corporation, with some assistance from the State papers and from early publications bearing more or less directly on the subject. The result is a highly attractive narrative full of good reading. One may dip into the volume at haphazard and be certain of finding some entertaining detail of old Bristol life, some story of the jealousy of the Corporation towards settlers from outside, of its sycophancy to the great who were in a position to protect the city if it were made worth their while, or of the municipal extravagance in feasting, and the desperate ingenuity of the shifts for raising the wind. A favourite expedient to this end was to elect to the Common Council persons who, it was known, did not wish to serve, or who objected to taking oaths, and fine them roundly for refusing to accept the undesired distinction. This kind of thing went on for generations, recalcitrants being occasionally sent to prison for refusing to pay, until at last a courageous freeman arose who brought an action for false imprisonment, whereupon the Corporation thought it prudent to say no more about the unsatisfied fine.

The City Fathers were determined to lose nothing for lack of an influential friend at headquarters, and they contrived to confer some office of profit and dignity upon almost every successive Royal favourite. Thomas Cromwell was made Recorder at a handsome salary; when he was disgraced the Corporation ingeniously invented the dignified office of Lord High Steward for the behoof of the Protector Somerset. After them came Leicester and Burleigh, Essex, and Dorset. So the game went on, but, on the whole, Bristol seems hardly to have obtained value for the cash and presents which these illustrious connexions cost it. In 1672 the Duke of Ormond was High Steward, and, as his salary was in arrear—the place had been almost beggared by the Civil War—the Council determined to send him a present of sherry. Instead of being obliged his Grace was exceedingly angry, for he had been given London sherry instead of the famous Bristol wine, and he wrote a sharp letter trusting that "this attempt to impose upon him would not be repeated." The mayor, aldermen, and councillors of Bristol were an extraordinarily quarrelsome lot. When they chanced, for the moment, to have no feud with the Bishop or the Dean or one of the great landowners they squabbled among themselves with amazing relish, for they were often sharply divided by politics or religion. Despite the see-saw of party the city was, on the whole, Jacobite, and when Queen Mary II. died, the clergy, at all events, were so delighted at the disappearance of such a renegade as the wife of Dutch William that all the bells in Bristol rang out merrily. What between the King and the Parliament the town had some exceedingly discouraging experiences during the first half of the century. After Sedgmoor Jeffreys, of course, was there, and fined the mayor £1,000 as "a Kidnapping Knave" because he had allowed a boy committed to prison to "go beyond sea." In this case he was himself prosecutor, witness, and Judge. Had it not been for his respect for the city, added this righteous man, he would have hanged the offending Mayor. It was a Bristol worthy of this period, Alderman Sir John Knight, M.P., who wrote to a brother alderman the famous note:—"Sir John Knight presents his compliments to Sir Richard Crumpe, and have a hat which are not mine. If you has a hat which are not yourn, probably it are the missing one."

The Corporation records of 1661 contain an entry which was destined to be a terrible stumbling-block to the cocksureness of Lord Macaulay. Certain "foreigners"—that is to say, men who were not freemen—described as "translators," were warned to leave the city. Macaulay was once appealed to as to the real occupation of these men. He replied that they were "doubtless" employed by merchants to translate foreign documents. As a matter of fact, they were cobblers, who converted—or translated—old boots into shoes. The Corporation was extremely arrogant to "foreigners" of every kind, and when they ventured to set up in business they had their choice of being turned out neck and crop or of paying heavy fines for the privilege of taking up their freedom. The Bristol citizen was, indeed, an overbearing person altogether, and, according to a seventeenth-century chronicler, as proud as a Roman Senator. After the Restoration the mayors and even lesser members of the Corporation were frequently knighted, and occasionally created baronets, whereupon the town of course thought more of itself than ever. Olden life in Bristol was not all feasting and quarrelling. In 1613 it established the second public library in England, the first having been formed at Norwich. These "Annals" necessarily contain many echoes of matters of national moment, such as the colonization of Virginia and Newfoundland—indeed, not the least entertaining feature of Mr. Latimer's book is the manner in which the gravest matters come cheek by jowl with some intimate detail of municipal administration. The Common Council was a constant terror to evildoers, whether they were scolding women or stray pigs. The former were "ducked," and the latter had their tails cut off by the beadles, who appear to have been early forerunners of the famous farmer's wife of the nursery rhyme. Oddly enough the sum—sevenpence—disbursed for those amputations was exactly the same as that spent on brandy for the revival of the women after their cold bath. According to M. Jorevin de Rochefort, Treasurer of France, who was in the West of England in the time of Charles II., the women and even the schoolboys of Bristol and its neighbourhood were constant smokers at that early day. Bristol's exuberant loyalty was founded upon a strong sense of self-interest, and when James II. became King the Council hastened to spend £10 odd upon a portrait of that hapless creature. Moved by the same overpowering sentiment, they had the head painted out after he finally left his country for his country's good, and the portrait converted into one of Charles II.

In a book of this kind, which contains so much of varied interest, it is impossible to do more than pick out a tit-bit here and there; but the volume is full of good reading, and is exceedingly well arranged. The index, unfortunately, is not exhaustive.

Christ's College, Cambridge.

The history of CHRIST'S (5s.), in Mr. Robinson's "College Histories," by Dr. Peile, the Master of the College, could hardly be improved upon. It is an open secret that Dr. Peile has long been engaged on a full and comprehensive history of his college, and he comes to this task well primed. The amount of information packed into three hundred pages is astonishing, and no less so is the light touch which shows a complete mastery of the material. It all looks so easy, and yet it is a hard task to write a small history well. The buildings and constitutions, Christian worthies, and old-world customs, local controversies which once were so bitter and now seem so unreal, side-lights on ancient days, all appear in turn. Now and then some personage great in history stalks across the page, as when Queen Elizabeth visits the college: anon Dr. Peile, with ruthless hand, strikes at the root of some superstition dear and ancient, not sparing even the ci-devant Milton's mulberry tree. Many names famous in literature here meet us, Milton himself and his beloved Lycidas, Nicolas Grimald, J. Barnard (whose English Terence, by the way, is prose, not verse), the author of "Gammer Gurton's Needle": theologians and scholars, such as the seventeenth century Lightfoot or Paley; and one great man of science, Charles Darwin. Those who are interested in intellectual movements will find much here about the drama at Cambridge, or Cudworth and the Cambridge Platonists. On every page are traces of that dry humour which pupils of Dr. Peile know so well. It is a charming book, which members of Christ's should make a point of adding to their library shelves.

Cardiff.

The second volume of the RECORDS OF THE BOROUGH OF CARDIFF, edited by J. H. Matthews (Sotheran), does credit to the care of the authorities of Cardiff for the history of their town. This volume is a miscellany containing miscellaneous notes on the manors bordering on Cardiff; and the lords of the borough from Fitzhamon, Earl of Gloucester, in the reign of Rufus, the Clares, Despensers, Nevilles, Huberts, to the Stuarts, Marquesses of Bute, who had the good fortune to acquire it, just before its coals became black diamonds. Then follow extracts from "gaol files" from the reign of Henry VIII. of the "court of great sessions" to 1830, when they gave place to the ordinary English assizes. Quite out of place comes a copy of the Chantries certificate taken in the reign of Edward VI. on the dissolution of Chantries. The volume concludes with casual extracts from the corporation accounts and Custom-house records, and a somewhat pointless reprint of the commonplace book of one Morgan, an alderman, all of the eighteenth century. Some of the editorial comments leave a good deal to be desired in the way of completeness and knowledge. The materials are rather pitchforked together; and—a capital crime in such a book—there is no index. The illustrations of ancient seals, plans, and views are admirable.

Preston.

THE HISTORY OF THE PARISH OF PRESTON, by Henry Fishwick, F.S.A. (Elliot Stock, £1 16s. 6d.), is a handsome volume well illustrated from interesting old prints, and makes the leading contents of the local archives accessible to any one who desires to study them. It will not appeal to the general reader; but that does not matter, as it is not intended for the general reader, but for the local antiquaries and archæologists. No Preston patriot will submit to be without a copy if he can afford to buy one. He will find in the book not only the general history of the parish, but the history of its churches, its grammar school, its public charities, and its old families. The latter are dealt with in elaborate and carefully-compiled genealogies; and the book as a whole is an example of thoroughness and sound workmanship.

A cheap edition has been issued (Elliot Stock, 6s.) of Mr. Thomas Blashill's SUTTON-IN-HOLDERNESS: THE MANOR, THE BEREWIC, AND THE VILLAGE COMMUNITY. It is a most laborious and exhaustive piece of work, and a sterling contribution to Yorkshire topography.

"LIKE THE LEAVES."

The works of Giuseppe Giacosa are deservedly popular in Italy, and the praise accorded to the author of Una partita a scacchi and of Tristi Amori has not come from Italy alone. But it is seldom that a play from the pen of an author, however popular and accomplished, is received with such a chorus of approval as greeted the production of Giacosa's four-act comedy, COME LE FOGLIE, at the Manzoni Theatre at Milan last winter. The play has now been given to the world in book form, and we are able to judge of it as literature. Those who remember the author's complaint as to the lack of originality and sense of reality exhibited by the Italian dramatists, who concern themselves with nothing but the matrimonial triangle, will not be surprised or disappointed to find that that subject scarcely appears in this domestic comedy. For Like the Leaves is a domestic comedy, a drame de famille, to which M. Bourget's story "Le Luxe des Autres" bears many points of resemblance. It is not, indeed, strikingly novel in idea, but the treatment is fresh and sincere. The theme of the play is the enervating effect of riches on those who are brought up in a home of luxury, with no sense of responsibility, and with nothing to rouse their powers of resistance. Given a well-to-do family in which the father is an industrious man of business, content to work whilst his son and daughter grow up in ease on the fruit of his labours, given a frivolous, colourless step-mother, and a son whose chief occupation in life is the cult of the beautiful and whose chief asset is an "exquisite feeling for elegance," for whom the only excuse is the one he offers, "Everything in life has been made easy, too easy for me—life, knowledge, pleasure, benevolence, piety, vice—everything has been made so easy for me; one thing only has been difficult—to exercise my will," given, lastly, a daughter full of high ideals and vague aspirations who, for lack of opportunity and incitement, is frittering away her powers on lawn-tennis and high art, and we have, indeed, a family of which Giovanni Rosani must sadly confess that he is a bad father, for "This is a family which does not know how to face a storm. There is no fibre in it. Before the first blast of the wind it drifts—it drifts"—like the leaves!

The storm comes upon this family in the shape of financial ruin, and in their new home in Geneva we watch the gradual evolution of their characters under stress of circumstance. Tommy, utterly incapable of adapting himself to his new environment, takes to gambling—"the only polite way for a man like me to mend his position"—and, after several disgraceful escapades, drifts into the arms of a rich, disreputable widow. His sister, Nennela, tried by the fire which has ruined her brother, finds love and happiness at last with her cousin, Massimo, the one strong, sane character of the piece. It is in the character of Massimo, in his prosperity and his triumph, that the moral of the piece is to be found, and in him is embodied the author's ideal of the sane and social worker. The last act, in which his love finds its reward, is a beautiful little poem of sentiment, which satisfies the requirements of the audience and tones down the severity of the social lesson which the author has so forcibly and so cunningly taught.

Clearly, in such a play, it is in the vigour and sharpness with which the characters are drawn and realized for us, in the sympathy and tenderness with which they are treated, in the harmony of the scenes, the neatness and effectiveness of the dialogue, and the genuineness of the pathos that the secret of success must lie. Giuseppe Giacosa has succeeded, for he brings to his task the art of a skilled dramatist, just observation of life, and a perfect command of language. It is not wonderful, then, that Come le Foglie was hailed at Milan as a masterpiece of modern Italian drama.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Golden Deeds.

GOLDEN DEEDS OF THE WAR, by Alfred Thomas Story (Newnes, 5s.), is a very opportune compilation. Compiled, with a connecting link of narrative, from the letters of war correspondents, and the private letters home of officers and men, it narrates the heroic exploits of those who have distinguished themselves in action, and has 160 portraits by way of illustration. There is probably no boy who would not value the book as a birthday present. Its note is the glorification of "the common man—the salt of the earth—who, whenever the world falls into trouble and disease, saves it by the strength and singleness of his nature"; and Mr. Story is able to prove that "whoever else failed in their part—and some failed most lamentably—he always manfully held up his end, did his share of the work to be done, and did it to the wonder and admiration of the world."

Our Indian Frontier.

Mr. A. R. Colquhoun's RUSSIA AGAINST INDIA (Harpers, 5s.) is not a book of the same class as the author's recent treatises on the Chinese question. These, embodying the results of direct and diligent observation, were really valuable contributions to the literature of the subject. The work before us looks like hurried book-making; and such value as it has is only that of a primer briefly summing up the case for a "forward policy" on the Indian frontier. The first two chapters are historical, describing how Russia grew up and conquered Central Asia. Then come three chapters on the countries and peoples of Central Asia—much of their contents the merest padding about national costumes, tea-shops, dancing-girls, and the like. Finally, we have Mr. Colquhoun's views as to the measures which should be taken for the defence of India. His main idea is that we should garrison Afghanistan and reorganize the Afghan army; and to the suggestion that the Afghans might object he answers:—

Much can be accomplished by a skilful diplomacy. Probably a few easily-suppressed risings would be the only result, whilst the majority would soon become contented and happy under a beneficent rule.

The general view is that such a policy would result in throwing Afghanistan into the arms of Russia, and Mr. Colquhoun does not oppose that view with arguments but only with expressions of opinion. Nor does Mr. Colquhoun seem to us to write with the knowledge of the military expert in estimating the available resources of Russia in an invasion of India, or to recognize the probability that these resources will dwindle to very little, by well-known processes of attrition, when Russia has to operate at such a distance from her base. It would be unfair, perhaps, to reproach him for not discussing the probable effect of recent Chinese developments on Russian aggressiveness in other directions; but those developments have unquestionably affected the situation sufficiently to impair considerably the value of his conclusions. The best things in Mr. Colquhoun's books are the maps.

China.

Mr. Fisher Unwin opportunely issues a second edition of CHINA (5s.), Professor Robert K. Douglas' contribution to the Story of the Nations Series. There is a new chapter summarizing "Current Events," and a new preface in which the author makes his suggestions for the treatment of China in the future. His view is:—

> There is throughout China a large body of men, strong both unitedly and individually, whose representatives might fairly be constituted into a Council of State. Such men would not necessarily be of pronounced pro-foreign views, and all the more therefore would they be welcomed by the immense mass of the people who hold neither with the Manchu party nor with the extreme reformers. Such men fully recognize the backward condition of their country, and are prepared by the introduction of moderate reforms to raise the position of the people, while at the same time they would add strength to the nation by the adoption of modern arms and appliances.

It sounds plausible; but there are also those who hold that the less the Chinese have to do with modern arms the better for the civilized world.

Messrs. Blackwood send us an opportune re-issue of Miss C. F. Gordon Cumming's WANDERINGS IN CHINA (6s.), which relates the writer's travels twenty-two years ago. Most of the places which we now read about in the papers were then visited by Miss Gordon Cumming, and her descriptions of Tien-tsin, Peking, Ta-ku, and Chifu are vividly drawn, and very interesting to read at the present time.

Another seasonable publication is that by Mr. Murray of Lord Loch's PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF OCCURRENCES DURING LORD ELGIN'S SECOND EMBASSY TO CHINA IN 1860 (2s. 6d. n.). The book tells a story of which we have all recently been reminded; and, though it avoids lurid detail, it will be re-read with interest. There is a short preface by Lady Loch.

A Grand Tour.

The Marquis Ginstiniani, a wealthy Roman nobleman, growing tired of the palace that his father had built and adorned with some choice pictures of Raphael and Veronesi and less illustrious masters, under pretext of a pilgrimage to Loretto, quietly slipped out of Italy in the beginning of the seventeenth century, taking with him his trusty secretary, Bernardo Bizoni. This honest scribe took care during the journey, which lasted over four months, to keep a daily record of their adventures, now preserved in the Vatican library. Monsieur E. Rodocanachi, who has summarized the Italian manuscript in French, under the title of AVENTURES D'UN GRAND SEIGNEUR ITALIEN À TRAVERS L'EUROPE (Flammarion, 3fr. 50c.), would have done better, we think, to give extracts, with a running commentary to connect them. The narrative is interesting enough owing to the countries visited—Germany, England, and France—and to the period when the journey was effected. In Germany, Catholics and Protestants were mutually tolerant in the lull before the fierce storm of the Thirty Years' War. In England James I., in France Henri IV. were on the throne. At Dover, the Marquis met some Catholic Englishmen fleeing from persecution, and saw, at the Tower of London, the heads of Father Garnet, the Jesuit, and the authors of the Gunpowder Plot. In the Abbey, the tomb of Queen Elizabeth was being erected. Some Puritan broadsides shocked him greatly; almost as much as cockfighting, of which gentry and people seemed inordinately fond. On the whole, his stay in England did not leave upon him a favourable impression.

France and her King pleased him more. The secretary wrote eulogistically of the country, its strange customs, its prosperity, the extravagant dress of its townspeople. In the capital he was entertained by the King, and had the honour of seeing the Queen—a compatriot of his—and the King dine in state. Faithful Bizoni remembers the smallest peculiarities of the scene; the Queen declined twice to partake of a dish of soles, and as the weather was warm the wine was kept cool in a pail of water, "like those in which horses drink." The good secretary is evidently the first of a long line of modern reporters. We suppose that on p. 171 Marie must be substituted for Catherine, and on p. 177 crucifixion or cruciflement for crucifixation; the latter would have to be dubbed by French lexicographers an ἅπαξ λεγόμενον. This book, like the other contributions of the author to anecdotal history, particularly "Les Corporations ouvrières de Rome," and "Renée de France," will be read, not only with interest, but with pleasure.

Biography.

JOEL DORMAN STEELE, by Mrs. George Archibald (Gay and Bird, 5s.), is the biography of an American schoolmaster. Mr. Steele taught mixed classes, as is the fashion in America, and had a way of his own of managing girls. Having had trouble with some of them, he brought a raw hide whip into class with him. He first prayed that Divine providence would soften the hearts and mend the ways of the girls, and then announced his intention of "cow-hiding" any girl who misbehaved herself. From that day Mr. Steele became one of the great educational forces of the United States. He trained his pupils to such a pitch of perfection that they would sometimes cow-hide each other for breaches of discipline instead of waiting to be cow-hided by their teacher. We read the book with much pleasure, and recommend it to all those who are interested in questions of school discipline. It may not instruct, but it will not fail to amuse them.

Among the celebrities of the engineering profession Sir James Nicholas Douglass fills a notable place. He was Engineer-in-Chief to Trinity House, was concerned in the building of many important lighthouses—the Eddystone among others—and was the author of many valuable inventions for use in lighthouses. The leading events of his career are duly set forth, in a straightforward, though not very literary, manner by Mr. Thomas Williams in his LIFE OF SIR JAMES NICHOLAS DOUGLASS (Longmans, 3s. 6d.). The book incidentally contains a good deal of interesting information about lighthouse construction and the lives of lighthouse-keepers.

How we learn German.

The teaching and study of modern languages in our schools and colleges leave much to be desired. One great defect is the neglect of contemporary prose. Lessing, Schiller, and Goethe are read, but an acquaintance with Curtius, von Treitschke, von Sybel, Grimm, or Marie von Ebner Eschenbach would also be of the greatest use to modern students. A capital selection from modern German prose has just been published under the title of DEUTSCHE PROSA: AUSGEWAEHLTE REDEN UND ESSAYS, by Fraulein Margarete Henschke (Gera, Hofmann). It contains passages from the modern authors mentioned above and many besides. The extracts are grouped according to subject—history, literature, art, natural science, political economy, pedagogy, psychology, ethics, all find a place, and the pieces are in every case long enough to be interesting. We should like to see this book set by our examining bodies as well as the volumes to which they so affectionately adhere. We mean no disrespect to eighteenth-century German prose, but ability to read Goethe and Schiller is of small avail when confronted by Erich Marcks' historical treatises or Hermann Grimm's and Friedrich Theodor Fischer's critical essays. The average boy or girl wants to know German as spoken and written to-day. That accomplished, the literature can be studied at ease and leisure from the Nibelungenlied onwards. The careful study of Fräulein Henschke's "Deutsche Prosa" in all the higher forms of our schools would go far towards ensuring a practical knowledge of contemporary German.

Tennyson.

Tennyson has countless ardent admirers in Germany, even at a period when a burning interest in English literature has been succeeded by cold indifference and an attitude of assumed superiority. Professor Köppel, of Strasburg University, a student of our Elizabethan dramatists, has contributed a very able biography TENNYSON (Ernst Hofmann and Co., m.2.40) in a brief compass to the collection of "Geisteshelden." He says that cultivated Germans prefer the powerful human element in "Enoch Arden" to the "overweighted reflection" of "In Memoriam." Though a recent translation of the "lengthy elegy" has been thankfully received by German readers they hold it unworthy to rank in any way with Shelley's "Adonais," or to be mentioned in the same breath as Goethe's "Epilog zur Glocke." Another parallel unfavourable to Tennyson is drawn between his Ode on the Duke of Wellington and Theodor Fontane's Swan Song in two or three lines on the death of Bismarck. The latter is said to be infinitely finer because it is simpler and more spontaneous, and guiltless of the affectation of a "Pindar-strophe."

THE PRINCESS has been dramatized "for the use of schools" by L. Rossi (Dent, 1s. n.). The speeches are appallingly long, and we cannot imagine that any performance of the version would satisfy a critical audience, though the parents of the pupils might endure it. We hope the schools for which it is intended are girls' schools.

In TALES FROM TENNYSON (Constable, 3s. 6d. n.) the Rev. G. C. Allen, headmaster of Cranleigh School, gives us prose versions of some of the Idylls of the King. Surely the publication of such a book is a little unnecessary. For those who wish to read the story of the Idylls in prose, Mr. Allen cannot provide a better version than Sir Thomas Malory's.

Mountaineering.

When you come over the high passes leading to Aosta you see a fresh group of independent-looking Alps away to the South. These are the Graians, wherein, among other "honourable peaks," as the Japanese would put it, are included the Grivola and the Grand Paradis. It is a neighbourhood where most of the hotels are merely inns, and very few tourists are encountered. Mr. George Yeld has specialized in the district for more than twenty years, and his SCRAMBLES IN THE EASTERN GRAIANS (Unwin, 7s. 6d.) is a mine of useful information. The book is written in good sound Alpine Club English, and effervesces with quotations from the poets—or "bards," as Mr. Yeld sometimes prefers to call them. Bard after bard is pressed into the service until the general effect is that of a series of music-hall turns with a few appropriate words from the chairman interspersed. But why does Mr. Yeld speak of a well-known French climber and writer on Alpine subjects as "Herr" Javelle?

Guide-Books.

FARNHAM, by Gordon Homes (St. Bride's Press, 6d. n.), is one of the best of the "Homeland Handbooks," which are always good. The literary associations are, as usual, carefully dealt with; the great names being those of Toplady, William Cobbett, and Edna Lyall. This last writer contributes a preface with personal reminiscences.

Messrs. Ward, Lock's latest guide-books are a second edition of OBAN, FORT WILLIAM, AND THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS, and a third edition of LYNTON, LYNMOUTH, and NORTH-EAST DEVON (1s. each). The chapter on Exmoor strikes us as particularly good.

FICTION.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins is a writer who has not yet won the success to which his merits entitle him; but THE SILENT GATE (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.) should extend his reputation and increase the number of those who think his career worth watching. His great strength lies in this—that, though he has taken a subject which lends itself to sensational, and even to melodramatic, treatment, he knows how to be effective without being melodramatic or sensational. His book is a set of eleven short stories, all dealing with episodes of prison life; and they are done with a pathos that is never mawkish or conventional, and a humour that is never, or hardly ever, forced. One of the stories, indeed, which tells of an imprisoned mesmerist, who subdued the warders and the governor to his will, is pure farce; but the story called "Turkey" is delightful comedy. It is a study of a boy criminal distinguished by his high spirits, who regarded his sentence as a rise in life. He had expected to be sent to a reformatory; that he was sent to gaol he regarded as a recognition of his importance. His light-hearted attitude towards the little unpleasantnesses incidental to his confinement is at once amusingly and convincingly depicted. One is delighted to learn that he was reclaimed by the affianced bride of a warder and went to sea, and rose to be a mate. Other stories describe the difficulties of maintaining discipline on the female side. All the stories are written with admirable restraint. Originally, we believe, they appeared as a "series" in a popular magazine; and the conditions of a series are calculated to fetter the free play of talent. Such difficulties as those conditions presented, however, Mr. Tighe Hopkins has coped with successfully.

The Uncanny.

Those who like creepy stories must not fail to read Mrs. Clement Shorter's THE FATHER CONFESSOR AND OTHER STORIES OF DEATH AND DANGER (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.). The tales, with few exceptions, are gruesome and uncanny, and the characters—especially the men—are base, despicable, cruel, cowardly. Mrs. Shorter writes well, but it is a pity that her talent is wasted on the creation of such unsatisfactory personages. Pessimism, to be acceptable, must be done by a master hand, or redeemed by a sense of humour, as it was in the cases of Flaubert and Guy de Maupassant, and as it is not in the case of Mrs. Clement Shorter. It must, indeed, be very depressing for Mrs. Shorter to spend so much time in such gloomy and demoralizing company; but, perhaps, she is comforted by the consciousness that her descriptions of that company are rather good.

"The Long Ear of Fiction."

Although there are a few interesting books, such as the first on our list, just now is the dull moment for the readers of new novels. Had Carlyle, whose phrase we use above, had occasion to read THE AVENGING OF RUTHANNA (Long, 6s.), A GIRL OF THE NORTH (Greening, 6s.), THE FATALIST (New Century Press, 3s. 6d.), THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE (Heinemann, 6s.), A MILLIONAIRE OF YESTERDAY (Ward, Lock, 6s.), MANY DAUGHTERS (Digby, 6s.), THE MYSTIC NUMBER SEVEN (Simpkin, 6s.), ON ALIEN SHORES (Hurst, 6s.), HIS LAUREL CROWN (Downey, 3s. 6d.), he would have had ample cause for his acrimonious philippic against the "distressed" authors. Had Anthony Trollope, who made some attempt to refute Carlyle's strictures, waded through the banalities of these books, he would hardly have worded so compact a defence of his calling. But Trollope assumes that a novelist to be worthy shall "make virtue alluring and vice ugly." We do not think the writers of the above works are particularly concerned with that point of view. Their fault lies in the fact that they make vice and virtue and the musical glasses all equally uninteresting. In "Ruthanna" Mrs. Coulson Kernahan has to tell the story of a country girl misled by a town blood, and this is how she makes her characters talk:—

"And now, Victoria, tell me what you think of him."

"Well, to begin with, Violet," Victoria Lascelles made answer, with one of her fine smiles which always mystified people—they were so magnetic, so incomprehensible—"Well, to begin with, Violet, your brother is certainly handsome—and he knows it."

"Yes; and next?" queried Violet Calverley, trying to search the depths of her friend's fun-lit eyes. . . ."

And so forth, until we fear to meet the smile that mystifies people—so magnetic, so incomprehensible—and dread the "fun-lit" eyes. There are certain forms of fiction, very honest and worthy, sold in coloured wrappers at 1d., with lovely illustrations of noble people; it is to that class that the "Avenging of Ruthanna" belongs. Miss Helen Mileeete's "A Girl of the North" gives some rather good descriptions of Canadian weather and "a town called Musquodolist," but she does not succeed in giving life to her characters. Mr. David Ventors has nothing very new to tell in "The Fatalist," but he tells it fairly well; we have met duller books by better known writers. "The Voice of the People" is not likely to have any great vogue here although, no doubt, in America Miss Ellen Glasgow's work will make a direct appeal. She writes with skill and fluency, but lacks the humour which alone could make her long story agreeable. There is no new thing to be said of Mr. Phillips Oppenheim's work "A Millionaire of Yesterday"; it has the same qualities of popularity and the same faults as we have noted in other novels from his hand. It is said to be illustrated by Mr. Stanley Wood, but there is one drawing only by that excellent illustrator. We should have thought that the day for such a novel as "Many Daughters" by Miss Sarah Tytler had passed, but the demands for fiction are many, and no doubt, although we have not heard of it, the rather long drawn-out twaddle of "Many Daughters" finds amused readers. We had some hopes of "The Mystic Number Seven," but the cheap melodramatic conventions, in which Miss Annabel Gray indulges, rob her book of the note of truth without which no fiction delights. Miss Gray, however, has a good grip upon her story, and writes in a fashion that should be popular with the readers of her many other books. "On Alien Shores," by Miss Leslie Keith, is far better; the story of Susanna Mary Barentine's attempt to warm both hands at the fire of life is one that Mr. Anthony Trollope would have liked. It is a genuine piece of work. Miss A. M. P. Cooke calls her book "His Laurel Crown," a player's romance, but it is not that nor like anything that has a basis in reality. Occasionally, however, the stilted and wearisome style is laid aside, and Miss Cooke writes the conversations of the Irish poor with real observation and skill.

PAUL THE OPTIMIST, by W. P. Dothie (John Long, 6s.), would not be such a bad story if the dialogue were not mixed up with the text and the speakers with each other. A capable proof-reader would have saved the public some trouble. Paul's adventures and misadventures were enough to cure the optimism of any man outside a novel. The early part of the book is well written, except for the technical clumsiness we have mentioned.

Correspondence.

"NEW LIGHTS ON SIR WALTER RALEIGH."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have just read the articles by Mr. F. S. Boas in the last two numbers of Literature, in which he claims to have discovered among the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum original documents by means of which he is "able to cast new light on various phases of Raleigh's career."

But although none of Raleigh's biographers seem to have had access to these papers, they are not so wholly unknown to scholars as Mr. Boas supposes. About seven years ago the late learned Rev. Joseph Stevenson called my attention to them, and I then studied them carefully, in connexion with the visit of Giordano Bruno to this country.

If Mr. Boas will turn to the Month for June, 1894, he will find under the title "Atheism under Elizabeth and James I." an article containing not only the gist of these documents, but verbatim copies of the Cerne interrogatory, a selection from the most interesting depositions of persons who witnessed to Sir Walter's avowed opinions, and the report of the examination of Ralph Ironside, concerning his theological discussion with Raleigh and his brother, at Sir George Trenchard's table. In one footnote I gave the reference to the Harleian MS. from which Mr. Boas now quotes (6849, fol. 183), and in another I added the inscription which appears on the last page of the interrogatory. "Those examinations are the trew copies taken at Cerne, 21st March, 1593," an expression which led me to think that this was a contemporary copy of the original document, made on the spot, but still not the principal one. In this, however, I was probably mistaken.

Interesting as these papers are as evidences of the growth of free thought in England at the end of the sixteenth century, and of the manner in which it was regarded by those in authority, I cannot agree with Mr. Boas that they throw much "new light" on Raleigh's career. The brilliant explorer, historian, and dreamer was very well known even to his contemporaries, many of whom were intoxicated by the novelties of Giordano Bruno's teaching, which led them to the verge of Atheism. It was this speculative tendency that gave for a time to Raleigh's course its meteor-like appearance, only to end in darkness and disaster.

It is probable that Raleigh ceased long before his death to have any leaning towards Atheism, but the stigma clung to him to the last. At his trial in 1603, the King's Attorney addressed him as a "damnable Atheist," but his last words on the scaffold, fifteen years later, showed that he no longer deserved the epithet. They were these:—

"I have many sins for which to beseech God's pardon. Of a long time my course was a course of vanity. I have been a seafaring man, a soldier, and a courtier, and in the temptations of the least of these is enough to overthrow a good mind and a good man;" and he presently added:—"I die in the faith professed by the Church of England. I hope to be saved, and to have my sins washed away by the Precious Blood and merits of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

We know, therefore, independently of these documents, that Raleigh passed through a phase of unbelief, but died a believer. What they do show is the fact which I tried to bring out in my article, that the tendency towards Atheism was very widely spread in his day among the learned and the ignorant, and that this is illustrated by some curious instances.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

52, Lower Sloane-street, S.W. J. M. STONE.

RABELAIS AND THE PHONOGRAPH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It has before now been pointed out that two passages in Shakespeare's plays may be interpreted as prophecies of two great scientific discoveries of our age, photography and telegraphy. In King John, Act I., scene 1, we read

. . . . . the glorious sun
Stays in his course and plays the alchemist;

and in A Midsummer Night's Dream, Act II., scene 1,

I'll put a girdle round about the earth
In forty minutes.

Will you allow me to quote the following from Rabelais, who, having died in 1553, was, therefore, much older than Shakespeare, though the two belong to the same literary epoch? These lines are extracted from "La Vie de Gargantua et de Pantagruel," Book IV., ch. lvi. It will be seen that the famous curé de Meudon had, as it were, foreseen the phonograph:—

Seigneur, de rien ne vous effrayez. Ie est le confin de la mer glaciale, sus laquelle fut au commencement de l'hyver dernier passé grosse et félonne bataille, entre les Arimaspiens et les Nephelibates, lors gelarent en l'aer les paroles et cris des hommes et femmes, les chaplis des masses, les hurtis des harnois, des bardes, les hannissements des chevaulx et tout autre effroi de combat. A ceste heure, la rigueur de l'hyver passée, advenente la sérénité et tempérie du bon temps, elles fondent et sont ouies. Par Dieu, dist Panurge, je l'en croi. Mais en pourrions nous voir quelqu'une. Me souvyient avoir leu que, l'orée de la montagne en laquelle Moses receut la loi des Juifs, le peuple voyoit les voix sensiblement. Tenez, tenez, dist Pantagruel, voyez en ci qui encore ne sont desgelées.

I now leave your readers to make their own reflections, and

I remain yours truly,

ALF. HAMONET.

MILLER'S TEXTUAL COMMENTARY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I trust to your sense of justice to let me show as briefly as I can why I think you have misrepresented me in your review of the above work.

1. I am not "a follower of Burgon." Beginning more than forty-five years ago, long before Burgon wrote a word on Textual Criticism, when (as a pupil reminded me thirty years after) I taught my lecture the rudiments of the subject, and working in entire independence—though I have reached on main points the same conclusions that he reached—yet I differ on many details. I do not hesitate to overrule him with all respectfulness where I have reason to do so. I add to what I have accepted sceptically from him much historical consideration, as he acknowledged, and as I hold not a little philosophical judgment, and my method of controversy is not the same as his. But from such an independent standpoint, I am always ready to say that I owe him more than I can tell. So, falling for the nonce somewhat into his style of writing, allow me to say that, as I have been created and have lived so, I prefer to be my own self rather than a satellite of any other planet however grand it be, and claim to be so designated, as indeed, now I generally am.

2. May I also point out that the condemnation of me by your reviewer for not having included "Western readings" must be really due to his not having thought out the question. I have discussed all the alterations actually proposed in the chief constructions of the written text—viz., Tischendorf's, Westcott and Hort's, the Revisers', and the Textus Receptus. The idea of resorting beyond or instead of these to "the Western Text" has been only adopted in very recent years, and is still in embryo. What are the conclusions of its advocates, what the limits of its diffusion, which the passages championed, which are those that are recommended as genuine, no one knows till the results of investigation are published. The only thing certain is, that some students will be for some results and some for others. I know one instance which is located by one man as a Western reading, although it is rejected by every one of the accredited Western authorities. It must be observed that all the evidence supplied by the Western Text on passages treated in the commentary has been given by me. Therefore, to enter upon such a discussion before the Western Text (so favoured by its advocates) has been thoroughly threshed out and their (written) Text made public would be to encourage that very dilettanteism which it is my special purpose to see sunk beneath a business-like and exhaustive examination of evidence.

3. I venture to think that your reviewer might have said something about my great enlargement of previously existing evidence, when he was good enough, as I am glad to acknowledge, to speak favourably about some of my endeavours. Surely he cannot be one of those who are anxious to throw away virtually nineteen-twentieths of the documents which have descended to us.—Your obedient servant,

EDWARD MILLER,
Prebendary of Chichester.

Oxford, Aug. 13, 1900.

 In heading our remarks on Prebendary Miller's book with the words "A Follower of Dean Burgon," we did not mean to imply that the author had not studied his subject independently of Dean Burgon, but merely that he belongs to the same school of thought in textual matters.

As to Mr. Miller's second point, the word "Western" in the textual sense does not imply "Western" geographically. It is merely a name given to the readings found in certain authorities. The name is not a good one, but it is always used. Mr. Miller says that he could not quote it because it is not a published text. It is true that it has not been published in a continuous form, but it exists ready to hand in the "apparatus criticus" of Tischendorf which Mr. Miller used, and in sundry editions of MSS. which he also used. A Textual Commentary to be quite complete ought not, we think, to omit nothing readings which are as early as any known Greek codex simply because they have not formed part of the continuous text printed by three or four nineteenth-century editors, or by the group of sixteenth-century students who produced the Textus Receptus—Ed.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

We learn that Mr. George Gissing has nearly completed a new novel which will be called "The Coming Man."

A feature of the autumn season, so far as Mr. George Allen is concerned, will be a new series of verse translations of the Greek Dramatic Poets, with commentaries and explanatory essays, under the general editorship of Professor George Warr. There will be illustrations drawn directly from Greek sources. The editor's plan is to furnish in a running commentary what is required to explain each text in detail, introductory essays setting forth the more general aspects of the subject-matter and the poet's environment. The first volume, to be ready in November, will be Aeschylus: the Oresteian Trilogy, by Professor Warr, with an introduction on the rise of Greek tragedy. Vol. II. will be Sophocles: Oedipus Tyrannus and Coloneus, and Antigone, by Professor J. S. Phillimore, with an introduction on the Greek Theatre; Vol. III., Euripides, by Professor Gilbert Murray, with an introduction on Athenian society; while the fourth volume, by Professor Warr and Professor Murray, will include specimens of the Greeco-Roman as well as the Greek comedy, comprising the Frogs and Plutus of Aristophanes, and plays of Plautus and Terence, with an introduction on Greek and Græco-Roman comedy.

The Ruskin volumes to be published in the autumn by Mr. George Allen include "Thoughts from Ruskin," selected and arranged for the "Pensées" Series by Professor Attwell, and Mr. Wedmore's "Turner and Ruskin," particulars of which we gave some time ago. Professor Attwell's book is nearly ready; Mr. Wedmore's will be issued in October. Among Mr. Allen's other announcements are "The True and False Christ," by Colonel Garnier, in two volumes; "Oxford University Sermons," arranged for the Church's year, and edited by Professor Bebb; "The Holy Days: Vignettes in Verse," by the Rev. J. Gregory Smith; "Roses of Paestum," essays on Mediæval Italy by Edward McCurdy; and Volumes IV. to VI. (1871 to 1900) of "The Story of My Life," by Augustus J. C. Hare—mention of which has already been made.

Miss Cope's translation of Clara Tschudi's study of the Empress Augusta (to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein) will help to do justice to a woman who has been but little understood in this country. She was only seventeen years of age when, in 1829, she married William I., then Prince William of Prussia, and she was his partner during the eventful years which preceded his ascent of the throne in 1861, and the establishment of the Empire in 1870. She appears as a sad, disappointed figure in Miss Tschudi's biography. The Emperor had no appreciation for her intellectual tastes, and we are told that "the Imperial couple spent their fifty years of married life a thousand miles apart." Her connexion with the Red Cross has not been adequately acknowledged in England, but the substantial support which she gave to that society, her skill as an organizer, and her widespread benevolence are all dealt with in the present memoir.

The Putnams are issuing an edition de luxe in 200 numbered sets of Gov. Roosevelt's "The Winning of the West." It is to be called the Daniel Boone edition, and is printed on Dutch hand-made paper, with photogravures and steel plates on India paper, and several inserted sheets of the author's manuscript. This should sell in connexion with Gov. Roosevelt's candidature for the Vice-Presidency of the United States. The same author's volume on "Cromwell" which has been running through the Scribner's Magazine will be published shortly by Messrs. Scribners Sons.

The Oxford University Press has exhibited in three different groups at the Paris Exhibition, and has been awarded three Grands Prix—one each for Higher Education, Book-binding, and Oxford India Paper.

One of the rarer reprints of the autumn will be a new edition of the "Revelations of Divine Love," by the Lady Julian of Norwich. The Benedictine nun who wrote the "XVI. Revelations" died at Norwich in 1443, and a manuscript copy of her mystical work is at the British Museum. It was edited in 1670 by R. F. S. Cressy, and reprinted between fifty and sixty years ago. Another edition, from the British Museum manuscript, was included in the Medieval Library of Mystical and Aesthetical Works in 1877. The forthcoming edition (to be published by Methuen) is said to be a partially modernized version of the British Museum manuscript; it is edited by Mr. G. H. Warrack.

Messrs. Skeffington are publishing a pamphlet by Prebendary Wace on "English Religion: An Address in regard to Incense, Lights, and the Reservation of the Sacrament." Dr. Wace, although examining chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, has not hitherto come to the front in connexion with the present crisis in the Church. In his address he discusses the practical, as distinct from the merely legal, authority which the decisions carry, and considers the light thrown by the decisions themselves, and by the manner in which they have been received, upon the great questions now at issue.

A new American Shakespeare, which will be published by Messrs. Doubleday, Page, and Co., is to appear in September. The editor will be Professor Mark H. Liddell, who was the head of the English department of the University of Texas, and who was one of the editors of the "New Globe Chaucer." The text is to be in the style of the Elizabethan period, and is not to be modernized, and will also be based upon the first folio edition.

Mr. T. G. Wallace, a graduate at Trinity College, Dublin, has written a little book, entitled "True Imperialism," his twofold object being to direct greater attention to the spiritual claims of our colonies and to procure large support for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Messrs. Skeffington are publishing the book.

FICTION.—Among the novels to be published during the autumn by Messrs. F. V. White will be "May Silver," by Alan St. Aubyn; "A Self-made Countess," by John Strange Winter; "The World's Blackmail," by Lucas Cleeve (Mrs. Howard Kingscote); "In White Raiment," by William Le Queux; "Captain Landon," by Richard Henry Savage; "The Justice of Revenge," by George Griffith; "In Sheep's Clothing," by Hume Nisbet; and a new book by Bertram Mitford.

Messrs. Everett will publish next month a story by the Rev. C. Dudley Lampen, entitled "Barcali the Mutineer," a tale of the great Pacific. It deals with the discovery of a strange colony.

Miss Ada Cambridge, whose stories of Australian life are well known, has written a book entitled "Path and Goal." Messrs. Methuen will publish it immediately.

SCIENTIFIC.—Part II. of Colonel Swinhoe's Catalogue of Eastern and Australian Lepidoptera Heterocera in the collection of the Oxford University Museum will be issued by the Clarendon Press shortly. It is eight years since the first part was published.

Messrs. A. and C. Black will have ready in a few weeks the second part of the "Treatise on Zoology," edited by Professor Ray Lankester. Part III., being ready first, has already been issued. The same publishers have just brought out the second part of their translation of Dr. Otto Schmeil's "Text-book of Zoology," for the use of schools and colleges. The third and concluding part, dealing with insects, will be ready in about three weeks.

In a few days Messrs. Methuen will publish a volume on "The Construction of Large Induction Coils," by A. T. Hare, M.A. Numerous diagrams are included.

There will be an article on "Some Characteristics of Icelandic Poetry," by the Rev. W. C. Green, in the September number of the Antiquary.

Mrs. Alec Tweedie purposes spending next winter in Mexico in order to write a new book on that country. Her volume, "Through Finland in Carts," is just ready in a new edition, to which has been added a chapter on the present political struggle in Finland and a portrait of the author.

A new volume of essays on social and ethical subjects, by J. H. Dingle, is in the press, entitled "Life's Golden Counsels," and will shortly be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Messrs. Skeffington are bringing out a new book by the Rev. E. H. Sugden entitled "The Twentieth Century Parson." The scene is laid in Bradford.

The same firm are also publishing a new volume by Mr. Henry James, entitled "The Soft Side." It is a series of pictures of the different ways in which people may feel about the same thing, and the adventures that may ensue from such feelings.

"With the Boer Forces," by Mr. Howard C. Hillegas, will also come from Messrs. Methuen. The author was with the force which attempted to relieve Cronje at Paardeberg, and was present during a considerable part of the Siege of Ladysmith, at the Battle of Colenso, and at the surprise of Sanna's Post.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The International Congress on Literary and Artistic Property just held in Paris has done some good work. The chief theme of discussion has been the elaboration of an ideal legislative Bill to unify the laws on authors' rights. The principle has been laid down that no intellectual product should be left unprotected. As duration of protection the Congress adopted a period of eighty years after the author's death. Posthumous works are by this law to be protected for the same period in the person of their publisher. Illustration of a work without the writer's authority and the transformation of a novel into a play are regarded as illicit appropriation. Only brief citation is to be allowed, save of political speeches. Foreign authors are to be treated exactly as national writers. As regards the Press, the Paris Congress, like the previous ones of Monaco and Turin, holds that reproduction of information in a daily paper should be interdicted when it is evidently inspired by disloyal rivalry.

* * * *

In practice the prevention of the illicit adaptation of novels for the stage will not, perhaps, be quite so easy as the members of the Congress think. It is easy enough, of course, to protect the title and the text; and the English law does already protect the novelist's text against playwrights, as was shown in the famous Little Lord Fauntleroy case. An injunction was obtained against the adapter on the ground that he had "multiplied copies" of portions of the novel. The essence of a novel, however, from the adapter's point of view, does not lie in the title, or the text, or the names of the characters, but in the situations and the ideas; and one does not easily picture a law for the protection of literary ideas which would be certain in its application and would not be open to grave abuses on the part of the literary blackmailer.

* * * *

We mentioned a few weeks ago that the Stage Society proposed to enlarge its ranks. The first annual report, which was issued last week shows 300 ordinary and 100 associate members. The Society will henceforth be open to 600 ordinary members and 200 associates. The subscriptions remain the same. "Two or more" representations of each play will be given instead of one. Another innovation is contained in the rule that the "general manager" and the "dramatic manager" shall be paid "not more than £350 a year." This considerably alters the basis upon which the Society was founded. Nothing is said in the report about the plays for next season. There has been talk of the production of a piece by Mr. George Meredith.

There seems, after all, to be no truth in the suggestion that "Elizabeth and her German Garden" was written by Princess Henry of Pless. Whoever the author is, she keeps her secret well. Long may she keep it if that is the condition upon which we are to have more books from her pen. Messrs. Longmans have in the press another, but a very different kind of book, written by the English wife of a German nobleman, which Elizabeth clearly is. This is the "Memoirs of the Baroness de Bode." The baron, although a German, possessed a fief in Alsace, and, being driven out, was forced to become an émigré, and to seek refuge in Russia. It is of these stirring times that the book will tell, a chronicle quite unlike Elizabeth's mirror of tranquil days.

Major Pond's announcements for 1900 and 1901 are interesting reading. We have already mentioned what the Major calls "my big attraction"—viz., Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill, whose lecture will probably be called "To Pretoria and Back." Another visitor to the platforms in the United States will be Madame Sarah Grand, who is going over in January, 1901. Mr. Seton-Thompson is engaged upon a lengthy series of lectures on his three books—"Wild Animals I Have Known," "The Personality of Wild Animals," and "Wild Animals at Home." He begins a further tour round the States for fifteen weeks beginning October 15 next. Mr. Julian Ralph, who has been corresponding for more than one paper in South Africa, has been engaged. He relies solely on his actual words, and never uses a lantern. Mr. Ralph is an energetic literary man. Besides the talking and the "corresponding" he managed to collect "copy" for a second volume of "Scenes and Stories of the War"; he is writing a novel about women in the United States—what they are and what they might be; and he is preparing a volume for the aspiring author to be called "The Delightful Art of Writing Papers." "R. L. S." is to be represented by Mrs. Isobel Strong. She describes the home life of the Stevensons among the Friendly Islands, the wars, amusements, and the public life of the Samoans. It will be remembered that some time ago there was published in this country a volume of Canadian Poems entitled "The Habitant," which Mr. Howells praised in these columns. Dr. William Henry Drummond, the author of this volume of poetry, has yielded to the blandishments of the persuasive Major, and is to add to his fame by personal lecturing about the French-Canadian. The fact that we have just had an English edition of Captain Slocum's book should make interesting the news that he is talking in America to crowded audiences. He will also go on to Canada, and tell of his voyage, all alone, around the world on the sloop "Spray." Other lecturers are Mr. Richard Kearton, F.Z.S., author of "Wild Life at Home": Mr. Savage Landor on his terrible experiences in Tibet; and Mr. Poultney Bigelow on Manila, the Boer War, Imperialism, &c.

A Correspondent writes:—

"Can any of your readers inform me of the existence of a literary correspondence club, the members of which contribute articles, essays, &c., at regular intervals? I shall be pleased to hear of any such club."

* * * *

Apropos of certain episodes in certain novels by Miss Corelli, Mr. G. S. Street, in the course of his pleasant causerie in the Pall Mall Magazine, expresses his disbelief in "vile and sinister plots hatched in horrible literary clubs" for the purpose of stopping the sale of works of genius. Such plots are undoubtedly rare, but that unfortunately they are not impossible is shown by a case the evidence for which we have good reason to believe authentic. It was not a plot against Miss Corelli, and, indeed, the matter is all now past history, and the actors in it are dead. We give it, therefore, without names, merely as an illustration of what is possible. The plot, which was not only hatched but successful, was against an eminent authority on a particular branch of folk lore. There were only three recognized authorities on the subject—A, the author, and B and C, reviewers—and A had once been very rude to B and C. Consequently, when A's book came out, B and C were waiting for it, and each of them managed to write, we believe, seventeen reviews of it. They knew better than to attack it violently. Their method was to dismiss it with good-natured indulgence in paragraphs of about half-a-dozen lines. Their verdict was accepted, and the volume fell stillborn from the press. "It was a d——d shame, for it really was a very good book," said one of the reviewers in question when he told the story to the writer who now records it.

The announcement that Mr. Martin Harvey is having a play written round the character of Master François Villon gives one a shiver when one recollects the treatment to which this actor subjected Don Juan. We do not want a whitewashed Villon; indeed to whitewash so black an object would be a heroic task. Nor does the notion of a series of invented incidents with Villon for their central figure seem particularly attractive. The incidents of his life that we know would scarcely lend themselves to dramatic treatment—at any rate for our stage. The robbing of the church of St. Mathurin might perhaps serve, or the brawl in front of St. B'noît in which Master François got his lip cut open and the priest Sermaise was killed. Villon in the pit-prison of the Bishop of Orleans would make a piteous stage-picture, too. But these are but slender materials for a play. "Grosse Margot" is not a likely heroine, nor does the story of Catherine de Vausselles, who had Master François beaten by the stout arm of Noë le Joly when his attentions became too troublesome, suggest the sort of thing that would suit Mr. Martin Harvey's admirers.

Among Mr. Heinemann's art publications this autumn will be issued a portfolio of sixteen pastels reproduced in colours, by Mr. Wm. Nicholson, of "Celebrated Characters from Romance." The characters represented are Don Quixote, Miss Fotheringay and Captain Costigan, Mr. Weller, Rochester, Madge Wildfire, Jorrocks, Chicot, Commodore Trunnion, Vanslyperken, Mulvaney, Gargantua, John Silver, Sophia Western, Baron Munchausen, Miss Havisham, and Porthos. Mr. William Nicholson is certainly audacious. A portrait may be like or it may not; it can be compared with the original and by the comparison the artist must stand or fall. But creatures of the poet's, of the novelist's imagination, can they be pictured to please everybody? We all have our own mental pictures of Porthos and Mr. Weller, Mulvaney, and Captain Costigan, John Silver, Mr. Rochester, and the rest. We all imagine our Sophia Westerns and Miss Fotheringays for ourselves, and deeply resent any endeavour to tear from us our settled convictions as to their charms. Don Quixote we are agreed about: there is a regular Don Quixote type. But all the rest of Mr. Nicholson's characters leave room for the widest difference of opinion except, perhaps, Miss Havisham. Dickens' wonderful description brings the wrinkled old woman in the faded bridal dress so vividly before us that, if Mr. Nicholson follows his author closely, there will be no disagreement possible in that instance at any rate.

On February 4, it will be remembered, a meeting was held at University College to celebrate the seventy-fifth birthday of Dr. Furnivall and to recognize publicly the services which he has rendered to all students of English literature, both by the publication of texts and by helping to originate the new English Dictionary. The testimonial then offered to Dr. Furnivall included a volume of essays on English literature, to be written by well-known scholars of Europe and America, and published in his honour. This volume is now announced for publication in the autumn, under the title of "An English Miscellany," by the Clarendon Press. A boat, a portrait, and the raising of a special fund to make some provision for the continuation of his life work by placing the Early English Text Society on a sound financial footing are the other forms taken by the testimonial. The boat was Dr. Furnivall's own idea when asked what he could suggest as a personal gift—the oarsman who, with J. Beesley, built the first two narrow rowing-boats in England as far back as 1815, and who introduced the first sculling-four and sculling-eight races in 1866-67 being still able to pull his boat on the Thames, summer and winter alike. It was in a London copy of Dr. Furnivall's boat in 1816 that Newell beat Clasper, the only time he was ever beaten.

On the spot at the south-east corner of Fleet-street, where the houses have just been destroyed for the purpose of widening the thoroughfare, stood the house of Russell, the tailor, in which for a brief time Milton lived. If we are to credit Aubrey, it was from this small tenement in St. Bride's that the poet's first wife, Mary Powell, left him to visit her family, and refused to return. Afterwards, however, a reconciliation was effected. "His first wife," we are told, "was brought up and lived where there was a great deal of company and merriment, dancing, &c., and when she came to live with her husband at Mr. Russell's, in St. Bride's Churchyard, she found it very solitary, no company came to her, oftentimes heard his nephews beaten and cry; this life was irksome to her, and so she went to her parents." From St. Bride's Milton removed, about 1641, to a house in the Barbican where, although he still continued to teach, he devoted more time to writing. The temporary gap in the buildings enables those who fare along the highway of letters to gain an exceptionally fine view of the church, where Wynkyn de Worde, the great printer, Richard Lovelace, the cavalier poet, Samuel Richardson, Sir John Denham, and other writers are buried.

* * * *

The shadow of more than one character in Dickens hovers round the precincts of St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet-street, in the exterior of which certain alterations are about to be made. Besides the considerable prominence awarded to the church in "Master Humphrey's Clock," it is referred to in "Barnaby Rudge" and gives the background of the scene where "Maypole" Hugh refreshes himself, at the pump "which stood hard by," before visiting Sir John Chester at the Temple over the way. The drinking-fountain, shortly to be removed, is doubtless the modernized form of the veritable pump. "St. Dunstan's Grants," mentioned in the same story and in "David Copperfield," were removed when the older church was demolished, circa 1830, and are now preserved at Lord Aldenham's town residence, St. Dunstan's-house, Regent's-park. The "small grating in the portal" of the Middle Temple, through which Hugh greeted the night porter, is still extant. The lantern-like tower of the present church figures in two of the illustrations (by Richard Doyle and Clarkson Stanfield respectively) in "The Chimes," although the church is not specifically named by Dickens, who, indeed, seems to have had in his mind a much older structure. Stanfield, in his pretty drawing, has taken considerable licence in introducing in the background both the Monument and the tower (with its buttressed spire) of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East, neither of which is visible from Fleet-street.

* * * *

In Longmans Mr. Andrew Lang makes some characteristic remarks on the unwisdom of poets who send presentation copies of their works to other poets. He says that the other poets do not like it; and we seem to remember a literary quarrel which originated because the late Mr. Eric Mackay paid this attention to Mr. Swinburne. Our recollection of the newspaper correspondence that ensued is that it could hardly have been more violent if Mr. Mackay had punched Mr. Swinburne on the nose. What poets should remember is that other poets are just the last people in the world to whom their poetry is likely to appeal if it lacks inspiration, and that it is by no means certain to appeal to them even if it possesses inspiration. A priori one would have expected Byron to be capable of appreciating Wordsworth; it is a hard fact of literary history that he did not. The good all round cultivated man is, in fact, far more likely to say a good word for the rising poet than are his brother singers. Among contemporary poets, most of those who were not discovered by Mr. Gladstone were discovered by Mr. Grant Allen. Lord Tennyson cared little for the younger men; though he once told a Japanese interviewer that he preferred Browning to Matthew Arnold, but thought Matthew Arnold a more suitable person to succeed him as laureate.

* * * *

The same magazine contains an excellent article on Mademoiselle de Lespinasse. There is, perhaps, no woman whose career throws a more instructive light on the inner life of eighteenth-century society in Paris. Illegitimate, unmarried, ugly, poor, living a life certainly not above reproach, she nevertheless conducted a salon which the most famous men in France delighted to frequent. One is lost in admiration of her cleverness. She is the most interesting, if not the most famous, of the women of the Salons; and Mr. S. G. Tallentyre's account of her is admirably written.

A correspondent writes:—"Have publishers of late been too eager to place on the market éditions de luxe of modern writers? The now highly accounted Edinburgh edition of Stevenson practically led the way. I chance to know that when prominent London booksellers were first approached as to the possibility of subscribers in sufficient numbers coming forward, many of them regarded the scheme with distrust. Nor was it till after Stevenson's death that the volumes were in great request. Since then similarly limited editions, well printed on good paper, of the complete works of Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Walter Pater, and several more, have been published. The following table shows the present market-value, and gives other details, of three prominent editions:—

	No. of Volumes.	Printer	No. of Copies	Price per Volume	Cost of Set	Value 1900 Highest	Value 1900 Lowest
				s. d.	£ s.	£	£ s.
Stevenson	28	T. & A. Constable	1,035	12 6	17 10	36	33 0
Meredith	32	..	1,025	10 6	16 16	12	12 0
Kipling	20	T. & R. Clark	1,050	10 6	10 10	19 (19 vols.)	6 15

The fall from £19 to £6 15s. in the Kipling has taken place with unexpected rapidity. A couple of months ago the 20 volumes realized at auction almost double the issue price, whereas now, presumably, they can be bought for about £7. The Meredith set has not frequently come up for sale, and the tendency here, it may be, is in an upward rather than in a downward direction. Undeniably the Stevensons, as books—alike as to print, paper, and binding—take a first place. By the way, six vols., large paper, of the complete works of Byron, now being issued by Messrs. Murray at a guinea apiece, have fetched £8."

* * * *

The late Robert Louis Stevenson endeavoured to master the Gaelic language, but failed ignominiously, it appears. Mr. Charles J. Guthrie, Q.C., who has just been appointed Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty, has been relating something of Stevenson's experience in this line. The sheriff, in replying to the welcome given him by the Bar at Stornoway, expressed his thankfulness for the advantages he had had in his youth, but bemoaned one drawback—he had not been instructed, as he should have been, in the earliest language in the world. And he feared he was too old to acquire the Gaelic now. Robert Louis Stevenson, he said, told him he had spent a considerable amount of time and trouble trying to learn the language, and at last thought he had advanced so far that he might speak it. He addressed an old Highland woman in a simple sentence which he supposed, and intended, to be Gaelic, but what was his chagrin when the old body calmly informed him that she "did not have the English!"

William Nicholson, to commemorate whom a memorial has been erected at Borgue, about six miles from Kirkcudbright, belongs to the class of poets whose names are associated, almost exclusively, with one of their works. Nicholson's excellent "Brownie of Bleduoch" is a fine specimen of ballad folk-lore, and is well known and frequently quoted north of the Tweed. But few of his other poems are ever heard of outside of his native district—in which he is still held in high repute, although more than half a century has passed away since his death. "The Wandering Homer of Galloway" was born in very humble circumstances in 1782 or 1783—according to the inscription on the monument it was 1783, but this is a disputed point. He seems to have been averse to systematic study and had no great desire for education. For many years he was a pedlar, but he was only moderately successful. Fond of the pipes, he frequently played at country gatherings and eked out his living in this way. But he had the gift of poetry. It was but rude and untutored, but the gift was there. Encouraged by Hogg ("the Ettrick Shepherd") and others, he published, in 1811, a volume of "Tales in Verse and Miscellaneous Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Manners." This brought him about £100. It was very well received, and fourteen years later another edition was published. A third edition appeared in 1878. There are several pieces in the collection which possess no small degree of poetic merit. But unquestionably the "Brownie of Bleduoch" is Nicholson's best work. Unfortunately, the poet fell to some extent into dissipated habits. He visited London in 1826, and was befriended by Allan Cunningham. It is said that he expected to be received by George IV., and was greatly disappointed and aggrieved by his failure to secure an interview with the King. He died in 1849. The proposal to erect a monument to his memory in his native parish was first made about two years ago, and funds were speedily raised. The memorial, which has now been formally unveiled, consists of a bronze panel of the poet, set in a huge block of grey granite. The panel is flanked by a representation of the poet's beloved pipes and a laurel spray.

In connexion with the forthcoming Chaucer quincentenary we should like to see reprinted a paper read at the recent Congress of the British Archæological Association by the Rev. W. S. Lach-Szyrma on Wiclif and his times, a paper which has the greatest literary value of any that were read at this Congress. It was an able plea for the study of Chaucer, Piers Plowman, and Wiclif by all who wished to understand more of the social life of England in one of the most attractive periods of her history—i.e., the age between Crécy and Agincourt, the era of Edward III., Richard II., and Henry IV. and V. He regarded Wielif not so much in the light of a religious reformer as in that of a social and political philosopher, and a highly interesting parallel was drawn between him and the late Professor Jowett, both masters of Balliol. Wielif's immunity from persecution he owed, no doubt, largely to the all-powerful influence of John of Gaunt, but the Church of the fourteenth century was really wonderfully tolerant of his Utopian and idealistic opinions. In producing and cherishing Wielif, Oxford showed herself to be then, as now, the mother of "new movements."

* * * *

The demand for editions of Omar Khayyam keeps up bravely in the United States. There, too, they like them illustrated. Mr. Doxey, the famous bookseller, late of San Francisco and now of New York, has just announced a new issue of FitzGerald's poem with illustrations by Miss Florence Lundborg, a young Californian artist. These, unlike Mr. Elihu Vedder's drawings for Omar, which were in "wash," will be in "line." Miss Lundborg is also doing for Mr. Doxey drawings to illustrate Mr. Kipling's "Recessional." Surely there never was a poem that called for illustration, or would even permit of it, less than this!

* * * *

In spite of the ascendancy of the historical novel in the United States, the world of humour is also well represented. Besides "Mr. Dooley" and "David Harum" quite recently another volume composed of delightful humorous philosophy has appeared, though it has not been noticed much in this country at present. The title is "The Chronic Loafer," and the author is a new writer, Mr. Nelson Lloyd. "The Chronic Loafer" is not such a bad man as one would imagine, and Mr. Lloyd's sympathetic treatment of him is full of humour.

Great interest attaches to the solemn ceremony of transporting the ashes of Dante to the new Library Palace at Florence. It will be remembered that, according to authentic historical documents, the remains of the poet were taken away from the Ravenna Church and deposited secretly in the outer wall of the chapel of Bracciofarte, where they were discovered in 1865. The celebrated sculptor, Enrico Pazzi, whose monument to Dante stands in the Place Santa-Croce, in Florence, was in possession of the iron urn containing the ashes of the poet for several years, but, at the request of the director of the National Library of Florence, Pazzi consented to hand over his treasure to the city of Florence, which was the birthplace of Dante.

1890 and 1900

In his literary letter which appears weekly in the Sphere Mr. Clement Shorter generally has something to say that is fresh and opportune. Moreover, as he has for a considerable time been a close observer of what is happening day by day in the world of letters, he is by no means ill qualified for the task of diagnosing its changing phases, and of taking the temperature as it were, of the reading public. In his last week's letter he does this with a particularity which is not often attempted by the critic. That we are not as our fathers: that under the influence of a cheap press we have become restless and superficial, with an intellectual appetite voracious indeed, but debased, and with our mental muscles so relaxed and attenuated as to be incapable of any serious and continued labour, all this we have been told so often that we are in danger of becoming quite indifferent to it. But to compare 1890 with 1900 is an operation much less facile and obvious. None of those changes which conspicuously alter social routine—unless it be the addition of the bicycle to the necessaries of life—have occurred during this decade. Ten years ago all these nineteenth-century "improvements," which, as the philosopher would have us believe, are ruining the national health, were in full swing. Yet change there must have been, and we owe some gratitude to the physician who can note the almost impalpable variations in the mental habits of a nation which can take place in so short an interval. Mr. Shorter says that the younger generation are not reading half so strenuously as their elder brothers and sisters ten years ago. And one reason for this is the advent of the cheap single-volume novel. The old "three-deckers" were, he says, published mainly for the circulating libraries, and were principally read by women of superfluous leisure. Most young people, Mr. Shorter roundly asserts, never opened them. They spent their money only on first-class fiction that had survived the test of time or on good biography and history. Witness the success of the "English Men of Letters" Series. Most of us, we think, will hardly recognize this reminiscence of the young person of the later eighties. We do not picture him sternly refusing to read anything but classical fiction and sound literature. But the sale of single-volume novels was, as a matter of fact, in full swing before 1890. Going back a little further than Mr. Shorter does, we should find, no doubt, that less fiction was published and less read, because the facilities were not so great. But we are not discussing here the three-volume novel and its influence. It is the note of alarm as to the younger brothers and sisters which concerns us. Are they really reading less strenuously year by year? Nothing is at once more easy and more difficult than to make an affirmation about the social life in which we are ourselves moving. Inevitably we judge to some extent from what we know of our own acquaintance. Limited as this must be, it is probably representative of a wider circle, and we may, without further investigation, make an estimate, say of its literary habits, which as a half truth may be entitled to some respect. But even this is affected by all kinds of chances arising out of our own temperament, the extent of our acquaintance, the standard by which we judge them. A leading weekly review, which is in the habit of assuming the rôle of the thoughtful critic of the times, ventured the assertion the other day that culture was the only passport into good "Society" at the present moment. We are much afraid that the writer of this curious deliverance illustrates another danger to which a social observer is exposed, viz., the desire to say what will attract attention rather than what is true. Mr. Shorter is proof against this temptation; he is perfectly sincere in what he says; and his individual expression of opinion has a distinct value. But it does not seem to take account of all the facts. Macmillan's "English Men of Letters" began, we think, in 1881—in the comparatively early days of "series," and its success therefore attracted more attention. Since then there has been a flood of series representing "good history and biography," many of them selling largely. And if the first five years of the decade were the period of series, the last five have been the period of reprints. The publishers are certainly not likely to go on issuing innumerable volumes of English classics if nobody buys them; and it may therefore be inferred that an infinitely larger amount of good literature which has survived the test of time is being at least purchased in 1900 than was the case in 1890. This is a solid fact which must be set against any conclusion drawn from an individual impression. Another is the distinct if slight advance made in educational organization during the ten years, both in the way of a widening of its area, and of a closer and more serious attention to its practical working. It is indeed by deducing a conclusion from such premisses as these rather than by basing it on any inductive observation of social manners that we can really gauge the tendencies of the time. If a change can be traced in so short a period as a decade, we should sum it up thus: more fiction is undoubtedly published and read, but there is a much larger public for it, and a public which gets through more reading; life is being lived at a slightly heightened speed—partly in consequence of increased facilities for locomotion, for the bicycle, in which some publishers, we believe, see an hindrance to the sale of books, is, it must be remembered, above all things a time saver; interest in good literature has, if anything, grown rather than diminished; the love of sport among "young people," excessive though it be, has not latterly been tending to a still greater excess but rather the reverse; and these facts do not, as we believe, justify the opinion that the rising generation do less good reading than their elder brothers and sisters.

Personal Views.

THE JOYS OF WRITING.

Much has been written of the pleasures of reading, but authors are curiously silent as to the joys of writing. Of the profits thereof, we hear, indeed, more than enough, and much, most writers will admit, that is misleading. But the truth will sometimes out; the best antidote I know to the cacoethes scribendi is the perusal of Mr. George Gissing's "New Grub Street." That book should cure any youthful enthusiast of the idea that he is likely to earn a livelihood by writing books. Man cannot live by books alone, and journalism, though it may supply him with bread and butter, is a mere waste of time and a weakness of the flesh on the part of any one who starts, as most journalists do, either with a true love of literature or with the intention of making his mark as a man of letters.

Yet, apart from starvation and writer's cramp, there is joy in authorship. First and foremost are the pleasures of imagination, and the joy of the companionship of our own creations—little Melchizedeks, without father, without mother, who spring up unbidden in the brain and people with their presence and fill with the sound of their voices the room of our solitary and retired imagination. They are not dull, they are not tedious, these children of fantasy; they are much more lively than the living. These unsubstantial phantoms live and move and have their beings in the mind, but they seem more real than the shadowy, colourless men and women of this ordinary, actual world. With this priceless gift of imagination we can, though plunged in sorrow and vexation of spirit, by an effort of will put our troubles from us and turn to the strange, necromantic joys of fancy, and with the imagined adventures, delights, sorrows, and loves of these imaginary folk fill up, for the time, the blank of our desolation. "Let us talk of realities," exclaimed Balzac. "Let us discuss Eugénie Grandet." . . . There is, too, a joy, an intense, indefinable joy, when suddenly, as you turn to utter some trivial remark or bend down to light a spill for your pipe, an idea, an inspiration, as you are pleased to call it, flashes into your brain and illumines the darkness of your sterility. There is a joy when, in the throes of composition, you suddenly strike on the happy expression, the appropriate word or the new combination of words, and you are glad that a great phrase is born into the world; there is a joy when you write "Finis" to a book, the satisfaction in the accomplished task as you complete the work which has been crushing you for months or years; there is a joy of proof-sheets and an ineradicable delight in the handling of the first copies of your own new book; there is a joy of reviews, the bitter pleasure of comparing the contradictory verdicts of the critics, of discovering the reviewer's ignorance or tracing the cause of his spite; rarely, too rarely, there is the joy of acknowledging the debt you owe to his criticisms, the advantage your next edition will derive from his corrections, and the delight you feel in reading his well-written review. There is joy, again, rarer still and yet more precious, in the note from your publishers which informs you—ah, how seldom! in prose so bad, so business-like and yet so honey-sweet!—that a new edition has been called for, that a reprint is in contemplation.

But all these, it must be confessed, are pleasures that spring from the written or the unwritten word, the unformed or the formed. As to writing itself, the mechanical process of reducing thought to a more or less permanent form, most authors will confess that they have no pleasure in it, and to type-writing still less. It is manual labour of the meanest, drudgery kind, and mental drudgery of the most nauseating. Who among those who are supposed to write at ease has not experienced the terrible sensation which the French so aptly name "horreur de la plume?" The only circumstance in which writing can be really pleasurable is when the imagination is untrammelled by the critical faculty and the writer is exalted by the vain conceit of his own cleverness or the overwhelming vehemence of his fantasies. Most authors find that this is what happens when they write late at night and they are content, therefore, to think or talk in the evening, and in the morning to turn out their tale of bricks. For after midnight a strange sort of fever seizes the brain; it is a form of intoxication, most exquisite, most fraudulent. Two o'clock in the morning courage may be the best and solidest form of human bravery, but the writing of that hour is apt to be brilliant but unsteady work, hysterical, and not quite sane. It is the offspring of a feverish enthusiasm, born of a brain that has caught fire while the judgment sleeps. Like the bright conversation at a dinner-party, which owes its brightness to so large an extent to the hour and the champagne and the excitement engendered in the mind by light and warmth and beauty, it is when reviewed next morning or in the cold greyness of after years, if not altogether stale and flat, certainly unprofitable. Amazingly clever as such work may seem to the happy writer at the moment, yet, when his judgment wakes and his brain is cool, he will too often have to acknowledge that what he has written bears something of the same relation to what he knows really to be good as dream-wit bears to real wit. For just as we sometimes dream that we have made some uncommonly smart repartee, a retort worthy of Talleyrand, a mot that is, at last, brilliantly, astoundingly witty, which startles us even in our dream by its qualities of extraordinary sharpness and deep, penetrating humour, so that we wake proud, grateful and smiling, and then, when we recall that epoch-making joke, we find to our dismay, to our profound mortification, that it is really the most shamefully banal and stupid observation that ever was uttered, so after the midnight of literary intoxication there comes too often an awakening of bitterness and disillusion. Then the artist has to sit down and wearily to sift the gold, if there be any, from the dross of his overnight ideas. And through this process he will have to go whether he has written or only thought overnight. For the man of letters, then, joy cometh not in the morning. "The earliest pipe of half-awakened bards" is not altogether a joke; it is smoked, one may fancy, with the oppressive sense of a memory to be taxed and with the knowledge that the luxuriant products of the overnight imagination must undergo the painful operation of critical pruning and paring. Tennyson would sit, after dinner, over his study fire, smoking strong tobacco from a new churchwarden, thinking the wonderful poetry he never wrote, the great fragmentary thoughts, the grand, unfinished sonorous verses, which he was far too genuine a poet to write. "Many thousands of fine lines," he once observed, "go up the chimney."

It is in the morning, then, that the artist records and elaborates in the cold light of his critical judgment the dazzling thoughts that leap to life, imperfect, unbidden, delusive, in his heated imagination o'nights. With infinite patience, with unwearied labour he deletes what was clever but untrue or true but inappropriate: he tones down, then, the over-coloured images, he harmonizes what was discordant, elaborates what was undeveloped; with unfailing self-denial and with unswerving devotion to art he pares away all excrescences and reduces the whole to a correct proportion. It is in the morning, is it not? that it is easier to observe the great rule of life and art, "not too much."

But this is no light task; there is no joy in such a process, rather unceasing labour and much disgust, weariness often, and a need of courage, for which the artist is seldom given credit. The public thinks only of the freedom, the bonhomie, the holidays of a painter's life; of the slavery, the jealousies, and the disappointments of the studio it knows nothing. Still less does it understand that the artist's acutest sorrow is when he compares the masterpiece for which he is praised with the ideal that is ever before him but which he can never reach.

We remember Pope's extravagances, his pettinesses, his temper, his falsehoods, his profits, his influence, and even some of his poetry; but do we remember that every verse of that waspish rhymer was finished with unstinted care, that every couplet was the product of incredible toil? Writers are, in truth, workers—manual labourers without the privileges of an artisan. The toil but not the dignity or the encouragements of manual labour is theirs. And what joy is there in their occupation? I would rather dig a patch of potatoes than write a short story, and far rather be an omnibus conductor than a novelist. My wages would be higher and more certain, my responsibility and my respectability less irksome, my work much easier. But quisque suos patimur manes; we are all haunted by the ghosts of our former follies, our old ambitions. We all have our pasts before us, and, as for our futures, too many of us, alas! have left them behind. If we are sometimes tempted to curse our education and profession we should, at least, remember with gratitude the pleasures we owe to them—the delight of thought, the friendship of books, the joy of literary reminiscence, the pleasure of reading and the pleasure of being—however little—read. If we do so cheerfully we may be forgiven if occasionally we cry out that the joys of writing are illusory, and that the happiest author is he who thinks and talks and does not write—but of whom it is said that he could, if he tried. It is not, really, a pity that he doesn't. He ranks already among the greatest writers. For just as the heaviest fish are those that are lost, so the best books are those that remain unwritten. Their authors are too wise. CECIL HEADLAM.

NELL GWYN IN DRAMATIC ART.

Nell Gwyn has always ranked high among our popular heroines, and now that she is the central figure of the new play at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, and is also putting in an appearance at the Haymarket, it is interesting to look back upon some previous plays which have centred round her fascinating personality. "A mighty pretty soul," as Pepys has it, surrounded with an air of romance and sentiment, but in reality a clever little Bohemian, a kind of English Madame Sans-Gêne, free and easy, ready at repartee, outspoken to coarseness, and with a considerable fund of bonhomie, she has appealed alike to the imagination of the classes and the masses. And none among the literary folk who have made Nell Gwyn the subject of their disquisitions have more sedulously woven the romance of the orange maiden actress than the dramatists. In The Peckham Frolic or Nell Gwyn, a comedy in three acts (1799), she is made to play the part of a practical joker. Sir Oliver Luke is expected to arrive with a petition to the King, and Mistress Gwyn, bent on matchmaking, wishes to marry the knight to a friend of hers. "I mean to sacrifice this Cromwellian calf on the altar of Hymen. . . . My friend has laughed away 45 years, careless of her interests and income. I propose that in this shipwreck of her fortune the Oliverian knight shall save her from sinking." In pursuance of her plan Nell Gwyn persuades the knight that the matrimonial alliance with the lady proposed by her would propitiate the King and materially advance Sir Oliver's interests. The simple elderly bachelor is caught in the toils and presented to Lord Rochester, who in the absence of the merry Monarch from Peckham personates the King. On the arrival of the latter the marriage is confirmed, and the happy pair dismissed by Charles with the following poetic effusion:—

> Were I Apollo! No! I would not choose
> The gay Ann Kill'grew for my darling muse,
> Let other nymphs the learned mount ascend;
> She should be Thetis, and the day should end.

In Douglas Jerrold's Nell Gwynne and Walker's drama of the name, the heroine is presented chiefly in an emotional light. "An attempt has been made," writes Douglas Jerrold, "to show some glimpses of the silver lining of a character, to whose influence over an unprincipled voluptuary we owe a national asylum for veteran soldiers, and whose brightness shines with the most amiable lustre in many actions of her life, and in the last disposal of her worldly effects." The play was produced at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, in January, 1833, the part of Nell Gwynne being taken by Miss Taylor. The plot turns on the substitution by Nell, who is persecuted by an old lover, of another orange girl for herself. In the meeting between Nell and the King we have the well-known anecdotes of the foundation of Chelsea Hospital at her request, and the supper for which the King, having forgotten his purse, was unable to pay. The conduct of the lady is beyond reproach. She repels the King's advances with a pretty little moralizing fable, and leaves him to follow her to the theatre, where in a "broad-brimmed hat and waist belt" she is about to speak one of Dryden's prologues. In Mr. Walker's play we have in addition to the incident of the poor soldier's refuge the story of the impoverished clergyman—for Nell was all her life a staunch Protestant and a devoted daughter of the Church of England—relieved by the actress's charity. Here Nell not merely resists the King's proposals but sets up as a teacher of morality:—

> Many the man with every vice deform'd
> In one short lesson has the Stage reform'd.
> For wisdom owns that in a virtuous cause
> The Stage has more effect than public laws.

The last act ends with the King presenting a forlorn maiden with a dowry of ten thousand pounds and trotting home like a good boy with the Duchess of Cleveland.

Mr. Arden's Nell Gwynne (1871) was simply a musical extravaganza. But in Wills' Nell Gwynne (1878) the idealization of the character was carried another step in advance. The means by which Nell extricated herself from her difficulties and defeated the machinations of the Duke of Buckingham and the Duchess of Portsmouth, who are hoist with their own petard, did infinite credit to her ingenuity. But the main interest centred in the scene where, tossed about by conflicting feelings—the affection for an old lover suddenly recalled to life on his reappearance, and the loyalty which the woman believes to be owing to the King, who had raised her to her position—Nell struggles with herself to yield in the end reluctantly to what seems to her the more imperative claims of the two.

Such is Nell Gwyn as depicted in modern dramas. It is superfluous to point out that the real Nell, as seen in everyday life, was a very different creature indeed. But to judge from recent experiences, it is not the function of the historical drama to teach history, unless we define the latter as chronologized fiction.

DALY CATALOGUE PRICE LIST.

Whatever may be the shortcomings of the Catalogue of the Daly Collection (recently dispersed in New York), the auctioneer has made amends by printing a list of the prices realized by the books. This is a step in the right direction, and the hint might very well be acted upon by our own leading auctioneers. The lots, amounting to nearly four thousand, occupy just over twenty small quarto pages, each page containing four columns, the system adopted being merely that of recording the lot numbers and corresponding prices. Such a supplement to the catalogue (which is published by J. O. Wright and Co., booksellers, New York) should prove valuable for future reference.

With this useful list of prices before us, we are enabled to give particulars of the sums realized by the more important among the Dickens and Thackeray items, which formed so notable a feature of the Daly Library:—

An Account of the Origin of the "Pickwick Papers," by Mrs. Seymour, with Dickens' version and her reply, &c., together with a portrait of Seymour (an original drawing), the original letter of Dickens to Seymour commenting upon his design for "The Stroller's Tale," and seven original drawings for "Pickwick," three of which were not used	1,750	340	0

The contents of this remarkable volume cost Mr. Daly £561 at Sotheby's in 1889, the sum of £61 being realized for Mrs. Seymour's very scarce pamphlet, this being her own copy, with MS. notes and corrections. It also contained the following unpublished and undated letter addressed by Seymour's son to the purchaser of his father's "Pickwick" drawings:—

Though it would afford me much pleasure to gratify your inquiries into the circumstances connected with the original designs for "Pickwick" which you purchased of me on the 11th inst., I can (I fear) add little to what ought to be pretty well known on the subject by this time. But as you seem to require a sort of warranty for your purchase, or some little addition to your stock of anaderta upon a subject of interest, the following brief statement of facts is very much at your service:—The six drawings in the scrap-book which you purchased of me were done by my father, Robert Seymour, the well-known artist, and are the original designs for "Pickwick." The two illustrations, "The Runaway Chaise" and "The Pickwickians in Wardle's Kitchen" have never been engraved—i.e., as far as I may rely on an estimate of probabilities which amount to conviction in my own mind. Of the four out of the six original drawings which were etched, I should say that the slight sketch for the scene of the dying clown (illustrating "The Stroller's Tale") was the first sketch for that subject, but of this you may, perhaps, be able to form an accurate judgment for yourself, if you compare it with the published version and with Dickens' criticism contained in the letter which you possess. You are, however, certainly in error in the notion that my father was engaged upon that design on the night preceding his death; and it is an error evidently derived from a statement of Dickens, who, it is well known, carried his bias for fictitious narrative to ultra-professional length. I have several times heard my father say that Dickens had the drawing in his possession some time before that event. At the same time, to allow C. Dickens his due, it must be admitted that he showed considerable sense of dramatic propriety in the alteration he suggested for Dr. Slammer's attitude (the illustration "Dr. Slammer's Defiance of Jingle"). I am rather sorry now that I did not preserve the letter, though Dickensonian (or) literature has little attraction for me. I quite agree with you that the best of the drawings is that in which Mr. Pickwick addresses the Club, which is full of humour, and contains also those suggestions of sporting adventure which were to form the groundwork of the book. I allude, of course, to Mr. Winkle's sporting equipments, &c.

The long letter to my father, in which C. Dickens congratulates him upon the success of the first number of "Pickwick," our mutual friend, and proposes various alterations in designs for further illustrations, at the same time inviting him to meet Chapman and Hall at his lodgings at Furnival's Inn, is the only one of the letters from Mr. Dickens which I preserved. My father accepted the invitation, and that, I believe, was the first and last time that they met.

With regard to the pamphlet, "Account of the Origin of the 'Pickwick Papers,'" I am sorry to say that I am unable to furnish you with a copy, but I have a few odds and ends of my father's works still by me, though not all for sale, which, as you take an interest in those works, you might perhaps like to see. At all events, as I shall be in town in a few days, I will call upon you with some of these.

Yours truly,

R. Seymour.

The Seymour drawings in Mr. Daly's collection were reproduced for the first time in Mr. F. G. Kitton's "Dickens and his Illustrators," where will also be found a complete account of Seymour's association with "Pickwick," together with a biographical sketch of that clever but unfortunate artist.

A FORGOTTEN POET.

In "An Old English Miscellany" edited by Dr. R. Morris for the Early English Text Society will be found a poem entitled "A Love Rune," now generally attributed to Thomas Hales, a Franciscan Friar, who wrote about the middle of the thirteenth century. That there were genuine English poets before Chaucer is of course an accepted fact, but it must be acknowledged that these old poets are as a rule more delightful to the philologist than to the general reader. "A Love Rune" ought to prove an exception. In it we have a beautiful poem, written a century before Chaucer, and highly finished as though it had been Chaucer's own. It breathes a perfect spirit of charity and tenderness. Here is no gloating over the repulsive side of life, and death, and the pains of Hell, such as defaces so much of our medieval poetry, no coarseness of expression, no harsh asceticism. It is true that the poem is in praise of celibacy, which is the writer's counsel of perfection, but he resorts to none of the unwholesome arguments employed by so many of his fellows. He contents himself with setting forth with singular beauty the vanity and instability of earthly love, and the enduring perfection of the love of Christ. He pleads with one of "Christ's maidens who earnestly besought him that he would make for her a love rune, whereby she might best learn how to take another true love, and one that of all men would guard a free woman best." In the extracts here given, amounting to less than one-half of the whole poem, the metre, and, in almost every case, the rhyme of the original has been faithfully preserved. The diction has of course been more or less modernised. After an introductory stanza describing the occasion and purpose of the poem, in the six following stanzas the poet enlarges upon the imperfections of earthly love, and passes on to the vanity of wealth and beauty, and the superiority of the Heavenly Love :—

Is a man rich in worldly weal ?
The more his heart shall pine and ache ;
And sleep, for fear of them that steal,
Shall all night long his eyes forsake.
In thought on thought how like a wheel
He turneth for his riches' sake !
Yet at the last what doth it heal ?
Death from him all at last will take.

Where now be Paris and Heleyne,
So fair of old, and bright of blee ?
Arsadas, Tristram, and Dideyne,
Ysonde, and all their company ?
Sir Ector in his might and main,
And Caesar rich in this world's fee ?
They all are vanished from the reign,
As from the bow the shaft doth flee.

'Tis now as though they never were,
For all the wonders of them told,
And we that live, we take no care
How they with pain were brought to mould ;
How, after all their travail here,
Their heat it turned to bitter cold :
So frail the world, so false a fere !
O fool, that of the world is bold !

What though he were so rich a man
As Harry our King in worldly gear ?
So fair of face as Absalon,
That had upon this earth no peer ?
Soon would his pride and pomp be gone,
And no man to it more give ear ;
If thou wilt choose a true le-man,
The one true Knight I show thee here.

Ah, sweet, if thou but only knew
How goodly is this gracious child,
How fair of face, how bright of hue,
How glad of cheer, of mood how mild,
His winsome love, his trust so true,
His heart so free, his wisdom wild,
Thy choice thou never more would'st rue,
Or deem that thou hadst been beguiled.

The two following stanzas, describing the might, riches, and generosity of this Lord, thus conclude :—

If thou wilt love him word and deed,
And if thou live his true le-man,
Thou shalt go clad in richer weed
Than King or Kaiser e'er did on.

The poem then proceeds :—

Of that fair house if aught be told
Built by the wise King Salomon,
Of jasper, sapphire, and of gold,
And many another costly stone,
Fairer than that a thousand-fold,
So fair it may be said by none,
A house is thine to have and hold,
If thou but live his true le-man.

It standeth on a rocky hill,
And shall not move, it is so strong ;
To undermine it dig who will,
The walls thereof he cannot wrong.
There's healing there for every ill,
And bliss, and joy, and glee, and song,
Maiden, to thee, if so thou will,
This house and all within belong.

There friend from friend ne'er turned away,
The least there never lost his right,
There is nor anger, strife, nor fray,
Nor envy there of any wight.
All with the angels there do play,
In peace and love, and Heaven's own light,
O maiden, who so blest as they
Who to this Lord their troth have plight ?

The next four stanzas dilate further upon the majesty of the Lord, and upon the beauty of the "gem-stone" and "treasure" of maidenhood. The two following stanzas must conclude our extract, although one would fain quote the actual conclusion, and its pious envoy :—

Thou shalt hear tell of many a stone
That is of virtue and of grace,
Of Amethyst, and Calcydone,
Of Lectary, and of Topase ;
Of Jasper, Sapphire, and Sardone,
Smaragde, Beryl, and Crisoprase,—
Above all other precious stone
These be the first in every place.

But, maiden, as I here have told,
A better gem-stone is thy dower,
And better worth a hundred-fold,
Than all of these in their colour ;
It is y-wrought in Heaven's fine gold,
Full fillèd all of fine amour,
Thou, that hast this, O, keep good hold !
So bright it shineth in Heaven's high bower.

THE FRENCH AS COLONISTS AND EXPLORERS.*

A charge often brought against Frenchmen is their inability to give practical issues to excellent theoretical reasoning. M. Renan once drew the picture of a European federation in which each nation was called upon to fulfil the rôle best suited to it; upon Germany devolved the task of speculative research, to which France was to give literary shape; while England undertook to draw the practical conclusions. Take the instance of political and social science; to Rousseau, to Montesquieu, to Comte Europe owes the propagation of those theories which now form the warp and woof of its everyday life; and yet France has been unable to give herself a stable Government. The same incapacity to meet practical issues shows itself in her colonial policy. We have before us a batch of books containing enough science to build up an empire. Here are men of observation, full of shrewdness and sagacity, and infinitely more versed in administrative law and financial science than Clive or Warren Hastings; and yet the growth of prosperity in the French colonies is imperceptible. After all, it is easy for France to console herself for this defect of character. Philosophers have taught that, if empires pass away without leaving other vestige of their existence than ruins, the excellence of literary expression remains unimpaired.

We may begin with the countries on which France exercises little influence. The former head administrator of the Shanghai French concession, M. Bard, writes on China. After an interesting analysis of the Chinese character, its love of ceremony, its disdain of accuracy, and its perfect indifference to the value of time, comes an account of the Chinese home, the condition of women, and the religion. From the people we rise to the Government, the extraordinary Chinese Civil Service, with its intricate system of examinations, the finances, the maddening currency, the administration of justice, the army, and finally trade. The figures in the latter chapter tell against France. Against 371 English firms in 1898 and 101 German, France could boast of only 29. Out of a total number of 31,566 ships calling at Chinese ports and leaving them in 1897, with a tonnage of 32,519,929 tons, England claimed respectively 17,388 and 19,651,112, while France rose only to 361 and 123,122. Such a paltry result is extraordinary when one remembers that, as early as 1253, Saint Louis sent missionaries to China, and that France and the Far East have been, since then, in constant inter-communication. M. Bard tells us that so far had the missionaries insinuated themselves into the Emperor's favour that in the seventeenth century one of them established in Peking a gun foundry. Up to 1897 the protection of all Roman Catholic missions devolved upon France. At that date, as is well known, Germany undertook to protect her own missions, with the result that the Bay of Kiao-chau was speedily occupied. There are some interesting photographs in the book.

From the Far East to the East the transition is easy. Again Saint Louis and Louis XIV. are referred to as historical precedents; again the pessimistic note is struck—by M. Charles Loiseau. The war between the Turks and the Greeks turned to the advantage of Germany. The mistake of France, it appears, was not to allow the small Slav States to join Greece in the struggle. Hitherto, the Slavs, who in the Balkans ought to play the part of the "predominant partner," have been artificially divided into petty States, "serving," as Prince Nicholas of Montenegro said, "as small change in the accounts of the larger Powers." The extent of the diplomatic mistake was pointed out in the Figaro by M. Vallroy when he wrote the significant phrase:—"There exists no longer, in the capital of the Ottoman Empire, any other influence than that of the Emperor William II." But the blow may be parried by an alliance with the natural enemies of Germany, the Austrian Slavs, especially now that Russia pays only an academic attention to the Balkan question. Here M. Loiseau bitterly criticizes the Department of Foreign Affairs, the archaic distribution of Consular posts in Croatia, the appointments of incompetent Ambassadors at Vienna, and the general indifference in high places to the Austrian crisis. The leading idea of the book is ably defended by a survey of the historical aspects of the question. Nevertheless, this attempt to renovate the fatal racial policy to which the Second Empire devoted its energies seems a slight anachronism.

On the colonies proper we have to notice four books, three of which are on Central Africa.

M. Pierre Mille is one of the most brilliant correspondents of the Temps and the Débats. The book which he now publishes on the Independent State is the outcome of the letters sent to the Temps when the Congo railway was opened two years ago. It is melancholy enough for French colonial expansion. The French project of a road from Stanley Pool by the valley of the Ruilon did not succeed; the Congo railway has made it useless. When M. Mille landed at Libreville, the capital of the French Congo, he found "a garden, three or four houses, a few negroes' cabins, some attempts at plantations." The towns in the Independent State wore a different look. "Brazzaville is a station, Leopoldville a town." Some traits, however, are consoling for Frenchmen; in 1898 the Congo State numbered only one colonist, a gardener, who had decided to plant rubber trees instead of gathering what grew in the forest. All the activity was State-activity, which is eminently French. The workmen who constructed the railway were Cingalese, French voters in fact, and the education received about Saint-Louis or Dakar was such that, wherever they went, they spontaneously erected the French flag. The genius which made the unity of France under the old régime is not quite extinct. But the most characteristic fact was the presence in the Governor-General's office of Cyrano de Bergerac, and of MM. Gohier's and Huysmans' works. Someone was buying some hippopotamus bones, and M. Mille, upon inquiry, found that they were destined for M. Anatole France. "Go to Africa," the ironist had said, "bring me back a god, perhaps the one we are awaiting." They brought him back ivory. After the notes taken during the journey up the Congo comes an account of the administration of the Independent State. Perhaps M. Mille passes too lightly over the conduct of the whites towards the natives. Last year M. Hess, of the Figaro, in a book published by Calmann Lévy, drew up a terrible indictment against the powerful companies which work the State. Behind the brilliant figures of the annual Budget are the unknown atrocities, news of which leaks out little by little. The sons of Cham have always been doomed to suffer at the hands of the whites, their masters, whether Mahomedan or Christian.

In the French Congo the once powerful Samory, who only the other day was leading the contented life of a deposed chieftain pensioned by France, has just received Christian burial. M. André Mévil has become his biographer. The life of the Sudanese Abd-el-Kader is well known. In 1860, at twenty-five, he is taken prisoner in one of the numerous wars between rival clans. He escapes and takes refuge with a marabout. Later on he became in his turn a chieftain and organized an army which now and then came into collision with the French troops. The struggle lasted sixteen years and ended in 1898 by the capture of the wily chieftain. It is due to Samory that in 1891 a French column attacked by mistake at Warina part of the English West India Regiment. However, the conquest of the Sudan, in spite of the unfortunate Marchand incident, is a brilliant, if often melancholy, record of military heroism and success.

Africa attracts others than soldiers. M. d'Espagnat, who is a poet, speaks of an excursion in Guinea where he has seen the progress of the Germans. "The patient Teuton race," he writes, "has made its way . . . the old Roman blood vivifies no more the world." Then he tells the story of the capture by nine men of a village of two hundred blacks, who became in time excellent German auxiliary troops.

On the whole, in spite of pessimistic figures, the future is not hopeless for the partisans of French expansion. In French literature to-day no effort is made to throw a veil over past mistakes. The crisis is looked at squarely in the face by men resolved to establish a better state of things. And as courageously as ever Frenchmen are pioneering in every quarter of the globe. It is not men of pluck and endurance that are needed, but less red-tapeism and lobby intrigues. This is the one lesson taught throughout the vivid pages of Baron de Mandat-Grancey in the book in which, during a trip to the Congo as the guest of the King of the Belgians in 1898, he contrasts constantly the success of the Congo Free State with the slow development of a region not less rich, but badly governed, the French colony of the Congo. Baron de Mandat-Grancey, who knows Africa, who knows the negro, and above all knows men and things, frankly avows that he thinks it a mistake for France to try to colonize. The Congo Free State succeeds because it is governed by one man, and not by a bureaucracy. All this may be true, and we earnestly advise all persons interested in colonial methods, as well as the mere lover of notes of African travel, to procure Baron de Mandat-Grancey's book. But when the foreign reader notes the admirably instructive pages of a Marcel Monnier, who has published two brilliant volumes on his journeys in China, Cochin China, Annam, and Tong-king, or the fresh documents of an Edouard Foà on his overland trip from ocean to ocean in the broadest portion of Africa, he feels that, at least, the so-called degeneration of "Latin energy" is a myth. This journey across Africa obtained for M. Foà the grand gold medal of the Paris Society of Geography. The reader of this account of it will not be long kept in doubt why the scientific results of the exploration are so important that they are to be published in a separate volume. What we have here, accompanied by illustrations, is a narrative of the march of the expedition, with curious passages by the way on the manners of the natives and the ways of the jungle animals. There are appendices containing more technical information and an admirable index.

We have kept for the end M. de Grandmaison's interesting account of General Galliéni's methods of colonization. Before becoming Governor of Madagascar, General Galliéni pacified Upper Tong-king. Under his orders served Lieutenant de Grandmaison, who now recounts his past experience. His chief's methods are entirely different from any we have yet seen. M. de Grandmaison wishes neither to people a colony with emigrants nor to exploit the natives; France must simply civilize the conquered race, gradually raise them up to her level, and then treat them as adopted children. The main instruments in this colonial work would be the Roman Catholic missionaries. The proposed end is a noble one, but we are not sure whether the missionaries might not be, after all, as little welcome to the natives as the sergeants of a certain European Power, who, according to one story, collect taxes by threatening to chop off so many right hands when the rubber is not forthcoming, or as the Catholics and Protestants who are so largely responsible for the present Chinese embroglio. And then the Anti-Clerical majority in the Chamber might propose a lay schoolmaster instead of a priest as a vehicle of civilization. M. de Grandmaison is certainly right when he protests against the red-tapeism of the Ministry of the Colonies, always jealous of any spirit of enterprise among its subordinates.

ANCIENT IDEALS.

Ancient Ideals. By Henry Osborn Tyler. 2 vols. (Macmillan Co., 21s.)

The object of Mr. Tyler's elaborate and in many respects interesting volumes is to give an account of the various embodiments of the ideal among different peoples from the dawn of history until the Christian era. Religion being the most universal incarnation of human ideals, for religion is the poetry of the masses, the greater part of the book before us is taken up with sketches of the many religious types existent in the world. But the ideal becomes likewise incorporate in art and poetry and the social organization, and we have, therefore, some, though necessarily perfunctory, notices of artistic and social life. The principle of classification adopted by the author is that of race. The division does not appear to us to have been carried out consistently. How are we to account for the conjunction of Chaldea and China (it is true that some of the people who settled in the Middle Kingdom may have dwelt originally in Babylon), whilst the Phœnicians, whose religious importance is greatly underrated, are not mentioned in the group, and the Hebrews, in whom, as we are frequently told, the religious genius of the Semitic race reaches its culminating point, are relegated to the middle of the second volume? The separate position assigned to Israel is probably owing to its relation to Christianity. "Israel's inspiration," we are told, "led up to Christ's revelation. To our apprehension of Christianity is needed our understanding of its direct antecedent." Such an arrangement is nevertheless indefensible. In Christianity the author finds the universal and final religion which "comprises all positive and valid elements of previous life and thought." This prepossession on Mr. Tyler's part—we are speaking from a purely critical point of view—detracts considerably from the value of his work, for it has unconsciously, no doubt warped his judgment and coloured the whole of his critical estimate. We give two instances selected at random. In Buddhism, which, like Krishnaism, was a protest against the prevailing type of Brahmanism—its extreme sacerdotalism, its rigid spirit of exclusiveness its narrow ideals of life—"there is no god." The Christian conception of God—the only one acknowledged by Mr. Tyler as true—is, of course, unknown. But may it not be said that the moral order is the god of Buddhism? Nowhere else, except in some of the Greek tragic poets, do we find such a vivid realization of the supremacy of the moral order, the quality, effects, and results of all good or evil actions in this life or in the lives to come. "In Buddhism," continues the author, "there is no principle of sin, no adjudging of an act wrongful because transgressing the will of the doer's god, who is powerful to punish." Certainly the Christian definition of sin does not apply to the Buddhistic conception of evil. To Buddha, ignorance is but another word for sin in the moral world. But no one is more alive to the prevalence of evil in this world and the need to be ever on the alert lest the evil principle should gain the upper hand. The distinguishing principle of Buddhistic ethics, which it has in common with original Christianity, might have been pointed out by Mr. Tyler. It is the divorce of morality from metaphysics; the essence of religion is placed in the moral law and obedience to its behests. More justice should have been done to the fine but inadequate Buddhistic moral ideal of passive virtue. (Buddha would have converted the world into a vast monastery.) Buddhism, as well as Christianity, proclaims the apotheosis of the cross.

In the first volume Mr. Tyler deals with Egypt, Chaldea, Asia, India, Iran, and Greece; the second part treats of Rome, Israel, and Christianity. It would, of course, be out of all question to follow the author in his detailed exposition of succeeding religions and philosophical systems. The outlines given are fairly accurate and not too sketchy on the whole. But many of the statements and conclusions reached appear to us, to say the least of it, extremely doubtful. Is it true—e.g., that "Assyria has accomplished nothing in literature?" The Chinese moral ideal—strange to say, Mr. Tyler sneers at the only truly religious man China has ever produced, the mystic Lao-Tsze—is preferred to the Egyptian and Assyrian ones. Yet the Chinese have the religious faculty in its most elementary form. Their morality is of the earth, earthy. Confucian ethic rests on a rational basis, and its chief test of actions is their utility. To learn to understand the past, to study the history of bygone ages is the whole of practical wisdom. And "Madame Etiquette" was the idol of Confucius' heart. In the account of Zoroastrianism the point to be emphasized is not so much its dualism as the ethical character of the religious revolution accomplished by the prophet. The conception of Ahriman arises indeed from an ethical motive; to maintain in its unsullied purity the character of Ahura. And Ahriman himself would in the end rise up regenerated and join in the universal hymn of praise and thanksgiving.

In his treatment of Israel and Christianity, Mr. Tyler lays aside the gown of the philosopher for that of the preacher. We have no objection to the transformation, and we readily acknowledge the spiritual insight and felicity of characterization frequently exhibited by the author in his running comments on Old and New Testament history. But from a critical point of view, an account which all but ignores the points of religious contact between the Hebrews and other members of the Semitic family, the slow and gradual growth of the naturalistic Jehovah cult into a sublime ethical religion and the development of the religion of the "Sermon on the Mount" into subsequent Christianity, has a strictly limited value. Nevertheless, we strongly commend Mr. Tyler's book to the attention of all interested in the subject.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF OUIDA.

Critical Studies (Unwin, 7s. 6d.) seems a strange title for a book from the tempestuous pen of Ouida. Let us hasten to add that no one need be deterred from its perusal by the fear that its contents are over-critical, or that the hand of the writer has lost its imaginative cunning. Looking at the list of subjects treated, which range from the romances of D'Annunzio to the policy of Mr. Chamberlain, and from the poems of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt to the decadence of the Latin Races, one is reminded of the sentinel in Iolanthe who sang "I am an intellectual chap, And think of things that would astonish you"; but when one reads the essays, one finds that Ouida the philosopher is not so different from Ouida the novelist after all. There is the same unframmelled cataract of words, the same fearless preference of the picturesque to the essential fact, the same fascinating recklessness of statement. Ouida, the novelist, used to tell us that an undergraduate might sit up all night carousing, and yet stroke the Oxford eight to victory in the morning. Ouida, the philosopher, tells us that the Society of Authors is "an association for the multiplication and publication of inferior works," and goes on to draw all sorts of startling inferences from this startling premiss. Who but Ouida would have been capable of either the one statement or the other?

Perhaps the most characteristic section of Ouida's more or less synthetic system is the chapter on the ugliness of modern life as compared with the beauty of life in the middle ages. The theme affords a splendid opening for enthusiastic eloquence. It is only necessary to describe the middle ages in the manner of a poet, and modern life in the style of a sanitary inspector, in order to make the contrast striking. And that is pretty much how Ouida goes to work. "Try and realize," she writes, "what life was like when Chaucer walked through Chepe. . . . Read Froude's description of a sea-going merchantman of Elizabeth's days and contrast it (what?) with the captain of a modern liner. You will at once see how full of colour and individuality were the former lives; how colourless, unlovely, and deprived of all initiative are the latter." But, if you know your subject, you will not perceive anything of the kind. On the contrary, you will know that the medieval merchantman suffered from scurvy, drank to excess, and knocked her apprentices about, and that the tradesmen of Chepe lived a very monotonous life indeed, working far longer hours in far more unhealthy conditions than does the modern tradesman, and hardly ever taking a holiday. When one comes to think of it, how many years of wedded life did Mr. and Mrs. Gilpin pass before they could contrive that "day in the country" which is such an ordinary incident of a modern commercial career?

With charming inconsistency, Ouida, who is so full of rapturous enthusiasm over the beauties of nature, is full of wrath because they have been made accessible to tourists:—

> Zermatt, so late a virgin stronghold of the Higher Alps, is now a mere cockney excursion, and sixty thousand trippers invade its solitude with every summer, plodding like camels in a string, vexing the air with inane noises, offending the mountain stillness with songs to which the bray of mules were music, insulting the crystal clearness of the heavens with the intrusion of their own ludicrous, blatant, and imbecile personalities, incapable even of being silent and ashamed.

They are burning words, but they will not stand analysis. If modern trippers sometimes behave badly, we have no proof that medieval pilgrims behaved much better. Chaucer's Canterbury pilgrims certainly were not silent and ashamed; and Chaucer, being a poet, probably idealized them and refined the tales with which they beguiled the way. Nor is it altogether a sign of deterioration that people not specially cultivated and refined are willing, nowadays, to take long journeys in quest of the picturesque. The medieval people whose lives Ouida finds so beautiful were, for the most part, absolutely indifferent to the picturesque. Like Bishop Berkeley they were "put out of humour by the most horrible precipices," or, like Master John de Bremble, they spoke of the great Saint Bernard as "a place of torment"; and their idea of an attractive landscape was a garden laid out with mathematical precision. Whence it seems to follow that Ouida would have done well to make a closer study of the middle ages before exalting them at the expense of the age in which she lives.

"THE EGYPTIANS IN THEIR FOG."

In Egyptian Chronology (Nutt, 7s. 6d. n.), an attempt to educe a rational system from the ancient schemes of chronology, Mr. F. G. Fleay has made a resolute endeavour to solve a problem which he has investigated with a more minute care than has been bestowed upon the subject for many years past. The inherent difficulty of the problem has had a fascination for Egyptologers ever since the days of Sir Gardner Wilkinson, and every hieroglyphic scholar has propounded his own views, which seldom agreed with any one else's. Roughly speaking, there have been two strongly-opposed schools of chronologers, the one upholding the "long scheme," which fixes the date of Mena, the first King of the first dynasty, at about 5000 years B.C., more or less, whilst the other adopts the "short scheme," which would place his reign nearer 3000 B.C. The long schemers have had it all their own way of late. Without going so far as Champollion Figeac (5867 B.C.), Mariette took 5004 as the date of Mena's accession, Brugsch cut it down to 4400, and Petrie put it back to 4777. No one, on the other hand, would have anything to say to Wilkinson's 2320 B.C., Stuart Poole's 2717, though Lepsius' 3892 has always had some supporters. The difference between the schemes is mainly due to divergent opinions on the vexed question whether the ancient lists of dynasties should be regarded as continuous and consecutive, or whether some dynasties were contemporary with others. The difference amounts to the rejection of perhaps ten dynasties from the consecutive list, and their transference to a position of subordination under one or other of the twenty remaining dynasties. This theory of contemporary dynasties, ruling in different parts of Egypt, has been a favourite with many Egyptologers, and there are several curious gaps in the monumental records, and other data, which seem to support such a view. The short schemers have found a vigorous recruit in Mr. Fleay, who, with every desire to establish a high antiquity for Egyptian history, finds himself compelled to date Mena no earlier than 2924 B.C.

How he arrives at this date would require a long and complicated explanation; but this much may be said. Starting from the discovery that the only two ancient schemes of the dynasties that include the whole period from Mena to Okhos (the "Redactor" of Manetho and the Sothis Book preserved by Synkellos), though differing in the total of years, agree in allowing only twenty successive dynasties (the rest being regarded as contemporary), Mr. Fleay adopts the Manethonic order, and relegates dynasties vii.-xi., xiii., xiv., xvi., xvii., xx., to a position of contemporaneity or subordination, as the case may be. He then examines the ancient authorities—the Turin papyrus list, Manetho, the "Redactor," Synkellos, Eratosthenes, Herodotus, Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius—with a view to seeing how far, on this hypothesis, their widely divergent figures for the kings' reigns, and their sums of the reigns for each dynasty, can be reconciled. The various conjectures and emendations, the additions of omitted years and corrections of ones to tens and vice versâ (on a theory of copyists' errors), are extremely ingenious, though they leave us with the impression that, nevertheless, the several lists and figures are hopelessly corrupt and irreconcilable. The chief alterations have to be made in the early dynasties, whilst for the later history the divergences are comparatively insignificant. The main results, as shown in one of the many elaborate tables with which Mr. Fleay endeavours to lighten the task of the bewildered reader, are the making dynasty xi. contemporary with v.; and vii., xiii., xiv., with xii.; and xv., xvi. with xvii. and xviii.; and arranging all the dynasties from xvi. to xxx. in a double row.

Mr. Fleay leaves no stone unturned that may affect his conclusions. He investigates the Gnothic cycle, Sed days, vague years, and epacts; corrects Mahler by Eisenlohr; examines the gaps in the Apis stelae; relentlessly (but we think rightly) throws over the datum supposed to be derived from the quarrying of alabaster at Hatnub by Una under Merenra; and subjects every chronological point to searching criticism. How far his conclusions are to be accepted can only be decided after they have been submitted to a long and critical examination, and checked by all existing materials. In any case he has done a considerable service in bringing together for the first time in synchronistic form all the data of the ancient authorities, and he has at least shown that ingenuity may do a good deal towards explaining their discrepancies. One of the most interesting points in his book is his theory that the "divine" reigns were really dynasties.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Antarctic.

Nothing is more striking in the history of geographical discovery than the difference in the attitude of the average man towards the North and South Poles respectively. Though both poles are equally magnetic in the scientific sense of the word, it is hardly too much to say that the North Pole attracts and the South Pole repels; and the public which was enthusiastic over the exploits of Nansen is little more than coldly tolerant of the exploits of Dr. Borchgrevink. All the more credit is due, therefore, to the geographers and other men of science who have lately laboured so hard to arouse us from our apathy towards Antarctic exploration; and all the warmer welcome is due to the book, THE ANTARCTIC REGIONS (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.), in which Dr. Karl Fricker summarizes all that is known about these inhospitable regions. Dr. Fricker is an enthusiast, though his style is rather ponderous than flamboyant, and he tells us what explorers have done in order to make it clear that there still remains a great deal for explorers to do. Some 120 pages are devoted to the narrative of the voyages of the various navigators—Cook, Ross, Dumont d'Urville, Biscoe, &c. Then follows an encyclopaedic description of the various territories discovered, and to some extent explored—the South Orkney and South Shetland Islands, the Dirk Gerritz Archipelago, Wilkes Land, Victoria Land, &c. There is a careful account of the climate, the flora and fauna, and the ice; and there is finally, a chapter on the future of Antarctic discovery.

Dr. Fricker's great anxiety is that Germany should be "mindful of what it still owes to science," and take a prominent part in the investigation. It is a thing which Germany can very well do without fear of international complications. No delicate questions are likely to arise in relation to the partition of Antarctica, to "spheres of influence," or to the open door. And Germany has lately been bestirring herself in the matter. At all events there is a plan for penetrating the Antarctic Circle from the meridian of Kerguelen, at a cost of 950,000 marks to be raised by private subscriptions, aided by Government subsidy. But the money is not yet forthcoming. No doubt the mailed fist has other work in hand besides the cracking of the great ice-barrier; and in the meantime Belgium, England, and the United States are busy. So Dr. Fricker has to end with this urgent appeal to his countrymen:

> Will Germany and German science again commit the oft-repeated mistake, of being too late, and be content to accept the leavings of others? The prize is great, and independent of the inestimable results for geophysical science, the German scheme can contribute to prove the existence or non-existence of an Antarctic continent, as well as the connexion of Wilkes Land and Enderby Land. We Germans should never forget what has been done for the advancement of science by the governments and private individuals of small and mostly poor nations such as Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium. German prosperity is advancing on all sides. . . . Not merely the rich, but everybody who possesses knowledge of, and interest in, this undertaking can contribute his mite and aid in the realization of this aspiration.

No international jealousy shall hinder us from hoping that the aspiration may be realized quickly. German rivalry could flow in no more worthy channel; and the recent discovery of the South magnetic Pole by Dr. Borchgrevink should give it a fresh impetus. Let us add that Dr. Fricker's book reproduces many interesting old maps, and many pictures from Ross and Dumont d'Urville, and ends with an exhaustive and well-arranged bibliography.

War Verse.

It will be remembered that, when Mr. Rudyard Kipling paid his first visit to South Africa, he was presented with a poetical address, written, in imitation of his own style, by a soldier of the Cape Town garrison. The military bard who thus did honour to the civilian bard was Mr. Edgar Wallace, of the Royal Army Medical Corps, and the poem, together with other poems, is now printed in volume form, under the title WHIT IN BARRACKS (Methuen, 3s. 6d.). If they do not prove that Mr. Wallace is a great and original poet, they at least prove that he is an apt pupil of his master. The point of view and the mannerisms are alike Mr. Kipling's. So are the choice of language, and the use of the refrain. Remember "Belts," and then read—

> And it's W'or! Orderly, hold his hand,
> I'm not going to hurt you so don't be afraid.
> A ricochet! God! what a mess it has made.
> And it's W'or! and a very unhealthy trade.

Remember "Bobs" and then read "Arthur":—

> Wot does the Gen'ral know? sez I; Wot does the Gen'ral know?
> 'O, 'e's a Prince o' the Royal Blood, an 'e's on'y got up for show.
> But I 'chanced' kit-inspection, an' thought it a 'eert';
> But 'e put me down, smart, for a tunic an' shirt!
> An', insult to Injury, cheeked me for dirt!
> Did Arthur!

The poem in the collection that is most likely to attract notice is, perhaps, "The Prayer." Here, too, the source of inspiration is obvious; though the descent from the sublime to the colloquial does not suggest Mr. Kipling so much as Mr. Henley. We quote the first and last stanzas:

O God of Battles! Lord of Might!
A sentry, in the silent night,
I, 'oo 'ave never prayed,
Kneel, on the dewdamp sands, to say,
O see me through the comin' day
But, please remember, though I pray,
That I am not afraid.

O God of Battles! Lord of Might!
'Ere, in the silence of the night,
My 'umble prayer is prayed!
All life an' death are one to you!
If I must die—O 'elp me to!
In that last moment, see me through—
My God! I am afraid.

On the whole, though we have noted the limitations of Mr. Wallace's verses, we like them.

In the Waiting Time of War, by Aubrey N. Mildmay (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.), is a smaller volume, and the verse in it is of a more conventional character, and of unequal merit. It is, in fact, rather poetical journalism than poetry—better than the average, but not quite inspired.

The Renaissance.

The Renaissance in Italian Art (Sculpture and Painting), Part III. (Simpkin and Marshall, 5s.), completes Mr. Selwyn Brinton's handbook for students and travellers on the Italian Renaissance. Milan, Perugia, and Rome are the three sections into which he divides this present treatise; Leonardo, Raphael, and Michelangelo are the three great masters to whom the separate chapters of the book are devoted. The aim and title of the work is ambitious, and the performance is not quite worthy of them. In the first place the author's method is clumsy. He writes a chapter or two upon the master, Leonardo or Raphael, as the case may be, and after giving a biographical sketch and account of his principal works, with an abundance of flowery rhetoric, he proceeds to add what he calls an "analysis," in which much that he has already told us is again related and occasionally some of his former statements are contradicted. This system naturally produces much repetition and leaves the unhappy reader in a state of hopeless bewilderment. In the second place, Mr. Brinton is not always a safe guide for either students or travellers. He has visited most of the places he describes and appears to be tired with a genuine enthusiasm for his subject. He has read Crowe and Cavalcaselle, is well acquainted with Pater and Symonds, and quotes Müntz or Morelli at every page of his book. None the less, he fails to discriminate between the works of Raphael and those of his followers, and ascribes pictures that were plainly executed by Giulio Romano—the Vierge au Diadème, the Perla and the Spasimo, the St. Michael and the François I., the Naples Madonnas, and the portrait of Joanna of Aragon—wholesale to the great Urbinate. Again, he dilates with rapture on the wonders of Leonardo's Medusa and the beauty of his "Lucrezia Crivelli," works which have long been rejected by sound critics, while he contemptuously dismisses the lovely Virgin and St. Anne of the Louvre as a school picture. In the same way, he ascribes the charming Florentine Madonna, which forms the frontispiece of his book, to Piero della Francesca, although most of us recognize in it the masterpiece of Alessio Baldovinetti, with whose style the types, colouring, and technique alike agree. But Mr. Brinton ignores recent research, and has apparently never read Mr. Berenson's exhaustive criticism of the Florentine and Umbrian schools, or Mr. Herbert Cook's studies of Milanese artists. Even this, however, does not excuse him for repeating the old fable that Leonardo died in the arms of Francis I., when that Monarch happened to be absent from Amboise at the time of the painter's death, or leaving out all mention of the interesting letter recording the Cardinal of Aragon's visit to the great master in his closing years. Perhaps the best part of Mr. Brinton's book is his description of the frescoes in the Borgia Apartments of the Vatican, in which he takes Dr. Steinmann for his guide, and gives free rein to his admiration for Pinturicchio's lively imagination and graceful art.

Renaissance and Modern Art (Macmillan Co., 6s.) is the attractive title of Mr. W. H. Goodyear's work dealing rapidly and informingly with various arts from the early part of the fifteenth century until the present time. "Modern civilization dates from the Renaissance, and was created by it," is the text on which Mr. Goodyear writes with the help of some 200 illustrations of architecture, wood-carving, sculpture, and paintings. Mr. Goodyear exhorts us to no small amount of reading. To understand the Renaissance, we might say in our haste "read John Addington Symonds," but Mr. Goodyear names most of those historians whose works support his theory that only true philosophy of modern history is that which moves from the Renaissance as its elementary basis. For the art student there could be no sounder or more pleasant guide than the author of "Renaissance and Modern Art"; to those who know the period covered, Mr. Goodyear's book is a useful book of reference. The excellent index and the illustrations—the latter too small to give a full idea of beauty—make the volume one that all students should keep ready to hand.

In the "Spacious Days."

Two more volumes of the transactions of Queen Elizabeth's Privy Council have now been issued, with admirable prefaces, as usual, by Mr. J. R. Dasent—Acts of the Privy Council, Vols. XX. and XXI. (Eyre and Spottiswoode). They extend only from Michaelmas, 1590, to Michaelmas, 1591, and differ in no important particular from the volumes immediately preceding. The only event of these twelve months which still lives in popular history is the sea fight at the Azores between Sir Richard Grenville's one ship, the Revenge, and the whole Spanish fleet; and of this glorious little episode we hear nothing. Other ships are mentioned, but not the Revenge; and other seamen, but not Grenville. There are, however, the instructions sent to Admiral Lord Thomas Howard. He had a free hand, and was treated with rather unusual liberality in the matter of supplies. If he could not intercept the Plate fleet, he was at liberty to go to Newfoundland and prey on the enemy's fishing vessels. But his first object was the Plate fleet, and he knew that this year it would be exceptionally rich, for he had sent home word that its value was estimated at twenty millions. Yet, as Mr. Dasent remarks, he was caught napping. Mr. Dasent, of course, does not retell the whole story, but in a few concise words he suggests that Grenville plunged into the fight in the hope that his less enterprising commander-in-chief would be obliged to come to the rescue. It is true that Howard's half-a-dozen ships, with a few victuallers and pinnaces, were absurdly unequal to the fifty-three Spanish men-of-war; but, judging from what Grenville himself achieved, six Revenges and six Grenvilles would have crippled the entire force of Spain. As long as the sea power of Spain remained unbroken, there was always a certain fear of invasion. Beacons were carefully maintained, and pressgangs were constantly at work in the sea-board counties. Still, these chronic alarms had their compensations, at any rate to our southern ports, whose importance and prosperity they increased. It was better to be a sailor than a soldier in Elizabeth's time. Drake and Frobisher had very liberal ideas as to contraband of war, and made the whole sea very unsafe, from Dover to Gibraltar. They gave constant employment to the Admiralty Courts, and the Courts often found that the goods in question had somehow melted away before the delivery of judgment. Thus, the sailor might gain wealth; the discharged or broken-down soldier often had nothing but a begging licence. We note, as another effect of the war, that, in spite of the general use of gunpowder, archery was everywhere enjoined, not only as being a good recreation, but also in the interests of the decaying trade of the bowyers, fletchers, stringers, and arrow-head makers. With this object, the Council sent a circular letter to the lords lieutenants of counties requiring them to see that all such games as were prohibited by law—namely, "bowles, dysing, carding, and such like," should be strictly discontinued in favour of archery. One wonders how far such an order was effective, or another order substituting bear-baiting for stage plays on Sundays and Thursdays. The reason for this latter order seems to have been simply that bear-baiting "and like pastimes" were "maintained for her Majesty's pleasure, if occasion require." Apparently the Council recognized no limits to its power. Long before money-lending Bills were heard of, it exercised an equitable jurisdiction, somewhat peremptorily, in favour of poor debtors, and took cognizance of much that would generally have been left to the ordinary process of the law. One is surprised, indeed, at the wide range of its interference in purely private matters. Its orders were often arbitrary, and sometimes, we suspect, illegal; but it may be defended as the mainspring of the whole machine of Government in critical times. After all, there are grievances in these days, such as railway unpunctuality, organ grinders, and the price of gas, for which Burghley, Hatton, and Hunsdon would have found speedy, if unscientific, remedies.

Birds of the Air.

Miss Evelyn H. Pollard deals with this subject in the particular sense in THE BIRDS OF MY PARISH (Lane, 5s. n.), while Mr. W. P. Pycraft treats of the matter in a general way in THE STORY OF BIRD LIFE (Newnes, 1s.), which he tells with skill for the "Library of Useful Stories." Both volumes are worthy of the attention of all young people whose taste lies in the direction of the elements of ornithology. There are some 13,000 known species of birds, and about many of these much may be learnt from these two volumes. The parish of which Miss Pollard writes is that of Haynford, and we gather that the gardens of Haynford Hall must be a paradise of birds, who, in exchange for so much care and forethought, have given the author of "Birds of my Parish" constant pleasure and occupation. Miss Pollard errs, perhaps, on the side of the "chatty," but she is always light and often amusing. Mr. W. P. Pycraft is of more serious value, and none the less welcome. Every child is by nature a naturalist, and every child will be greatly aided in following his instinctive hobby by reading this admirable "Story of Bird Life."

Holiday Dreams.

We regret that we cannot welcome the reviviscence of the English essay in Mrs. Dew-Smith's collection entitled THE DIARY OF A DREAMER (Unwin, 6s.), although she, at least, gives us an agreeable volume of light and often charming papers. But her previous book, "Tom Tug and Others," had taught us to expect something of subtler meaning than is to be found in the present volume of sketches. The quotation from Dr. Bridges,

> The idle life I lead
> Is like a pleasant sleep
> Wherein I rest, and heed
> The Dreams that by me sweep, is appropriate enough to her work; but some of the dreams are a little too ephemeral, a little too much lacking in humour and grip, to be worthy the "heed" implied in the fact that they have been carefully written for publication. Mrs. Dew-Smith gives us a companion for an idle hour in the country when the sun prevents exercise and the peace of moor or sea inclines one to toy with another's dreams.

Much commendably diligent research has gone to the making of PICTURES OF THE OLD FRENCH COURT, by Catharine Bearne (Unwin, 10s. 6d.). It will be found a useful repository of facts by those who are interested in the lives of the later Valois Queens. We do not find it so good, however, as the same author's previous work on the early Valois Queens, which was reviewed in our columns. The facts, so carefully accumulated, are not presented with that graphic touch which pleases the general reader for whom, in view of the pictures and the attractive get up, we imagine the book to be intended. The pity is the greater because the volume really contains much good work.

Mr. James Hamilton Wylie's "Ford Lectures," delivered at Oxford in the Lent Term of the current year, are published under the title of THE COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE TO THE DEATH OF JOHN HUS (Longmans, 6s. n.). They constitute an important contribution to the study of an episode in religious history on which a great deal of controversial ink has been spilled. It will hardly permit itself to be read by any one who is not burrowing for information about the Council of Constance. But Mr. Wylie frankly ranges himself with those who value matériaux pour servir more than lofty generalization or picturesque description. He has at any rate paved the way for some more picturesque successor, whose task will be lightened by the perusal of his pages.

GOD'S WORD IN GOD'S WORLD is the title of a popular illustrated report of the operations of the British and Foreign Bible Society from its institution in 1802 to the present time. It is written by Miss G. B. Stuart, and published at the well-known house in Queen Victoria-street.

The appearance of a 7th edition of A GUIDE TO THE UNPROTECTED IN EVERY DAY MATTERS RELATING TO PROPERTY AND INCOME (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.) proves that this little manual of instruction in the rudiments of business is meeting with the appreciation which it deserves. But surely the writer is wrong in suggesting that, when a banknote is lost, you have only to write to your banker to get it "stopped." A banknote is a negotiable instrument, and payment cannot be refused to a bona fide holder for value. People who are in the habit of leaving banknotes lying about should bear that in mind, and guides to the unprotected should warn them of it.

From the Robinson Printing Company we have received THE TRINIDAD REVIEWER for 1900. It is a second issue of a year-book which we reviewed about a twelvemonth since. The paragraph devoted to Trinidad literature runs as follows:—

> The remarks we made in our previous issue with respect to the apathy, the seeming indifference, of the Trinidadian to attain intellectual success are as applicable now as when they were written.

FICTION.

"The Crimson Weed."

THE CRIMSON WEED (Duckworth, 6s.), by Mr. Christopher St. John, is an original and clever book. The prologue tells of the wild love of the beautiful Countess Maria Anguissola for an altogether unworthy person. The Countess is the soul of romance, but unfortunately she throws the treasure of her love into the lap of a stolid English artist, who hides from her the fact that he has a highly respectable wife and family at home. Gilbert Otway, like the other people of the book, is admirably drawn—"Every move in his life had been characterized by moderation and caution; and the psychologist might have been excused for laying heavy odds against him as a starter in the race of romance." The book thus opens with the clash of temperaments and develops on those lines. The romantic Maria Anguissola dies after the birth of her son who becomes the leading figure in the book. His fortunes are excellently well related, Mr. St. John's style being a plastic medium enabling him to convince the reader in moments of high tragedy or in the lightest mood of comedy. The quotation from Bacon, "Revenge is a kind of wild justice which the more man's nature runs to the more ought law to weed it out," gives the keynote of "The Crimson Weed." The working out of the admirably planned story we recommend the reader to discover for himself. Mr. St. John—to use a phrase from the book—writes "in the captivating style of the man who can write but has never written for the world." Here we have romance that does not clash with the Zeit-verhältnisse, and passion made probable to even an end of the century reader. To one detail, however, we must call attention. Mr. St. John is not fortunate in his quotation of the well-worn quatrain, No. LXXI., from Omar, beginning "The Moving Finger writes": we feel sure it will surprise him to know that the four lines contain no less than fourteen small mistakes.

"When the heart is young."

There are many books nowadays not written particularly for boys and girls, but which address themselves intentionally or without intention to the simple, honest, boyish people who, without caring a fig for literature, like a book with a story—obvious, exciting, pseudo-romantic. Mr. Oxenham's A Princess of Vascovy (Bousfield, 6s.) fills this want to perfection. Those who have not drunk of the founts of romance, those who have not followed too closely in the footsteps of the writers of fiction during the last 20 years, will find much in his book to entertain. All the corners of the earth are included in the Wanderlust of the first book; all the well-known emotions of the human heart are spoken of under the heading of Heimweh in the second. Of course, it has all been done before, but it is clearly and sometimes cleverly done, and as, we say, bound to be popular with those who wear the rose of youth—mentally or materially.

Such a book also is that of Miss Evelyn Everett-Green, Monica (Ward, Lock, 6s.), which tells a simple, pleasant story of the Trevlyns, of Castle Trevlyn, in the dear old, simple, pleasant manner, never offending, never delighting, never doing more than depicting, skilfully enough, the externals of life.

In rather a different manner, but of the same school, is Mrs. Burnett-Smith's (Annie S. Swan) The Burden-Bearers (Hutchinson, 3s. 6d.). Here the story, although equally strong in moral intention, is grotesque by reason of the insouciance of the style and plot. But Annie S. Swan is above criticism. All three books are atrociously illustrated.

Eleanor's Hero, by E. Everett-Green (Sunday School Union, 3s. 6d.), is suitable for younger girls, to whom we may recommend also The Temptation of Olive Latimer, by L. T. Meade (Hutchinson, 6s.). Mrs. Meade's industry in book-making is something stupendous. Two and three books from her pen frequently stand upon our table at the same time.

Mr. B. L. Farjeon offers the novel reader a new sensation by producing The Mesmerists (Hutchinson, 6s.), under the same covers as his play of that name. His intention is, of course, mainly for our delight, but he also wishes to anticipate those industrious persons who make a play out of a novel and make their profit out of the novelist at the same time. The supernatural in fiction is always welcomed by a large section of readers, and Mr. Farjeon has long since learnt how to please this class. "The Mesmerists" is cleverly written and well planned.

In the case of The Man Stealers, by M. P. Shiel (Hutchinson, 6s.), the idea is better than the execution. It is a story of a French conspiracy to kidnap the Duke of Wellington, and the pages are liberally peppered with sensations. We cannot conscientiously say, however, that we were very deeply interested by the narrative.

Had My After Dream (Unwin, 6s.), a somewhat satiric sequel to the late Mr. Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward," appeared while the fame of that widely read book was still fresh we have no doubt it would have been highly successful. But at this late date, when the unnamed author feels it is necessary to subjoin a brief outline of the story told by Mr. Bellamy, it will, we fear, meet with no great welcome. This is regrettable, as the continuation or skit is cleverly worked out and well written, although the humour here and there is forced and a little crude.

The Beachcombers, by Gilbert Bishop (Ward, Lock), belongs to one of its publisher's gift-book series, but whether to the "New Reward," the "Round Table," "The "Gift Book," the "Prize," or the "Captain" Library, is not quite clear. It is well bound and illustrated, and will do well for a school prize or Christmas present. The story is of "slave-trading under the Union Jack."

Robin Hood, by A. Alexander, F.R.G.S. (Burleigh, 6s.), is what it sounds, a tale of the merry forest, with King Richard and Little John and all the band complete. It would be better if the people did not speak in blank verse. Listen to this:—"'Tis said, my lord, that little babes when grown amongst the flowers wild partake like them o' virtues rare, and are not known by casting doubt to sin against those Master's laws." Why "flowers wild" instead of "wild flowers"?

Miss Duffus Hardy writes in her well-known style of Mac Gillroy's Millions (Simpkin, 6s.) a fluent and amusing story on somewhat old-fashioned lines.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Paris has this year been the centre for the International Congress of Librarians. The members have visited, during their brief sojourn, the celebrated library of Prince Roland Bonaparte, one of the most important private collections of books. They have also seen the Retrospective Exhibition of Books at the Paris Exhibition and the Château, Museum, and Library of Chantilly. M. Léopold Delisle conducted them through the Bibliothèque Nationale, and there was a final meeting at the Sorbonne. Some of the librarians decided to prolong their sojourn in Paris in order to draw up a report for their respective Governments on certain libraries which they will visit in detail.

A supplement to the Library Association Record gives a valuable paper by Mr. C. W. Sutton, Librarian of the Manchester Public Libraries, on "Special Collections of Books in Lancashire and Cheshire," which brings up to date a paper read before the association by Mr. J. H. Nodal in 1879. Mention is made of thirty-seven public institutions and fifty-nine public libraries, in which 279 special collections find place; and the catalogue is by no means exhaustive, for there are other private collections about which information is not at present forthcoming. This record goes far to justify the oft-repeated assertion that Lancashire holds the premier position among English counties in regard to its libraries. The richest treasures in Lord Crawford's collection and the rarities of the Rylands Library of course receive special notice, as well as many unique possessions of private persons, men of letters, and wealthy merchants. The principal features of the various municipal libraries are particularized, and it is satisfactory to learn that nearly all make a speciality of local collections. A perusal of Mr. Sutton's sixty pages affords a pleasant glimpse of the wealth of books and manuscripts in the two counties, and we echo his hope that the special collections in other localities may be similarly investigated and noted.

Another publication of the Library Association makes its appearance in the form of the "Year-book" for 1900. Besides the purely official information there is a chronicle of the association's educational efforts on behalf of those engaged in or desirous of entering upon library work. The classes have been fairly well attended, but there is a complete dearth of candidates for the professional examination. Probably a modification of the very high test at present imposed would have a good result, and the standard could be gradually raised. The questions are for the most part too academic. The association has submitted to the Royal Commission on Local Taxation its views on the troublous question of the assessment of libraries to rates and taxes, and a memorandum by the hon. secretary clearly states the present legal position and the arguments in favour of exemption. Indexes of papers and articles published by the association and a list of all the public libraries of the United Kingdom, as well as the principal libraries in the British colonies, are given in this useful volume. The programme of proceedings in connexion with the annual meeting of the association to be held at Bristol, September 25 to 28, has been issued.

Mr. F. W. Borwick has been appointed Superintendent of the Reading-room of the British Museum, in succession to Mr. W. R. Wilson, who transfers his services to the department of printed books.

Some time ago we mentioned that the authorities of the University and public libraries at Aberdeen were in consultation with a view to admitting the public to the use of the University Library. Arrangements have now been made for the purpose. Any one desirous of using the library may obtain tickets subject to the same regulations as apply to the public library, with the addition that every intending borrower must pay a subscription of 5s. annually. The University committee, however, may remit the subscription when it thinks fit. Borrowers will have access to the books and periodicals in the libraries of both King's and Marischal Colleges for purposes of reference and may take out at least two volumes at a time.

We recently referred to the desirability of issuing special lists of the books and records supplied to the public libraries by the Government. The Librarian of Nottingham forwards a copy of the Catalogue of Historical Publications, printed by her Majesty's Stationery Office, which is circulated among Nottingham readers. This sufficiently serves all purposes if, as may be presumed, all the works enumerated are contained in the library.

The Bermondsey Public Library will no longer be open on Sundays. The vestry have decided, by thirty-nine votes to nine, to close it on the ground that the attendance was comparatively small and comprised mainly the same individuals as on weekdays. This seems to be the experience of many other metropolitan libraries.

A motion that the Public Libraries Acts be adopted for the Heston and Isleworth district, including Hounslow, has been shelved for six months by a resolution of the urban council carried with a narrow majority of one vote. The reason adduced for delaying the matter was that the ratepayers should first be consulted, but, as recent amendments in the Acts have laid the power of adoption upon the local authority, it is doubtful whether any expenditure in taking a poll can be legally incurred. The postponement may involve the loss of a suitable site for a library which is now obtainable.

The foundation-stone has been laid of a fourth public library for Hampstead at Sarre-road, Mill-lane. There will be the usual reading-rooms and accommodation for 10,000 volumes as a lending library.

A new library has been erected at Barmouth to contain the books of Miss Frances Power Cobbe, which are a gift to the town. The site for the building was presented by the Cambrian Railway Company.

OBITUARY.

Professor Nietzsche had been insane for about ten years before his death. The fact has not, perhaps, any necessary bearing on the value of the philosophy associated with his name, though the rival school of Max Nordau may be excused for thinking that it has. But we are not of those who regard that philosophy as a serious contribution to human thought, or as in any way worthy of a countryman of Kant and Hegel; and those who have written reverently of Nietzsche, in this country, at any rate, have failed to convince serious philosophical students. Nothing is easier than to find a quasi-philosophical justification which will seem plausible to superficial thinkers for anarchical hedonism and the rejection of moral laws; and this is practically what Nietzsche did. He had his followers, as the prophet Harris had; for human folly is infinite, and there is always a public for the fantastic and extravagant. But he was no more a philosopher, in the strict sense of the word, than Laurence Oliphant was; though, like Laurence Oliphant, he often said striking things and sometimes said true things. His most striking note was, no doubt, his denunciation of our modern Humanitarianism. Perhaps our Humanitarianism needed a protest, and it is, at any rate, instructive to see the case against it stated. But if Nietzsche's disciples had rigidly carried out the doctrines which he preached, they would have knocked him on the head when they found him bereft of reason—and possibly at an even earlier stage in his career. As it is, his view that the weak should die will probably be illustrated by the attitude of posterity towards his teachings. He may be remembered as a meteoric and eccentric genius; but we do not think he will be remembered as a great original thinker.

Not only Cambridge but England suffers a severe loss in the death of Professor Henry Sidgwick at the age of 63, which is announced as we go to press. He was certainly not the least distinguished member of a family that has done much to uphold a high standard of English culture, the brother of William Sidgwick, a famous Oxford tutor, of Arthur Sidgwick, perhaps the most successful teacher of classics living, who, though a Cambridge man, now carries on at Oxford the fame of his brother, and of Mrs. Benson, the wife of the late Archbishop of Canterbury; and he married the lady who presides over Newnham College, and is the sister of Mr. Arthur Balfour. No man has done more than Professor Sidgwick to promote, or perhaps we may say to revive, in England a serious study of Ethics as a science. This he accomplished by the very fact that he was not the apostle of a new creed but an impartial, dispassionate philosopher, dealing with morals in a strictly scientific and historical spirit. His mind and training inclined him to subtlety and compromise rather than to any clear and broad solution of the problems which confront the ethical thinker. His books on moral philosophy include "The Methods of Ethics," 1874, "Outlines of the History of Ethics," 1886, "Practical Ethics," 1898, and a large number of papers on various sides of the subject. He was, however, not only a philosopher but a statesman, though he never entered public life; and his "Elements of Politics," 1891, "Principles of Political Economy," 1883, and "Scope and Method of Economic Science," 1885, show the same fine analytical power as his works on morals, though they are not likely in the future to rank quite so high. He was an assiduous supporter of the Society for Psychical Research.

The death is just recorded, at the age of seventy-four, of Thomas Faed, R.A., the popular Scottish painter, who has been appropriately termed "the Burns of Art." Among his numerous pictures, nearly all of which possess an undoubted charm of homely sentiment or pathos, that which is the most attractive from a literary and personal point of view is indubitably the portrait-group of "Sir Walter Scott and his Literary Friends at Abbotsford," the group comprising (in addition to Sir Walter) Lord Jeffrey, Lockhart, Wordsworth, Hogg, Moore, Campbell, Sir Adam Fergusson, Professor Wilson, Sir David Wilkie, R.A., &c., although it should be explained that they never assembled together under Scott's roof. The principal figure (viz., that of Sir Walter) is seated in the foreground, reading aloud from a manuscript to those around him. This painting was disposed of at the Gillott sale, about twenty years ago, for 910 guineas. À propos of Mr. Faed's portrait-group, it may be interesting at this moment to print the following unpublished letter, sent by the artist in reply to queries from Mr. F. G. Kitton, who was then preparing some notes on the Portraits of Scott:—

24a, Cavendish Road, St. John's Wood, N.W., Dec. 6, 1897.

Dear Sir,—I think I painted Sir Walter Scott and his friends in the year 1849. I had sittings from only four of the characters represented—namely, Sir Adam Fergusson, Professor Wilson, Lockhart, and Mr. Thomas Thompson. I was greatly obliged to Mr. John Murray, the publisher, of Albemarle Street, who allowed the run of his splendid gallery of portraits.

The picture was painted for the late Alex. Dennistown, of Golfhill. Mr. Dennistown, of Roslea (Rosslee, Helensburgh), was his eldest son—they are both dead, and I don't know where the work is. It was published by the late Mr. James Keith, of Edinburgh, and a most successful publication it was. It was engraved by my brother James, of Edinburgh. I painted Sir Walter from two or three portraits by the big men of the day. The room that the figures are represented in was the dining-room of Abbotsford. I spent a day in sketching it, and lunched with Mr. Hope, who, I fancy, married Mr. Lockhart's daughter. That is about all I can remember, and I can scarcely see to write it. I am, and have been, half blind for five years. Yours truly,

F. G. Kitton, Esq. Thomas Faed.

Sir John Adye was a man of letters as well as a man of war. His books were "A Review of the Crimean War to the Winter of 1854-5," "The Defence of Cawnpore by the Troops under the Orders of Major-General C. A. Windham, in November, 1857," "Sitana: a Mountain Campaign on the Borders of Afghanistan in 1863," "Recollections of Military Life," and "Indian Frontier Policy."

By the death of Mr. Robert Burns Begg, F.S.A.Scot., of Kinross, another link with Robert Burns has gone. Mr. Burns

Begg was a grandson of Isobel Burns, sister of the Scottish poet, and was the author of an interesting "Memoir of Isobel Burns." He was also the author of a "History of Lochleven Castle," "The Lochleven Angler," and an account of "Witchcraft in Kinross-shire."

Only a fortnight ago Professor Dowden was drawing attention in our columns to Professor L. Petit de Julleville's encyclopædic "History of French Language and Literature." The news that PROFESSOR JULLEVILLE is dead will be heard with sorrow in all literary circles. He was a scholar of the best French type, had held many high educational appointments, and been decorated with the Legion of Honour. He had written the history of the French stage as well as of French literature, and his "Les Comédiens au Moyen Age" was one among several of his books that were crowned by the Academy.

Correspondence.

"NEW LIGHT ON SIR WALTER RALEIGH."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In reference to Mr. J. P. Stone's letter in your last issue, in which he states that in the Month for June, 1891, he printed selections from the report of the "Examinations" at Cerne, I wish to point out that my belief that the documents had entirely disappeared had every apparent warrant. In the article on Raleigh in the "National Dictionary of Biography," in which they are mentioned, they are spoken of as being no longer accessible. All the biographers of Raleigh, including Mr. Stebbing, in his recently revised "Life," are ignorant of their existence. Moreover, in my article in the Fortnightly Review in February, 1899, in describing the newly discovered MSS. about Kyd and Marlowe, I mentioned Baker's note on the Cerne documents, and expressed my regret at not being at that time able to trace them. Though my article was widely commented on, from no quarter was any hint given that the Cerne documents had been already rediscovered and in part printed. Probably my article escaped Mr. Stone's notice as completely as his in the Month did mine. On my return to town I will certainly make myself acquainted with it.

But while acknowledging unreservedly his priority in printing and utilizing selections from the documents, which I was justified in looking upon as quite unknown, I consider that I may fairly claim to have rendered a service to the study of Raleigh's life by giving the papers a wider publicity than they had evidently hitherto obtained, and by studying them from an entirely new point of view. Mr. Stone, as he mentions, has dealt with them in connexion with the visit of Giordano Bruno to this country, "and as evidences of the growth of free thought in England at the end of the sixteenth century." I, on the other hand, have treated them in their relation to the charges of Atheism brought in the preceding year against Marlowe, Kyd, Harriott, and others, and in their bearing upon Raleigh's biography. That the documents throw "new light" upon various phases of Sir Walter's life seems to me unquestionable. Whatever changes of religious belief Raleigh may have gone through—and the question is too complicated to be summarily decided—the report of the discussion with Ironside gives a unique picture of his controversial method, and explains in a quite novel way how his reputation for "Atheism" was acquired. And, apart from this, the highly important allusion by Sir Walter to his Oxford career, the glimpses of the relations between himself and his brother Carew, the picture of his social life during his retirement at Sherborne, the curious revelations of the attitude towards him both of the Government and of his west-country neighbours during an obscure period of his career—all these points fully justify the claim that the "Examinations" at Cerne cast "new light upon Sir Walter Raleigh."

FREDERICK S. BOAS.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Professor Dowden thinks he could render English literature a greater service as a publisher than he does as a professor. Lovers of literature will judge otherwise. They might well wish, however, that he could become a great publisher without ceasing to be, as he humbly calls himself, a "poor professor."

Unfortunately, it is not possible to gainsay Professor Dowden's lament, that the History of English Literature has yet to be written—a critical history of literary thought, philosophic in its grasp of inner meaning and organic filament, appreciative and literary in its judgment; a book that will be a discipline in literary culture as well as an introduction to literature itself.

The English literary genius seems incapable of large views and the study of world movements of thought. Witness the innumerable hand-books, monographs, and period studies in English thought, all of which may be very good, but they are no substitutes for one great book. To study a great movement we either break it up or mark it off in some arbitrary fashion, either to suit the writer or the plan of the series. The inner meaning and movement of thought eludes any such effort to break it up into convenient bits.

Taine's History of English Literature is an effort of literary history on a large scale and in the light of certain large general ideas, but his ruling ideas were the set words of a scientist rather than the spiritual alertness of a philosophic interpreter.

Surely the time has now come for English scholarship to discharge its duty to itself and the great literature it professes.

Yours truly,

Burnside-cottage, Caldwell. WM. STARK.

THE MODERN LIFT FORETOLD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Hamonet's interesting note on "Rabelais and the Phonograph" in your issue of Saturday is quite in the spirit of the late Edouard Fournier, who wrote three volumes called "Le Vieux-Neuf" to show that most modern inventions were foretold centuries ago. His theory was that "whatever is new has only been forgotten." But even Fournier, with all his encyclopædic knowledge, did not know Paul de Kock. It may be interesting to your readers to find that that gay and too-much-neglected novelist foretold the invention of the modern lift or elevator by the use of which the New York "sky-scraper" tenements are made habitable. The following passage occurs in L'Amant de la Lune, Part II., Chap. 7. This novel was published about 1835, nearly thirty years before the lift was invented:

> — Madame Boursicoff? dit Félicia en passant devant la loge du concierge, loge vitrée de tous les côtés, ce qui lui donne l'aspect d'une lanterne.
> — Au cinquième, l'escalier à gauche, au fond de la cour.
> — La Comtesse de Boursicoff loge un peu haut! dit Isidore, en hochant la tête.
> — A présent, répond Bouchonnier, les appartements sont aussi beaux, aussi bien décorés au cinquième qu'au premier. Ils ont ensuite l'avantage d'avoir une plus belle vue. Je crois même que maintenant la mode est de se loger haut.
> — C'est très-bien, mais alors on devrait faire monter les visites que l'on reçoit en ballon ou en panier, comme dans les mines.
> — Il est probable, vu l'état de progrès dans lequel nous vivons, que l'on s'occupera de cela, et dans quelques années on aura trouvé une mécanique qui remplacera les escaliers . . . car l'escalier est terriblement raseur!
> — Et fatiguant, dit Isidore, qui suivait Félicia et son cousin.

Unquestionably the hydraulic elevator is as plainly indicated here as the Crystal Palace of 1851 was foreshadowed by Chaucer's "Palace made of glass." I am yours &c.,

A. H. MILLAR.

MILLER'S TEXTUAL COMMENTARY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I must trust to your sense of justice to provide me with a little space to show that your editorial plea, that the Western Text "exists ready to hand in the 'apparatus criticus' of Tischendorf," is no reply to my contention that it was practically impossible for me to include that unpublished Text amongst the continuous Texts of Westcott and Hort and others, which I have examined in the formation of my own Text.

1. It should be noticed at the outset that Western readings, except those which are rejected by Tischendorf, Westcott and Hort, the Revisers, and the Received Text—that is, by all the four—have all their evidence stated on my pages.

2. Tischendorf wrote thirty years ago; the votaries of the Western Text are now at work, and have not yet presented their continuous Text, and stated the readings which they intend to support.

3. Tischendorf not only does not point out specially the readings in question (all of which he rejects), but further than this he does not even tell us which he considers to be Western. He catalogues his evidence without any such discrimination.

4. The only way, therefore, by which I could have got at them would have been to select them myself, perhaps taking some of them from literature more or less floating, or, as you vaguely say, from "sundry editions of MSS."

5. This course, besides being open to constant objection, would have been the more laborious and troublesome, because in my own mind I am sceptical about the Western Text proving anything at all like what the votaries of it fondly imagine. I am waiting till their case is presented, and then I will examine it with all the candour in my power.

6. Such an increase in my labour would have swamped my entire attempt.

On the whole, the purport of your reviewer's suggestion (coupled with high condemnation of me for not doing as he wishes) would have been to make one side of the controversy (which in my book I have kept in the background as much as I could) to accomplish the work of the other. No surprise can be created if, not having just come into the world, I respectfully maintain, also on general grounds, that I have been right in not going out of my way to undertake so hazardous and gratuitous a task.

EDWARD MILLER.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

One of the most interesting announcements in the art world is that "A Descriptive and Historical Catalogue of Pictures and Sculpture at Apsley-house" has been prepared by Evelyn, Duchess of Wellington, for publication during the autumn by Longmans. There are some famous pictures in the Apsley-house collection—a fine Correggio ("Christ on the Mount of Olives"), captured from Joseph Bonaparte in Spain, and others by Teniers, Velasquez, Claude Lorraine, and Jan Steen. The specimens of Wilkie's work are specially good, and include his "Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo"—painted for the Duke of Wellington—and the full-length portrait of George IV., in Highland costume, which was damaged by a stone during the Reform Bill riots. Of the battle pieces the most celebrated is Sir William Allan's "Battle of Waterloo, with Napoleon in the Foreground," which the Duke is said to have voted, "Good, very good—not too much smoke." Among the portraits in the collection are several of Napoleon, and these, no doubt, will be included in the fifty-two photo-engravings with which the Duchess of Wellington's "catalogue" is to be illustrated.

Van Dyck will also figure prominently in the art volumes of the autumn. Many visitors to the magnificent exhibition at Antwerp a year ago in celebration of the tercentenary of the birth of Van Dyck hoped that some worthy memorial of the collection would be preserved, and it is satisfactory to know that the opportunity for doing so was not allowed to pass. Fifty paintings were selected and reproduced by photogravure; and these are to be published here in volume form by Messrs. Sampson Low. The pictures were collected from all parts of Europe for the tercentenary exhibition, among the English contributors being the Queen, the Duke of Norfolk, and the Duke of Westminster. Besides the photogravures and introductory matter, there will be a hundred pages of descriptive text by Max Rooses, Conservateur du Musée Plantin-Moretus. The volume will be bound, the announcement mysteriously adds, "in a strangely striking half-parchment binding."

A large illustrated édition de luxe of Hans Christian Andersen's Fairy Tales has been in course of preparation for some years in Denmark. It has recently begun to appear in parts, and will be completed by Christmas. It will be published in Copenhagen by the Nordiske Forlag, and translations will appear simultaneously in French, German, Swedish, Russian, and Czech. There will also be an English translation by Mr. Brackstad, to be published in this country by Mr. Heinemann, and in America by the Century Company. The illustrations have been engraved on wood by the first wood engravers of the day—Florian, Rousseau, Closs, Bauer, Bentals, Kresse, and Dana.

Captain Mahan has joined the miscellaneous band of historians of the South African war, and is also pledged to write a book on "The Problem of Asia." Both works will, of course, be published in this country by Messrs. Sampson Low. His "Story of the War in South Africa" includes a chapter on the transport of the troops, but deals very largely, we believe, with the operations ashore. South African books form a leading feature of Messrs. Sampson Low's autumn programme, for they are also publishing The Times "History of the War," in five or six volumes, details of which we have already given.

The Palimpsest Gospels, first discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in the Sinai Convent, have been much written about and fully photographed since the result of the ladies' labours was first given to the world in 1891, but it is only now that the some four hundred photographs of the actual MSS. have been collected into volumes. These prints of the ancient Estrangelo Syriac characters convey a correct and vivid idea of the original writings, and should be of immense value to all scholars and students of the subject. Thanks to the courtesy of Mr. Allenson, of Ivy-lane, who first suggested the issue of the volumes, we have seen one of the sets of four books which Mrs. Lewis is now permitting to be sent to four fortunate recipients. Cambridge, to which University Mrs. Lewis may be said to belong, is to hold two copies, one finding a home in the Presbyterian College in that town; Manchester is to have one at the Rylands Library, and one will be sent to Germany. There will be no likelihood of further issue, and thus the volume, which has been six years in preparation, is never likely to find its way into London again. Oxford and the British Museum will have to journey to Cambridge to study the photograph reprint of these extraordinarily interesting manuscripts.

Mr. Andrew Lang, having exhausted the primary colours, has fallen back on grey as the tint for his annual Christmas volume. "The Grey Fairy Book" will be published, as usual, by Messrs. Longmans, who also promise another Golliwogg book. This will show us the Golliwogg's Polar adventures, a theme that suggests wondrous and fearful joys.

Among Messrs. Bell's art publications, besides Mr. Lionel Cust's Van Dyck, are to come this month "Bottiecelli and his School," by Count Plunkett, and "Fra Angelico and his Art," by Professor Langton Douglas of Adelaide; a study by Dr. G. C. Williamson of the water-colourist "Pinwell and his works"; a catalogue by C. F. Bell, Assistant Keeper to the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, of "The Exhibited Works of Turner"; a volume by Mr. Walter Crane on "Line and Form," uniform with his "Bases of Design"; and an historical study by Mary F. S. Hervey of Holbein's "Ambassadors"; and in the "Great Masters Series," besides the "Peragino" just published, volumes on "Sodoma," by the Contessa Priuli-Bon; "Memline," by W. H. J. Weale, and "Della Robbia," by the Marchesa Burlamacchi. Lady Dilke's work on French art will be continued by "French Architects and Sculptors of the Eighteenth Century."

The same publisher's well-known "Endymion Series" will be continued by "The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe," illustrated by W. Heath Robinson, with an Introduction by H. Noel Williams; and the new volume of the "Ex Libris Series" will be on "German Book Plates," translated by G. Ravenscroft Dennis from the German of Count zu Lehningen-Westerburg. Mr. Reginald Blomfield, the author whose larger work on Renaissance architecture is well known, has compiled for Messrs. Bell a "Short History of Renaissance Architecture in England (1500-1800)." Other books from the same house to appear at once or shortly, are the life of "Coventry Patmore," by Basil Champneys; "Voices of the Past from Assyria and Babylonia," by H. S. Roberton; and "Side Lights on English History," collected by Ernest Henderson.

The new list of books in preparation at the Clarendon Press contains, after "The English Miscellany" just mentioned, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's "Treasury of English Poetry," which he has had in hand for the past seven years. The new anthology makes a volume of nearly a thousand pages, but, printed on Oxford India paper, will be handy in size. Mr. Quiller-Couch has paid particular attention to the minor poetry of the present century. Another important item is a volume by Professor Skeat, entitled "English Etymologies." "Studies in Foreign Literature" is also included, "being the Taylorian Lectures, 1889-1899, delivered by S. Mallarmé, W. Pater, W. P. Ker, H. Brown, A. Morel Fatio, E. Dowden, F. W. Rolleston, W. M. Rossetti, P. Bourget, C. H. Herford, and H. Butler Clarke."

The Clarendon Press has taken over the "History of the Church of England from the Abolition of the Roman Jurisdiction," by the late R. W. Dixon, M.A., the first four volumes of which were published by Messrs. Routledge and Son. Volumes V. and VI. are now in preparation. Among the other announcements which figure in the list for the first time are "Studies in History and Jurisprudence," by the Right Hon. James Bryce; "The Polyphonic Period of Music," by H. E. Wooldridge, M.A.; and "The Topography of Baghdad," by Guy L'Estrange.

Messrs. Longmans' list has many important items. Some have already been announced—Mr. Winston Churchill's story of "Ian Hamilton's March," for instance. One of several works of travel will be "Armenia," by Mr. H. F. B. Lynch, in two volumes. To turn to history, the second volume of the late Sir William Hunter's "History of British India" and the third volume of Mr. Gardiner's "History of the Commonwealth" are in the press. A new and cheaper edition of Professor Lawrie's "Historical Survey of Pre-Christian Education," originally published in 1895, will be ready in the autumn. New works by Dr. Charles Gross, of Harvard, entitled "The Sources and Literature of English History from the Earliest Times to about 1485," and by Professor William Bright, entitled "The Age of the Fathers" (two volumes), are also in preparation. The classical languages are represented by a new translation of "The Odyssey of Homer," by Mr. Samuel Butler; while "Morte d'Arthur" has been edited from the Thornton MS., with introduction, notes, and glossary, by Mary Macleod Banks. Messrs. Longmans also announce a work by the president of the Society for Psychical Research, Mr. Frederic W. H. Myers, in two volumes, entitled "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death." Mr. Myers aims—so the announcement runs—"at presenting in continuous form the bulk of the evidence, experimental and otherwise, which points to human faculty operating below the threshold of ordinary consciousness during the life on earth, and to human faculty continuing to operate after the body's decay." Several volumes of essays are in the list, among them "Surveys, Historical and Economic," by Mr. W. J. Ashley, author of "English Economic History and Theory," and "The Tents of Shem: Essays on South Indian Subjects," by Stanley P. Rice, Indian Civil Service. There is a translation in the press, too, of Paul Kristeller's "Andrea Mantegna," by Mr. S. Arthur Strong.

Among the works announced in Messrs. Sampson, Low's autumn list, besides those already referred to, are "Britain's Austral Empire," with forty photogravure portraits by Mr. Percy F. Spence and letterpress by Mr. G. Firth Scott; "The Inhabitants of the Philippines," by Mr. Frederick H. Sawyer; "Sailing Alone Around the World," by Captain Joshua Slocum; and the twentieth and concluding volume of "Twentieth Century Practice of Medicine," dealing with tuberculosis and containing an appendix and index.

THEOLOGY.—Messrs. Skeffington's list includes a manual of Confirmation and Holy Communion, by Canon Knox Little, entitled "Be Strong." A volume of thirty new sermons, by the Rev. J. B. C. Murphy, under the title of "Till the Night is Come," will also appear in the autumn, as well as a new and revised edition of the Rev. H. J. Wilmot Buxton's "The Child of a Great Century." Mr. Buxton's work, published last year, is being brought up to date, with references to the war in South Africa, the troubles in China, the S.P.G. Bi-Centenary, and so on. Mr. Buxton's "Words by the Way," fifty-seven sermons which have been appearing in quarterly parts, will be ready in book form during September. New volumes of sermons and readings, by Mr. J. Paget Dyson, the Rev. R. Brooks Eggs, the Rev. C. W. Fullmer (preached at Barkisland, Halifax), and the Rev. S. C. Lowry, Vicar of North Holmwood, Surrey; as well as "A Book of Prayer for Boys" (including the complete Office of Holy Communion), by the Rev. E. L. Bevan, Vicar of Bremar, are also announced by Messrs. Skeffington for the autumn.

Theological works figure also largely in Messrs. Longmans' list. "The Conception of Immortality: the Ingersoll Lecture, 1899," by Professor Josiah Royce, of Harvard, is stated to be nearly ready; and "Priesthood and Sacrifice: a Report of a Conference held at Oxford, December 13 and 14, 1899," edited by Professor Sanday, is due during September. The following are among the numerous theological volumes announced as being in the press:—"The Eucharistic Sacrifice," by Dr. A. G. Mortimer, Rector of St. Mark's, Philadelphia; "Meditations on the Sermon on the Mount," by Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, translated by F. M. Capes; and "Faith and Progress: Sermons preached at the Dedication Festival of St. Barnabas' Church, Pimlico, June 10-17, 1900," edited by the Rev. the Hon. A. Hanbury-Tracy, with an introduction by the Rev. T. T. Carter.

A new "two-version" edition of the Bible will be published this month by Mr. Henry Frowde. The Authorized Version has been printed with all the differences of the Revised Version placed in the side margins, while in the centre column are the indispensable marginal references. The Bishop of Gloucester writes a preface.

Mr. Austin Dobson will edit the new edition of Leigh Hunt's "Old Court Suburb" which Mr. Freemantle will publish in the autumn, illustrated by Mr. Herbert Railton and Mr. Edmund J. Sullivan. Each chapter will be brought up to date, and the book will contain reproductions of the fashion plates of the period.

Mr. Heinemann announces "A Little Tour in France," by Henry James. His descriptions have been supplemented by a series of about a hundred drawings by Mr. Joseph Pennell.

Mr. Henry James' "The Soft Side," which we announced last week, is published not, as we said, by Messrs. Skeffington, but by Messrs. Methuen.

Mr. Thomas Burleigh will shortly publish a handbook of dramatic art, under the title of "Elocution and Stage Training," from the pen of Mr. Maxwell Ryder.

There is to be published in the United States a new "Life and Writings of Thomas Jefferson," by Professor S. E. Forman, of Johns Hopkins University. The most authentic life of Jefferson at present is that edited by Paul Leicester Ford.

Mr. Edwin Markham's new volume of poetry is to be published in the early autumn by Messrs. Doubleday, Page, and Co.

Professor Lombroso's daughter, Paola Lombroso, has published a volume entitled "Problems of Happiness," in which she entirely disagrees with her father's views.

Mr. Robert Anning Bell, who illustrated the Midsummer Night's Dream a year or two ago, has illustrated The Tempest for Mr. Freemantle on a somewhat more elaborate scale.

Owing to the large number of translations of Buddhist works from various Oriental languages which have made their appearance during the past ten years, Messrs. Methuen are about to issue a fourth edition of Mr. E. M. Bowden's work, "The Imitation of Buddha," which the author has rearranged and revised throughout. The general plan of this Buddhistical anthology will not be altered, but the new edition will contain many fresh quotations from the sacred and semi-sacred literature of the Buddhists. The book will be ready towards the end of the year.

FICTION.—On September 6th Messrs. F. V. White and Co. will publish John Strange Winter's seventieth book, which will bear the title of "A Self-made Countess: The Justification of a Husband"—a satire on society methods in matrimonial matters.

"In Male Attire" is the title of Mr. Joseph Hatton's new novel to be published by Messrs. Hutchinson at the latter end of September. It ran serially in Australia and New Zealand and in the United States and India and in the People at home.

Messrs. Brentanos, of New York, announce for publication two of Mr. Bernard Shaw's earlier stories—"The Irrational Knot" and "Love Among the Artists."

PERIODICALS.—The new diaries of Marie Bashkirtseff, lately discovered in Paris, and covering the last year of the young artist's life, begin to appear to-day in the Gentlewoman. There will also be published a correspondence between Marie Bashkirtseff (incognito) and Guy de Maupassant.

This month's number of Scribner's Magazine contains an article by W. D. Howells, being a record of his personal relations with James Russell Lowell.

A new bi-monthly review, the Revue de Synthèse Historique, is announced for immediate publication in Paris by the house of L. Cerf, 12, rue Sainte-Anne, at 15 francs per year, 17 francs for foreign countries. The editor, M. Henri Berr, says that the review is intended to be not merely a work of erudition, but a guide, indicating "the state of the work already accomplished and still to be done, and, consequently, helping to direct research."

A new German monthly, rather reminiscent of "The Yellow Book" is "Die Insel, Herausgegeben von Otto Julius Bierbaum, Alfred Walter Heymel, and Rudolf Alexander Schroeder." Both the letterpress and the drawings are fanciful, not to say eccentric, but the names of Johannes Schlaf, Richard Dehmel, and Frank Wedekind are an assurance that ideas will not be wanting. There is in it a curious mingling of ancient and modern. Side by side with drawings by Behmer and Th. Heine are reproductions after Balthasar Le Mercier, an early seventeenth-century French engraver, and after Flaxman. A prologue to Sophocles' "Antigone," by Hugo von Hofmanns, is particularly good, and so are some remarks by Meier-Gräso on the influence of the painter Millet on modern æsthetics. The journal is altogether much more interesting than the ordinary German magazine, and is far beyond it in printing, paper, and general get-up.

(a) In the Steinitz defence this move is not recognized as useful. Kt–K B 3, followed by P–Q 4 is better. As played, White never castles.

(b) Kt–R 3 is not often good. Here there is no objection to it, and it can only be thus developed.

(c) Having gone to Kt 5, it was better to play B–Kt, though that would open the Q Kt file.

(d) A good attack comes of this, which it is not easy to meet.

(e) Black is not afraid of the threat B×P ch, which amounts to little.

(f) A grave error, as will be seen at once. The game is only interesting as an example of chess between the greatest problemist and the greatest player of any period.

(a) An old-fashioned variation of the Petroff defence. This is the usual way. Now, P–Q 4, Kt–Q B 3 and other moves are common.

(b) Not Kt×P at once because of the reply Q–K 2.

(c) P–R 4 at once is also good and is often adopted.

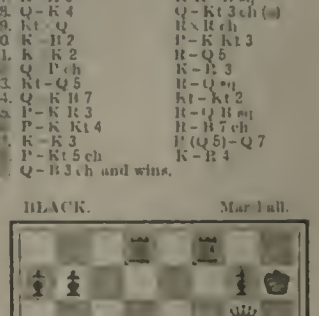
(d) It is dangerous to open the K B file, which is one result of this tempting exchange. The pawn can be won back, but Black has now many powerful chances.

(e) Good, because now B–Kt 3 will at any time make his King's position safer.

(f) Evidently Marshall relied upon this move, but apparently without good reason.

(g) We assume there was some miscalculation here. Most probably Black overlooked that the Kt would remain pinned. Otherwise the obvious play would be to remove the Kt discovering and attacking White's Queen. In any case White had the better game.

BLACK. Marshall.



WHITE. Röthing.
White to play his 41st move.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It is instructive to find that the same trouble about the retail price of books which disturbs the trade in England is also disturbing it in the United States. There it is the department stores which cut the prices; and the American Publishers' Association is preparing a scheme to refuse to supply those stores unless they mend their ways.

* * * *

Whether the stores will be amenable to this kind of treatment remains to be seen. As they have capital, it will be easy for them to kick if they care to do so, by the simple device of adding publishing departments to their businesses or financing publishers who do not belong to the Association. The authors, with whom the final decision necessarily rests, are hardly likely to refuse to write for them if they offer satisfactory terms; for the argument that presents itself to the average author's mind is the simple one that the more retail prices are cut the more copies of a book are likely to be sold. The American publishers believe that they can demonstrate to the stores that "it will not be a bad thing for them" to agree to sell their books at the same prices as the booksellers; but that is doubtful. The stores probably do not sell the books for the sake of the direct profit, but use them as a lure to attract customers who may then be persuaded to purchase other commodities. In that case "cutting" is an integral part of the scheme, and they will not easily be induced to abandon the practice.

The traditional conservatism of Blackwood is illustrated by a dialogue of the dead in which the inventor of printing and a certain Yellow Editor discuss the uses and abuses of the printing press. The editor boasts of the power which he has acquired, and Gutenberg sets him in his place:—

> Indeed, if my invention be thus perverted, it were better it had never been made. The printing press in my hands was an instrument of luxury, not a means of irresponsible power. Yet even my contemporaries called it a black art. What would they say of it now, if they heard your boastful rhetoric? No; it is not for you to claim a kinship with Gutenberg. Truth and lies, beauty and squalor, do not acquire the same value because they are both printed.

There is a grain of truth, no doubt, in the writer's denunciation of the cheap press. But lies used to prevail and injurious influence to be exercised by persons unworthy of it centuries before the Yellow Press came into existence. Without it the story of "Jenkins' Ears" got floated and made a war, and the harm done by the New York Journal in embroiling America with Spain is trifling compared with the harm done by fanatics who stirred up war in the middle ages. And the difference lies in this. The Yellow Press educates the people while it misleads them, so that they gradually get to be critical of its loose statements; the medieval fanatics misled but did not educate.

* * * *

Apropos of the paper in our last week's issue on "The Joys of Writing," we note a letter in a New York paper from a Mr. Joel Benton, in which the subject assumes the magnitude peculiar to the products of the Western Continent. "One pleasure," says Mr. Benton, with perhaps a touch of tautology, "that is peculiar and without an exact parallel elsewhere belongs only to the author. It is that electric titillation that comes but once, yet lives in memory while life lasts, the unique pleasure of seeing one's thoughts for the first time in print. It is a sensation indescribable—not to be communicated—but which seems to bear some token or prophecy of immortality. Your utterance now, though centuries may pass, seems enshrined and secure. It may even outlast the Pyramids." If this passage (in which the penultimate sentence is somewhat obscure) aroused in us a certain electric titillation, we can only apologize to Mr. Benton, whose position in the world of letters is described by himself in the title of his letter "Authorship: the Pleasures of this Pursuit: by one who has known them long."

The late Sir William Fraser, in his will, directed his executors to devote part of his estate to the foundation and endowment of a home for necessitous persons, giving preference to authors or artists who, either from non-success in the professions of literature and art, or from other causes, are in reduced circumstances. The home is now in course of erection at Colinton, a small village lying a few miles to the south-west of Edinburgh. The buildings will comprise twelve houses, with a large hall and a reading room which are to be used in common. The regulations for admission have not yet been drawn up and are entirely in the hands of the executors.

What is to be the name of the important thoroughfare which the London County Council is about to construct between Holborn and the Strand? Perhaps there is something to be said for the suggestion of a correspondent, who writes:—"A glance at the plan of the projected street (as published recently in the Daily News) shows that it will run through a prominent part of what may justly be termed 'Dickens' London,' and this necessarily means the removal of some of the houses and localities immortalized in his stories. In Wellington-street, Strand, there yet remains the building which constituted the office of Household Words in the novelist's time; Somerset House (Navy Pay Office), was the scene of the early labours of his father, John Dickens, who, in 1809, married Elizabeth Barrow at the church of St. Mary-le-Strand, close by; in Clare-court, Drury-lane, Dickens himself (when a boy at the Blacking Warehouse, Hungerford Market) was wont to frequent an à la mode beef-house (now non-existent) for his mid-day meal. Turning from fact to fiction, we find mention of Clare Market, the New Inn, and Portugal-street, in the pages of 'Pickwick'; in the latter thoroughfare still stands the picturesque old tenement (doomed, like the rest) which has found public favour in the supposition that it is the veritable 'Old Curiosity Shop'; Sardinia-street plays a part in the Gordon Riots of 'Barnaby Rudge,' and No. 58, Lincoln's-inn-fields, which was familiar to Dickens as the sometime residence of Forster, his biographer, is immortalized in 'Bleak House,' as the home of Tulkinghorn, the lawyer. 'Jo's burial-ground' of 'Bleak House,' between Drury-lane and Catherine-street, has quite lately been wiped out of existence, and Kingsgate-street, Holborn, being memorable as the home of Mrs. Gamp, in the line of the new street, is likely to share the same fate. It was at St. Clement Danes that Mrs. Lirriper was united in matrimony to 'poor Lirriper,' as faithfully recorded in the Christmas number of Household Words, 185. Remembering those associations with England's favourite novelist, what could be a happier designation for the new street than 'Dickens Avenue?' We already possess a Shaftesbury Avenue and a Rosebery Avenue, so why not continue this method of nomenclature? I commend the suggestion to the L.C.C. for their serious consideration."

With reference to a correspondent's inquiry as to a Literary Correspondence Club, Mr. H. R. Hall (address, Helmsley, West Side, Wandsworth-common) writes:—

> I beg to answer your correspondent's query re an Essay Club. I am the honorary secretary of a club which was started in 1885, and has gone on continuously since. We call it the Scarborough Essay Society, as most of the members were then living at that place. We are now, however, widely scattered. The plan we adopt is to select 18 subjects each year. Of these three are selected every other month, leaving a choice for writing. Every member is expected to write each time, but obliged to do so three times in the year. The essays are circulated during two months among the members for mutual criticism. I do not know that our standard is particularly high, but I think the thing is valued by most of us.
> Being now away from home temporarily I am unable to forward rules, &c., but will do so for your correspondent if he will address me at my home.

Mr. Th. Bentzon, in the Century, deals with Père Didon. It is curious that he has little to say about the really valuable work achieved by that popular preacher. Père Didon's eloquence will probably be forgotten before very long. Most of what he said about reconciling religion and science was nonsense—for the reason that he knew no science worth speaking of. His Life of Christ proved that he was not a scholar; and set many critics wondering whether there was not something in modern Roman Catholicism incompatible with scholarship. But he did good work as an educationist, and really, to a certain extent, reformed French schools. His tour of the English schools, in quest of hints on discipline and the organization of athletics, left pleasant memories behind it; and Mr. Bentzon records that he was the author of a variant on "We are none of us infallible, not even the youngest of us": "There is no surer way of not knowing anything at forty than to know everything at seventeen." As a matter of fact Père Didon himself did not know a great deal at sixty; but that circumstance does not affect the value of his epigram.

Judging from a great deal that has been said lately about the public schools, one wonders that Père Didon found anything to admire in them. Mr. Rouse, who knows his subject well, makes out in the August Contemporary that assistant masters are miserably underpaid. Mr. F. Verney, in The Times, complains of the "absolutely contemptible educational training" given to all boys except those near the top of each form, and Dr. Spencer has given in the same review a lurid picture of the "athletic master." There is another side to all these views of which we shall hope to hear something. May not Mr. Verney's letter to some extent suggest an answer to Mr. Rouse's article? Certain it is that the profession is overstocked by inefficient men, many of whom would have done much better if they had become bank clerks. The schoolmaster's profession offers an immediate (if small) income without apprenticeship, a healthy life, and exceptionally long holidays. These are advantages (as compared with other professions) for which the schoolmaster must expect to pay. Similar instances of ill-success to those which Mr. Rouse quotes could be quoted by hundreds among lawyers, doctors, and clergymen. Mr. Rouse gives £120 as the average salary of an assistant; but he admittedly leaves out of account the largest and best known public schools. Is the average any higher for the clerical profession, leaving out the "superior" clergy, who may be taken to equal the headmasters? (We agree with him that the headmaster's salary is, as a rule, disproportionate.) More and more also is being done in the way of pension schemes for assistant masters. The prospect is on the whole, we fully admit, too uncertain for good men—and Mr. Verney should be reminded that there are good men in the profession, and many of them study it with far more seriousness and zest than they did ten or twenty years ago.

Friday, Sept. 7, was the day of the celebration of the bi-centenary of James Thomson, the poet of "The Seasons," at Southdean Manse, near Jedburgh. The celebration at Ednam some time ago was a trifle premature, Thomson having been born on the 7th (as it is generally believed, although some writers say the 11th) September, 1700. While Ednam has the honour of his birth, most of his early life was spent in Southdean. His father, who was a minister, removed to that parish when the future poet was only two months old. There James Thomson spent the first fifteen years of his life, and there he received impressions which were never effaced. The old manse in which he lived stood near the "silver Jed," whose "pastoral banks" according to himself first echoed to his Doric reed. The scenery described in "The Seasons" is in many cases that of the parish of Southdean. There is appropriateness in celebrating there the two-hundredth anniversary of the poet's birth. Among those delivering addresses we find Sir George Douglas, Judge Willis, and the Rev. W. S. Crockett, of Tweedsmuir.

The author of "The Prisoner of Zenda" and "Rupert of Hentzau" is to make another effort to get into the House of Commons. Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, the politician, is not nearly so well known as Anthony Hope, the novelist, and the circumstance has probably been forgotten by most persons that the former contested the Wycombe Division of Bucks in the Liberal interest in 1892. He was unsuccessful then, and it remains to be seen whether he will be more fortunate in the Falkirk Burghs. Perhaps Mr. Hawkins in accepting the invitation to contest this particular Scottish constituency did not fail to observe that it is exceedingly consistent in its inconsistency, and during the last fifteen years has changed its politics at each successive election, returning a Unionist and a Liberal alternately.

An article in the Gentleman's Magazine on Dr. John Hawkesworth throws an interesting light on the condition of the profession of letters in the eighteenth century. Hawkesworth began life as nobody in particular, and succeeded Dr. Johnson as Parliamentary reporter to the publication in which his career is related. He edited the Adventurer on the lines of Johnson's Idler with such distinction that the Archbishop of Canterbury exercised an ancient privilege and made him an LL.D. without examination. He wrote a novel, which was not unlike "Rasselas," and he edited the works of Swift. Finally he was commissioned by the Earl of Sandwich to write up Cook's voyages, from his log, and Sir Joseph Banks' diary. It was hack-work, and it would be hard, in these days, to find an instance of hack-work being better paid. In one of Hawkesworth's letters we read that he received > Applications from half the booksellers in London, none of whom offered me more than five thousand pounds, without allowing me a single copy. Mr. Strahan offered me six thousand and to furnish me with all the copies that I had engaged to give away, which being twenty-five amounted to seventy-five pounds.

The book was not so successful as was expected, and was unfavourably criticized. According to Mr. Morris, the writer in the Gentleman's Magazine,

> One of the faults most rightly found with him is that he put classical allusions into the mouth of the Captain, though he must have known that the mate of a Whitby collier could have had but little opportunity to study Aulus Gellius.

Attorney-General Thurlow criticized the book in the House of Commons as "a mere composition of trash." Horace Walpole was no less severe. It is said that he died of a broken heart as the result of these censures.

Mr. George Serrell contributes to Temple Bar a sparkling essay on the light which Milton's sonnets throw on Milton's personal character. He considers that they reveal the poet as "a man of bitterness and prejudice," ready to "impute evil motives," while wearing "a somewhat arrogant air of superiority," and also as a poseur, given to inventing arrogant excuses for not risking his precious skin even for causes which he believed to be good. The case is made out from the sonnet written "when the assault was intended to the City"; and Mr. Serrell wants to know why Milton, "a man in the flower of his age, at thirty-four, a man with no special family ties, a man skilled in the use of weapons, a man pronounced in his hostility to the Royal cause," was not among the defenders. And then comes the indictment.

> Or supposing that there was good ground for his thinking that he could serve his country better elsewhere, why need he, when Skipton was animating his "brave boys" with the assurance, "I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you," have sat down to pen the expression of his devout hope that as he was a poet he might not "run the same fortunes and hazards" as his commonplace neighbours—might be exempt, not only from the perils of those who were fighting at Brentford, but even from the losses and injuries that might befall the quiet stay-at-homes? No doubt he was justified in his proud assertion that it was in his power as a poet to give to whom he would a fame that should extend
> O'er lands and seas,
> Whatever clime the sun's bright circle warms;
> but even if he had already—which assuredly he had not—achieved a name in England equal to that of Pindar or Euripides in Greece, it would have been one thing for Alexander the Great to spare the house of Pindar and a very different thing for Pindar, had he been alive, to ask to have his house spared when all his fellow-citizens' houses were demolished.

Mr. Serrell will also surprise a good many readers by pointing out the true significance of a certain line that is often quoted. It comes from the sonnet fired off at the ministers of religion who objected to the poet's desire to facilitate divorce.

> One line in this sonnet [says Mr. Serrell] has attained permanent celebrity; and strangely enough the sonnet is about the last place where one would antecedently expect to find it. If one were asked to guess of whom it was first said
> Licence they mean when they cry Liberty,
> it would be a very natural "shot" to answer, Of some persons who were advocating great facility of divorce and who spoke of it as Liberty. In fact, it is spoken of persons who are opposing facility of divorce—who are standing up for the rigid maintenance of the marriage-tie; and Milton's curiously untenable proposition is that if those who are advocates of freedom generally shrink from advocating a relaxation of the marriage-tie their so-called love of freedom can be nothing better than love of licence. Did ever able man put his pen to a more hopelessly wrong assertion?

Altogether, it is rather a new Milton that Mr. Serrell introduces to us.

Future biographers of Christina Rossetti should note that the poetess, at various periods of her career, favoured certain pet animals. Here is a quotation from an unpublished letter, written by her to a correspondent in 1883:—

> What a pity that our pets were so lacking of distinctive features! One of the funniest was an ordinary tabby cat who "made a Y" against a half-high fender to warm herself. [Here follows a sketch showing the back view of a cat sitting with its forelegs extended upwards like the upper part of the capital letter Y]. And if this was one of the funniest you may think what the others were. Another early delight was a dormouse; but it did nothing more wonderful than hold its food in its hands, and after being hopelessly lost came to light again in a drawer, whither it had gone presumably to hibernate. We never rose to the rank of a dog. I had two squirrels at different times, but neither of them became familiar. A summer blue bird which escaped out of an open window cost me more tears than many a more serious trouble. And one of the dearest of all was a bullfinch, whose bows and love-making I remember after (say) thirty years!

We have already referred to Calmann Lévy's new edition of Balzac, the copyright in whose works has just expired. An extremely interesting little book which Balzac wrote in collaboration with Horace Raisson, and which he printed and published himself, is the most rare of any of his works. A new edition was published in 1854 and it is almost impossible to find a copy of it at present. There are some curious chapters in this book, which is entitled "Le Code des honnêtes gens." Balzac declares that thieves form a special class in society and that they contribute to the working of the social order—"they are the oil for its machinery." He draws a picture of life without thieves, no more prisons, no police, and no law courts. There would certainly be an economy, but what should we find to talk about, and what could be substituted for the rôle of the thief on the stage?

> Some sixty thousand public officials earn their living thanks to our thieves! What an industrial and commercial class! What life they put into a State, and how they cause the money to circulate!

The whole book is a keen satire on the manners and customs of the times in which Balzac lived.

In a long article in one of the French journals, Nietzsche is called the Renan of Germany. "In many ways" (the writer says) "the life of these two great thinkers has a certain analogy. Nietzsche was the son of a Protestant pastor and Renan was educated in a Catholic seminary. By different ways they both arrived at conclusions which had certain points of resemblance. The decisive crisis came to Renan through the influence of scientific ideas, and to Nietzsche, like Ruskin, through his enthusiastic admiration for beauty. It was this love of the beautiful which made Nietzsche repudiate Christianity. He declared that he could not accept a religion which gloried in sorrow and suffering. Renan's idea was that the ultimate happiness of mankind would come through the triumph of 'the divine' of which certain men well versed in science would be the priests. Nietzsche does not pronounce the word 'divine.' He thought that the happiness of humanity would come with the appearance on earth of men so elevated through the cult of beauty that this 'super-man' will differ from the men of to-day much more than our contemporaries differ from the animals." The writer of this article maintains that the fundamental idea of the two philosophers is the same belief in the unlimited progress of mankind towards a higher morality. The difference is that whilst Renan does not deny that the germs of the divine joys of the future may be found in the Gospel, Nietzsche would sweep away all the traces of the Christian religion. This difference may be accounted for, concludes the writer, by the fact that Renan from his earliest childhood was a Catholic and there is a beauty in the Romish Church not to be found in the puritanical severity of German Protestantism, a severity from which Nietzsche revolted.

A correspondent writes:—

Professor Henry Sidgwick, who has passed away deeply regretted by all in this country who are interested in philosophy, was a thinker whose work and position are not difficult to estimate. He had not a strikingly original mind, and yet embodied many of the best points of the English scholar. He was patient in analysis, averse to all display, very anxious to make ethics scientific and reasonable, and, though careful to do justice to others, keenly critical of those who, like T. H. Green, seemed to him to run up a great construction on a perilous foundation. But he lacked heat, force, and the conviction of the strong believer, qualities which, no less than insight, are necessary to supreme success in philosophy.

It was probably his cool temper and wish to be scientific which led him to take the utilitarian or hedonist side in ethics. The assumption that the mainspring of conduct is a desire for happiness appears to give a solid, common-sense foundation for moral philosophy. The same constitutional bent inclined him to put so much of his strength into history and criticism. Of his work in this direction his "Outlines of the History of Ethics" is a favourable example. Failing as it does to treat the development of ethical speculation in the light of a central principle, the book is dull to read; but its thoroughness and fairness make it valuable for reference and teaching. His weak point in philosophy was metaphysics. How little he understood the subject may be gathered from a remark he once hazarded, that metaphysics bears the same relation to philosophy that metageometry bears to ordinary rational mathematics; how little he cared about it is shown by the following story which he used to tell of himself. A German student wrote complaining that he had read the "Methods of Ethics" and could not find a comprehensive "Weltanschauung" there. The professor kindly sent a brief statement on a post-card which gave complete satisfaction. Afterwards he felt that he had given himself away. He had forgotten what he wrote on the post-card, and would be in an awkward position if the same request were ever made again. It would be intolerable to think he had circulated two contradictory "Weltanschauungen"!

The "Methods of Ethics" was, of course, his great work. Its plan and general character made it useful to students, and it has gone through many editions. Its author spared no pains to make it as perfect as he could. With characteristic candour he was ready even on important points to modify his opinions in accordance with recent advances in ethical science. The plan of the work is mainly critical. The author reviews the chief current systems of moral philosophy and gives an adhesion, distinct but not very forcible, to hedonism. The chapter on free-will is typical of his attitude. He evidently does not like determinism, but marshalls the arguments in its favour and concludes that they preponderate. His political and economic writings, though they share in the good qualities of his philosophical work, are much less important and have not had the same popularity.

At Oxford Sidgwick's speculative opinions were unpopular and his influence slight. At Cambridge it was much greater, owing to his residence there. Though his nature forbade the least attempt at securing disciples or founding a school, his thoroughness and sincerity gained him the gratitude and admiration of his pupils; while the wit and humour of his informal speeches and conversation gave him a personal charm which can hardly be realized by those who only know his writings.

The Revival of the Blue-stocking.

In the case of illustrious women the professional visits of Miss Sarah A. Tooley seem to be as inevitable as quarter-day. The latest celebrity to be interpreted and exhibited by her is Miss Beatrice Harraden, with the result that a portion of Miss Harraden's philosophy of life appears in the current number of the Humanitarian. We gather therefrom that it is Miss Harraden's opinion that men ought to sweep carpets, and that women ought to go in for examinations. The sweeping of carpets exercises the deltoid and other muscles that seldom get a chance, besides stimulating the action of the liver, and might, therefore, be beneficial to any one of either sex who follows the sedentary calling of literature. As regards the passing of examinations, with which the sweeping of carpets need by no means interfere, we are very much of Miss Harraden's way of thinking—not only for the reasons which she assigns but also for other reasons. Examinations, Miss Harraden holds, "are a sort of literary gymnastics to strengthen and expand the mental muscles." It is rather of the study in view of the examinations than of the examinations themselves that this should be said; but that is a detail. Miss Harraden obviously cannot have meant that it was advantageous for girls to go in for examinations unfortified by preliminary study. At the same time it seems to us that she has omitted to mention the real reason which makes examinations a valuable feature of female education. Where they are eminently serviceable is in correcting certain tendencies of the human mind which are apt to take a particularly strong hold upon the minds of girls. One cannot, perhaps, put it better than by saying that examinations emphasize the importance of distinguishing between "there" and "thereabouts"; and that this is a distinction which women who have never been in for examinations often do not learn to draw at all. One has only to pick up a woman's cookery book to be faced by a literary example of the shortcoming—the casual use of the word "some" indifferently as a liquid measure and as a weight avoirdupois. One has only to go into a law Court and hear a lady tell a story in a witness box, without any intent to deceive, to find other exemplifications of it. To check this habit of inaccuracy is one of the uses of examinations. Another use lies in teaching that what one happens to know about a subject is not necessarily co-extensive with the knowable. It is instruction of which we all stand more or less in need; but women need it more than men, because it is still true that, as a rule, their education has been a less wide one, and because the fact we have referred to is not so often impressed upon them in the course of conversation with those who know more than they do. Any one who has heard women who have not been to Girton, or taken London degrees, discussing theology with theologians or politics with politicians must be aware that this is so. To express strong opinions without first making sure of their facts is a feminine characteristic due to no "double dose of original sin," but simply and solely to the haphazard methods of feminine education. By all means, therefore, let girls take Miss Harraden's advice, and train their mental muscles by preparing for examinations, and test them by passing examinations. And let them by no means imagine that by so doing they will forfeit the attractions appropriate to their sex. There is, no doubt, a popular prejudice against the "blue-stocking"; but it is none the less a solid historical fact that the women who have been most admired by men—whatever their moral or physical characteristics—have been women who could have passed examinations if they had liked, and to whom that derisive epithet "blue-stocking" was applicable:—Madame de Staël, Madame de Sévigné, Madame Necker, Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, and a host of others, in all countries and all ages, whose names will occur to every reader.

IRISH MUSTERING CRY AGAINST THE DANES.

SUGGESTED BY GERALD GRIFFIN'S BATTLE CRY OF THE O'DRISCOLLS.

Hurry down! hurry down! hurry down ever,
From wrack-ridden mountain and red, rushing river,
Stern horsemen and footmen with spear, axe and quiver,
Hurry down! hurry down! your dear land to deliver.
Haste! oh, haste! for in cruel might clustering
Far and near the fierce Nordman is mustering.
Haste! oh, haste! or the daughters ye cherish,
The bride of your bosom shall far more than perish.

Lo! how he toils down that narrow pass yonder,
Ensnared by his spoils and oppressed by his plunder!
Flash on him, crash on him, God's fire and thunder!
And scatter and shatter his fell ranks asunder.
Smite the wolf ere he slinks from the slaughter,
Rend the shark ere he wins to deep water.
Pursue and hew him to pieces by the haven
And feast with his red flesh the exulting sea raven.

ALFRED PERCEVAL GRAVES.

Personal Views.

THE WRONG KIND OF PERSONAL VIEW.

A little while ago I was allowed to lament in these pages the Scarcity of Personal Views in every-day criticism. I suggested that reviews would be more interesting and even a little valuable if every reviewer spoke his mind with sincerity and freedom. But, of course, this assumes that every reviewer has a mind—a rash assumption, perhaps. It assumes that he has the power of making his individual opinion interest even those who agree with him. It presupposes also the knowledge of good and bad in literature on the part of the critic, the existence of a standard which he admits in common with all persons of judgment and taste. It cannot have escaped notice that the persons who are most anxious to air decided opinions in print generally lack the knowledge and ignore the standard. As usual, fools rush in where angels fear to tread. This is a danger. How can it be met? Only by exerting all our influence on the side of the angels and bearing down the folly of the fools by a patient insistence upon the merits of what is excellent.

Nearly half a century ago Matthew Arnold, discussing the "Function of Criticism at the present time," urged those who had to deal with the mass of current English literature to endeavour "to try it, so far as they can, by the standard of the best that is known and thought in the world." The duty seems to be so clear that it is strange it should need any urging. Yet how necessary it is to urge it must be painfully evident to every one who has any appreciation of "the best that is known and thought." And in these days, when the name of critic is assumed so easily, and the world is flooded with printed matter, so much of it, from every point of view, worthless, it is more than ever necessary for the duty to be insisted upon and kept constantly in view, and, even at the risk of wearying, drummed into the public ear. Amid this flood of books it is hard for the critic always to keep his feet. There is so much that is absolutely bad that anything even a little good seems by comparison a work of superior merit. Add to this the fact that constant condemnation is a weariness of spirit, and you have the reason why even critics of insight and understanding sometimes mistake geese for swans. As we watch the swirling, frothing eddies of the flood, we must often feel quite out of heart and out of patience. Our hearts sink at the thought of all this misapplied energy. Our patience is not equal to the task of detaching from amongst so much that is worthless the little that has any distinction of thought or expression to recommend it. We are inclined to accept Matthew Arnold's view that the mass of current English literature is "better disregarded." And yet, if we are to keep up a standard at all, we cannot altogether disregard it. We cannot even be content to discuss only the work that has merit. If we do this, we allow judgment to go by default in favour of the strident advocates who mistake violence for power, crude inexperience for originality, absence of form for evidence of genius, and absence of sense for the highest form of literary art.

So large a body of criticism is now afraid to have any opinions of its own, is ready to cluster round any smoking chimney which may be for the moment pointed at as the true guiding pillar of cloud, that a few determined disciples can very soon raise a new Master to the position of a Prophet. If only every critic would say what he thought and, to the best of his ability, give his reasons for so thinking, things would rapidly improve. It is the prevailing deference to what are supposed to be the "best opinions" that is so disheartening. A's work must be remarkable because B and C say so, and D, E, and F take up the tale, although in their private opinion A is either a humbug or a fool. Every critic ought to take for his motto the wise words of foolish Polonius—

This, above all, to thine own self be true.

But, at the same time, there is a danger from those who to their own selves are true. They may be sincere and yet foolish. The only way to deal with them is, so far as may be possible, to prevent them from obtaining a hearing. Certainly they ought not to be able to air their folly in quarters which have a reputation for taste and good sense. Certainly we ought never to find in a periodical professing such aims as does the North American Review such an article as it presented to us recently upon "A Neglected American Poet." Who Mr. Montgomery Schuyler may be we do not know. What he is can be gathered from his ridiculous panegyric of a certain George Alfred Townsend. Mr. Townsend appears to combine the vocation of poet with the profession of a descriptive reporter on the daily Press. Mr. Schuyler is evidently himself in the latter line of business as well, nor does he see anything incompatible in the two callings. He remarks cheerfully that "Mr. Townsend's journalism and his literature have rubbed off on each other." Here is a passage that illustrates both Mr. Schuyler's exquisite critical perception and his refined style. :—

> I remember he reported the trial of Tilton against Beecher, in the course of which some old love letters came to be read, and noted the effect with which the reading fell upon the plaintiff in the suit, who had been one of the parties to the correspondence. According to my distant memory, the notation was something like this:—"How like the foghells on familiar coasts, whence one must steer, though homesick," and so forth. Fancy coming upon such a figure in a newspaper report of a sensational trial in this present year of grace.

Fancy, indeed! Then as to the influence of Mr. Townsend's journalism upon his poetry. First of all, here is a verse from a "poem" on Abraham Lincoln :—

Corndodgers dipped in maple juice he ate with thankfulness:
An ox-steak when the preacher came the family to bless:
Rye coffee with molasses sweet (he never used a fork,
But with his knife, ten months a year, poked down the salted pork).

And, according to Mr. Schuyler, "this portrait is worthier of the national Pantheon than any ideal figure that has been made or that is likely to be made"! Another journalistic touch may be noted in the rhyming of "belles-lettres" with "debtors." This shocks even Mr. Schuyler, though he naively admits that he would have no ground of complaint if "debtors" were rhymed with "letters." In this case why not spell it "detter" at once? Of Gibbon Mr. Townsend sings—

> The vast procession of mankind
> Like some great circus seemed,
> In his kaleidoscopic mind
> Metempsychosed or dreamed.

"Metempsychosed" is wonderful, and what on earth does it mean? One more instance of journalism "rubbing off on poetry" and I have done with this justly-neglected poet. He adorns his collected poems with "pictures of the author's parents and of his birthplace and of his dwelling-place, and even of the tomb he has built for himself." What could be more touchingly "journalistic" than that? Of course, the article is not worth a moment's serious consideration. But the fact that it gains admission to the North American Review we are obliged to consider seriously. One hoped that this sort of foolish puffing of nonentities was confined to the irresponsible newspaper, obliged to find a new sensation every day, and putting up with a new poet when there is no military hero or defaulting solicitor handy. If the reviews take to trumpeting neglected poets who clearly deserve no better than to be neglected, and to letting persons devoid of critical faculty make themselves foolish in this way, where shall we look for "a dam against the unconscionable scribbling of the age?"

This kind of Personal View reduces one to despair. Better than this almost would be the old-fashioned method which damned poets because their works were not popular. If they were genuine poets, it did them no lasting harm, whereas an article like this debases the public taste. It ought merely to excite derisive mirth; but, unfortunately, the public gathers its opinions mainly from what it reads about authors instead of from reading them. A true poet is underrated at first, but in time criticism ranges itself upon his side, and the public shift their ground with easy nonchalance. What is so deplorable about puffs of third and fourth rate writers is the fact that they unsettle the public mind. The only way to make people acknowledge a standard in literature is to keep before them the best and the reasons why it is the best. What critics who care for literature must do is to persist in telling the public how far their idols fall short of what is even mediocre according to a true standard. They can bear witness to the greatness of the great and the insignificance of the little. They can determine that the world shall,

> When the Forts of Folly fall
> Find their bodies by the wall.

MOOR PARK AND WAVERLEY.

[By J. PENDEREL BRODHURST.]

The daily newspapers have just been announcing the discovery that Sir Walter Scott once visited at Moor Park when it was in the occupation of the grandparents of a clergyman now living, who vouches for the statement. Considering Scott's interest in Swift, that he was his editor, and, in a way, his biographer, it is likely enough that he was anxious to see Moor Park, where Swift as a youth of 22 went to reside as secretary to Sir William Temple (for £20 a year and his board); where later, when the relation between the young man and his employer had ripened into friendship, he wrote "The Battle of the Books," an offshoot of Temple's essay on ancient and modern learning, and where he was thrown across the path of Esther Johnson (Stella), who lived at Moor Park with her mother, the companion of Temple's sister. Moreover, Scott's host at Moor Park was Mr. Robert Lang, who may, perhaps, have been some connexion of his "good friend" as Lockhart calls him, the "Fiscal" for Selkirkshire. Sir Walter's presence in the neighbourhood of Farnham is, however, unimportant in itself. It becomes significant only in relation to the possible genesis of the title of "Waverley." It has often been stated that the name was suggested to him by reading the "Annales Waverlienses," the chronicles of the premier Cistercian house in England. I know not whether Scott ever read that, no doubt, highly seductive bit of light literature, but the thing is likely enough. For the confident declaration that Waverley Honour owed its name to the great religious house in the pleasant Surrey valley, I know of no authority beyond inherent probability. There is nothing, I fancy, about the matter in Lockhart—I do not remember and cannot find anything there. But memory is treacherous and indexes are more treacherous still. Nor do I find aught upon the point in the "Journal" or the "Letters." Yet it is impossible to dwell upon the early days of Swift without taking some interest in Waverley Abbey. The property which goes with the present house of that name, hard by the scanty but picturesque ruins of that old foundation, almost adjoins Moor Park, and Scott was not the man to miss seeing what was left of so famous a place as Waverley.

But there is a suggestive collocation of dates bearing upon the matter. Sir Walter's Edition of Swift, with his sketch of the Dean's life prefixed, was published, in nineteen volumes octavo, on the 1st of July, 1814. Seven days later "Waverley" came out. Scott had been engaged upon the Dean ever since 1808. For at least six years, therefore, he must have been familiar with the name of the monastic ruins which lay so close to the scene of Swift's early life, and so pleasing and melodious a title for his novel would be sure to suggest itself. On the other hand, "Waverley" was begun in 1805—if we may take the first chapter literally, on the 1st of November of that year—and so fundamental a matter as the name of the hero and of his ancestral roof-tree is hardly likely to have been an afterthought. We are, therefore, compelled to leave unsettled the interesting but unimportant speculation whether Scott was introduced to Waverley Abbey by his studies in Swift, or had known the name and seized upon it for his own purposes long before.

Sir Walter could certainly not have turned his thoughts to a pleasanter spot. We all talk and write too much about the beauty of places near London. It is an irritating Cockney trick, explained but not justified, by the circumstance that most people whose business it is to write live in this capital, and are necessarily better acquainted with its outskirts than with those, say, of Sheffield or Birmingham, which are equally beautiful. But for a soft southern scene nothing could be more agreeable than Waverley, in the Wey valley, quite close to Farnham. The Waverley Abbey of to-day is, to no inconsiderable extent, built out of the ruins of its namesake. Thanks to this and other quarrying, little of the Cistercian buildings remains; but that little is exceedingly pictorial, with its sequestered surroundings and its plentiful cloak of ivy. It is a truism that the monks usually pitched their tents upon smiling and productive spots. "He who lives a good life is sure to live well," says the song, and assuredly the Cistercians of Waverley lacked none of the kindly fruits of the earth. To this day the soil is exceptionally rich; and Cobbett, who was born at Farnham, and began to learn gardening in the old orchard of the monks, tells us that "though I have now seen and observed upon as many fine gardens as any man in England, I have never seen a garden equal to that of Waverley." Ten families of the seed of the patriarchs, with all their dependants, could not, he thinks, have consumed the fruit of that garden. It would appear, however, from his ingenuous statement, that the gardeners and other workmen, assisted by the observant youth who was afterwards to make himself so disagreeable to certain persons, succeeded in consuming three-fourths of the produce. To the Radical pamphleteer and author of the "Rural Rides" Swift at Moor Park had doubtless been a tradition. The "Tale of a Tub," we know, he studied eagerly as a boy, and he must often have passed the little gabled cottage close to the entrance to Waverley Abbey, on the way to Moor Park, in which "Stella" lived during, and after, Swift's two terms of residence with Sir William Temple. The place is still full of interest for every student of the life and work of the massive and masculine genius of Dryden's cousin.

A PROPHET OF YESTERDAY.

In Europe, at least, there can be no denial of the fact that during the last decade Emerson has lain neglected on the library shelves. There is a time for sowing and a time for reaping and a time for the valuation of the garnered corn. The once widely welcomed essays, or rather lectures, of the middle of the century—"Representative Men," "English Traits," "Conduct of Life," "Society and Solitude," and so forth—did their admirable transcendental work; they "interested and instructed," and passed, if not into the limbo of philosophic ideals, at least into the grey ways of the outmoded. Of course, Emerson has had a hundred publishers and his readers have not been few; but what of his influence at the present time? Messrs. Ward, Lock, who issue his COMPLETE PROSE WORKS (2s.), will, I dare say, find reason to be satisfied with their enterprise. But one fears that "these admirable radicals" of the fifties are joining that class of writers spoken of by booksellers as producers of books "which are not greatly read, but which people buy and give to one another." If this estimate of the writings of Emerson should approximate to the truth it were regrettable, for his worth remains as high as when he was spoken of as "the most shining intellectual glory and the most potent intellectual force" of the new world. "His legacy to the world," it has been said, "is not a system, not a creed, not an observance, but a stimulus, an impulse to a perfect life." The high priest of transcendentalism, Emerson nevertheless sounds a note of what may be called spiritual utilitarianism, commercialism of the ideal. It is no doubt, in some measure, this interesting graft of Yankee acumen upon Teutonic stock which caused the lectures to make so immediate an appeal, and which now, after the passing of half a century, robs them of force and universality. The rules for the conduct of life seem to have lost something of the greatness with which one's memory had clothed them. "Give a boy address and accomplishments, and you give him the mastery of palaces and fortunes where he goes"—this is one of many similar apophthegms from which the glory seems to have departed. The new order changeth giving place to older forms of wisdom, less transient than the fashionable philosophy of the "roaring forties." But if on the re-reading of Emerson one is apt to be critical it must be owned that a thousand charms of style and thought remain. Fortunately, the idealist may be welcomed in many other guises than that of social teacher. Emerson stimulated thought and inspired action, and his writings will always delight by reason of their sincerity and skill:—

To clothe the fiery thought
In simple words succeeds,
For still the craft of genius is
To mask a king in weeds.

This is, in his own words, the task he himself was able to accomplish. His most burning ideas are always stated with a clearness and simplicity which wins confidence; his views, however "new" in their day, are set forth with classic precision. A potent charm to be added to many of the essays is the keen American wit expressed by a man of exquisite culture. Many a pleasant truth springs out at us as we turn his pages; "Necessity is the law of all who are not self-possessed." "So deep are the sources of surface-action that even the size of your companion seems to vary with his freedom of thought." "The novels are as useful as Bibles, if they teach you the secret, that the best of life is conversation, and the greatest success is confidence, or perfect understanding between sincere people." But many would be inclined to dispute such dicta as "What is true anywhere is true everywhere," or "Society has really no graver interest than the well-being of the literary class," or "The genius of reading and of gardening are antagonistic, like resinous and vitreous electricity."

Although the present volume does not contain Emerson's verse, his poetic vein is so often shown and so many articles are prefaced by his verses that one may glance for a moment at his lyrical capacity. A favourite theme of poets is their inability to capture the elusive ideas which haunt their brain. Thus Emerson:—

Deal gently with us, ye who read!
Our largest hope is unfulfilled,—
The promise still outruns the deed,—
The tower but not the spire we build.

Our whitest pearl we never find;
Our ripest fruit we never reach;
The flowering moments of the mind
Drop half their petals in our speech.

These are my blossoms; if they wear
One streak of morn or evening's glow
Accept them; but to me more fair
The buds of song that never blow.

Now compare with this a poem of about the same period on the same subject, the well-known "Fata Morgana":—

A blue-eyed phantom far before
Is laughing, leaping towards the sun;
Like lead I chase it evermore,
I pant and run.

It breaks the sunlight bound on bound;
Goes singing as it leaps along
To sheep-bells with a dreamy sound,
A dreamy song.

I laugh, it is so brisk and gay;
It is so far before, I weep;
I hope I shall lie down some day,
Lie down and sleep.

Or take the verses of a later date containing the lines:—

Youth now flees on feathered foot,
Faint and fainter sounds the flute,
Rarer songs of gods; and still
Somewhere on the sunny hill,
Or along the winding stream,
Through the willow, flits a dream;
Flits, but shows a smiling face,
Flees, but with so quaint a grace,
None can choose to stay at home,
All must follow, all must roam.

This is unborn beauty. . . .

Set these three poems side by side and we see at once that Rossetti is the poet pure and simple; that Stevenson has poetic inspiration—drawn, indeed, slightly from Rossetti in this instance—and that Emerson, with all his great qualities, is here, at any rate, merely an accomplished writer expressing himself in verse of moderate charm.

As a lay-preacher of wide sympathies and high aspirations his fame is assured, but the re-reading of his works inevitably reminds one of the flight of time. His teachings were addressed to the young people of a young nation. They were often little better than sublimated commonplace or well-expressed counsels of perfection. Yet his occasionally trite philosophy wears the glowing crown of imagination.

Over his head were the maple buds,
And over the tree was the moon,
And over the moon were the starry studs
That drop from the angels' shoon.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT WORDS.

During a recent discussion in Literature Mr. W. H. D. Rouse regretted the injury our language had sustained from the loss of many words which had, in the course of time, become obsolete. Though I was unable to agree with him on the main points of our dispute, I most heartily concurred in this. Why (I have often asked myself) do not those who are so anxious to increase the scope of the language seek to do so by the revival of good English words rather than by the introduction of corrupt terms? It may be that many of the old words we occasionally meet with never at any period passed beyond mere provincialisms. But what then? Each old pre-Chaucerian monk who helped to sow the early seeds of our literature was a man of provincial training who, when he "undertoke

In englysshe for to make a boke," used the dialect of the district where stood the convent in which he had been educated. Such was Robert of Gloucester; such were many whose names are less familiar. That which we speak and write to-day is extensively made up of provincialisms which were adopted as part of the general language of the nation, a fact which I regard as a sound precedent in favour of adopting any useful word which, even up to the present, may not have received the stamp of general usage.

Moreover, there is a multitude of good words which, after being freely employed by great writers, passed out of use and were lost to us. For my part, I always feel grateful to a modern author who attempts the restoration of some old word which ought never to have become obsolete, when (and herein I confess lies some danger) this is done naturally and without archaic affectations. For example, with what excellent effect does the old verb "to swink" do duty where Sir Samuel Ferguson describes the smiths in his poem "The Forging of the Anchor."

"Hurrah!" they shout, "leap out, leap out!" bang, bang, the sledges go;
And thick and loud the swinking crowd at every stroke pant "ho!"

We still "work" and "labour," why should we not also "swink" as our fathers did before us? Moreover, though it is here used in the body of a verse, it is one of a list of rhyming words of which we have hardly more than a dozen. A language not too rich in rhymes can ill spare any word that may help a poet out of the difficulty in which poets have occasionally been placed since Gower did not disdain to perpetrate the following couplet:—

The doughter eke Canace hight,
By daie bothe and eke by night.

As if the reader might suppose the fair Canace to have had an auxiliary name which it was her custom to assume when darkness descended upon her father's realm!

A propensity to reject old words is not of modern growth, nor does the loss entailed upon literature by this tendency belong exclusively to these latter days. Continuing John de Trevisa's version of Ranulph Higden's Polychronicon down to "the yere of our Lord 1460," Caxton says, "I, William Caxton, a symple persone, have endevoyred to wryte fyrst over all the sayd book of Polycronycon, and somewhat have changed the rude and old English, that is to wete, certain words, which in these days be neither usyd ne understanden."

At about the same time, Skelton uttered his complaint against the language, in his "Boke of Philip Sparrow":—

Our natural tonge is rude
And hard to be enneude
Wyth polyshed termes lustye
Oure language is so rustye.
I wot not where to finde
Termes to serue my minde
Gowers englyshe is oldo
And of no value is tolde.

So, for his epitaph on Dame Margery's sparrow, Master John Skelton falls back on his Latin; which is the reductio ad absurdum of Doctor Johnson's refusal to disgrace the walls of Westminster Abbey with an English inscription. The use of "told" in the last line illustrates the way in which many words have lost meanings which once belonged to them. "Of no value is told," or, as one might say "reckoned" or "esteemed." This meaning, together with the kindred meaning in which it is used with the noun "tale" in L'Allegro, has disappeared almost so completely that I once heard of a reader, who, referring to the lines—

And every shepherd told his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale, said, "No doubt the tale the shepherd told was the old, old story." To picture Milton's shepherd making love to a shepherdess instead of counting his sheep is to introduce a more romantic episode; but I question if it is what the poet meant.

Apart from words which have disappeared entirely from our language, those which have partly or wholly lost their former significance might be classed roughly thus—those to which it would be impossible to restore original meanings, because of the totally different meanings they have had for many generations; and those which, though they still retain their true meanings, suggest ideas which would cause their general use to be regarded as an act of questionable taste. Gascoigne, writing "in prayse of Zouche late the Lady Greye of Wilton," whom he "found in a homely house," begins—

These rustic walles whome caukred yeares deface,
The comely corps of seemely Zouche enclose,
Whose auncient stocke deriude from worthy race,
Procures hir praise, where so the carkas goes.

That poet would now be a bold man who complimented a lady on her graceful "corps" or spoke of the praise which greeted her from all who beheld her lovely carcase. One might even hesitate (in this age of special trains and special editions) to sing, with Francis Beaumont, to the girl of one's heart—

Wake gently, wake,
Part softly from your dreames;
The morning flies
To your faire eyes,
To take her speciall beames.

Though this is hardly a case in point. Neither, perhaps, is the old Chaucerian "cursedness"—"Whan thritty tirauntz ful of cursednes"—familiar to us in the "cussedness" of the American humorist. In the following stanza from Tuberville—

Let Zeuxis Grapes not make him proude at al,
Though Fowles for them did skyr against a wall:
For if he should assay my Love to paint,
His art would fayle, his cunning fist would faint—

we feel glad to meet with the expressive, if at all times somewhat slighted, old word "skir," to fly (of the use of which there are only two instances in the whole of Shakespeare). But we would not insist on the "cunning fist" of Zeuxis, nor commend the phrase as happy and appropriate; it is an instance of the way in which the legitimate use of a word in certain connexions may suggest, by association, a vulgarity to modern ears. The same may be said of many phrases, though these be compounded of words used in their ordinary everyday meaning, as in Drayton's "Quest of Cynthia":—

Long wandering through the wood, said I,
"O whither's Cynthia gone?"
When soon the echo doth reply
To my last word—"go on!"

This is a counterpart of the mystical voice which called to Tennyson's Galahad "Ride on! the prize is near." To a contemporary of the poet there would be nothing of the low comedy of verse in this last line; but to us the Echo's reply would suggest an exclamation which (if we may trust the comic journals and the occasional evidence of our own ears) is usually contracted into a forcible but ungraceful monosyllable.

Among the words to which it might be impossible to restore original meanings, for the reason that they have for so long had entirely different ones, would be such terms as "nice," which until nearly the end of the sixteenth century still meant foolish.

> The letter was not nice, but full of charge,
> Of dear import.

The Elizabethans were, however, already using it as a synonym of "precise" or "exact" ("spite his nice fence") as well as in its original meaning. In the title of Beaumont and Fletcher's drama The Nice Valour its use may be regarded as to some extent ambiguous, the character of the play admitting of its being understood either way; but there can be no doubt as to the sense in which Bianca uses it, in the Taming of the Shrew,

> I am not so nice,
> To change true rules for odd inventions.

a remark very pertinent to the present subject, and containing a valuable hint for those who so often corrupt the language in their efforts to improve it. The distorted meaning which we now usually attach to "nice" is, I believe, a growth from an ignorant use made of it by an eighteenth century bluestocking. "Dapper" is another word which has acquired for all time a meaning utterly incongruous to the true one—"hardy," "courageous," or "warlike." Even Milton speaks of the "pert faeries and the dapper elves," though it is not his least merit that he often uses a word so as to make a knowledge of its original meaning necessary to a correct understanding of the passage where it occurs; witness the first line of that which, taken separately, is one of the finest specimens of rima ottava in our language—to wit, the final passage of Lycidas:—

> Thus sung the uncouth swain to the oaks and rills, that is, the unknown or obscure swain. This passage, like the one in which Tennyson's "prime swallow dips his wing," might convey a false idea to some readers, because we still retain "uncouth" as we do "prime"; whereas such a phrase as "the rathe primrose" would in many cases convey no idea whatever, since "rathe" is a word which has practically disappeared. It is in relation to such words as this that English writers who possess the requisite knowledge of their native language and literature might do much to counteract the tendency of which Mr. Rouse spoke with justifiable contempt.

The particular type of literary underbreeding which consists in the rejection of plain terms and a craving for new-fashioned words which are considered more elegant or more striking may be characteristic of a certain kind of contributors to our newspapers and popular magazines; but by them it is usually displayed in the neglect of words still in common use. It is by a revival of words which (to quote Caxton once more) "in these days be neither usyd ne understanden," that is to any extent, that writers of better literary training and taste might benefit us. I have mentioned Sir Samuel Ferguson's use of the verb "to swink," which was also used as a noun. "Let Austin have his swink to him reserved." In another Chaucerian line, the shield of Troilus is "thirled," that is, pierced by arrows. We know from Burns, that "thirl" is, or was, a familiar word in Lowland Scotch. A good expressive word it is, and worthy of being advanced once more from the vocabulary of the peasant to an accredited place in literature. Troilus himself, being sinewy and powerful, is "weldy," a derivative of the verb "to wield"; while the Squire in the Canterbury Tales is "wonderly deliver and great of strength"—a line which is considerably weakened when modernized, as it has been, into "of wonderful activity and strength." In Scott's novel, Evan Dhu says of Edward Waverley that he is clean made and "deliver," but this is the only instance I can recall of the word being introduced, with this old meaning, by a modern writer. In the Man of Law's tale, the husband of Custance casts her adrift in a rudderless boat, through another woman's "egge-ment." In King Lear, Edmund expresses himself more forcibly when he speaks of our being "all that we are evil in, by a divine thrusting on"; but in the older passage the sense is expressed in a single word with which we are still in touch through the phrase to "egg on."

Within the limit of this article, it would be impossible to give a complete list of those words which, having become more or less obsolete, might be revived with advantage; but a few additional instances may be given. In Spenser and in Surrey we find the useful word "revested"—"The pleasant spot revested green," but how few modern authors have availed themselves of it. It is, still, however, a recognized word. This can hardly be said of "fromward," which is also used by Surrey. We have "toward," "hitherward," and so on; why not "fromward?" In bidding us prepare for disappointment of our hopes, old Thomas Fuller warns us to "forethink what may come hereafter." We still "foresee," why should we not "forethink?" If in want of a synonym for "sorrowful" why should we not remember the "grieful pains" of Tuberville's lover, who, in another poem, speaks of his bed as once a "restful," but now a "careful" place! Here are two antithetical words, one of which we have retained while discarding the other, except in its sense of wary or cautious. I think it is Mill who says that it may be good to alter the meaning of a word, but that it is bad to let any part of the meaning drop.

In this age of the cheap newspaper, the popular magazine, and the ubiquitous novelist, the English language is in greater danger than it has ever been from ingenious persons of inadequate literary training or judgment. Therefore, it may not be out of place to glance, in passing, at the evil which may ensue from an incorrect use of legitimate words, no less than from corrupt innovations. A fault of this nature may be committed intentionally, and be so trivial as to count for little; though authors of standing should avoid furnishing a precedent to which inferior writers can appeal in justification of grosser errors. When Tennyson wrote—he undoubtedly knew that cattle do not browse fields but graze them; but "browsed" gives superior fulness to his verse and the difference in meaning is slight. Some time ago I met with an amusing instance of the way in which the real meaning of a word may be ignored, in connexion with a picture illustrating an incident in a serial story by a popular author. It represented, during a storm at sea, a cabin on board ship, in one corner of which an elderly gentleman was crouching in a state of abject alarm, while beneath we were informed that "terror incarnate started from his eyes." Had he himself been described as an incarnation of terror, it would have been simple and easily understood; but terror in the flesh starting from his eyes was a little puzzling; the more so as the artist had wisely refrained from depicting so extraordinary a phenomenon.

> The fields between
> Are dewy-fresh, browsed by deep-udder'd kine,

At the beginning of this article, I referred to the old pre-Chaucerian monk whose native speech was the dialect of his own district, and through whose labours as a chronicler our language was recruited from the homespun English of the peasant. At the present day, if it is to be enriched by the restoration of old terms which were used by our forefathers, the task must rest mainly with the English scholar; for it seems to require a certain amount of literary culture to enable a writer to resist the temptation to use "fine" words. This is a propensity from which even the best of our peasant poets is not always free. In Tennyson's poem, Dora (who lived with her uncle, farmer Allan) "abode" at the farm, in good sound Anglo-Saxon; whereas Burns' Mary did not "abide" by Afton Water, though this would have suited his rhyme perfectly; she "resided" there, like the young lady who proceeded to her residence in a public conveyance instead of going home in an omnibus.

THE THEATRE.

"ENGLISH NELL"—"SWEET NELL OF OLD DRURY"—"IN THE SOUP."

Probably there are not two other actresses in London so different in person, in temperament, in technical accomplishment as Miss Marie Tempest and Miss Julia Neilson. And it is only charitable to suppose that the difference between them is still less marked than the difference between either and Nell Gwyn. That being so, the fact that they are just now both purporting to present Nell Gwyn to the playhouse public is a curious indication of the real value to be set on historical personages in the theatre. About the actual Nell Gwyn we know a good deal, and what is not known can by adult persons only too easily be guessed. Fortunately, the actual Nell Gwyn is not to be thought of for stage purposes. The modern audience—necessarily decorous if not necessarily moral—demands an unreal Nell Gwyn; but there are varying degrees of unreality, as you may see by passing from the Prince of Wales's to the Haymarket. There is the unreality which consists in tactful selection from known facts, in telling the truth but not the whole truth; that is the artistic way of handling a ticklish subject, and it is the way of Messrs. Anthony Hope and Edward Rose in English Nell. To get the real woman, we should only have to add some qualities of character and details of behaviour, ugly qualities and worse details, to the personage presented by Miss Marie Tempest. Miss Tempest is petite, so was Nell. Miss Tempest is saucy, Nell was brazen. Miss Tempest is generous, Nell was kindhearted. Miss Tempest is an enlightened and high-minded patriot; Nell pointed out, when mistaken for her French Catholic rival, that she was "the Protestant ——." The difference, then, is a difference only of degree. The fictitious Nell is here only the real Nell toned down. Miss Tempest is enabled to give us something of the truth not only by her own temperament but through the conscientiousness of her author, a man of letters as well as a man of parts, who cannot fly in the face of history, though he is obliged to veil a feature here and there. Nothing, indeed, could be happier than Mr. Hope's reconciliation of his historical knowledge with his gentlemanly instincts. Animalism, as his readers very well know, is not at all in his line. The heroines of his novels are coquettes, everyday or romantic, as the case may be, coldly imperious as Queens in a Court of Love, or "precious" as Princesses in the Pays de Tendre; but rude, fierce, elemental passion they have none. I do not remember the faintest hint of sensualism in any one of his works. Now to omit the sensualism not only from Nell Gwyn but from Charles and his whole Court, and yet to present a picture of Monarch, mistress, and courtiers, which is, at any rate, of superficial plausibility is no small feat. It is necessarily attended by one serious drawback. The relation of Nell and Charles cannot be made the central interest of the play; such love intrigue as all plays of the lighter kind require cannot be their love intrigue. Hence we are invited to follow the fortunes of a wholly fictitious pair of sweethearts, and the fortunes of this pair, Simon Dale and the Lady Barbara, excite only a mild interest. Simon, I fear, is a fool, and the Lady Barbara a stick. With what relief one turns to the roguish Nell, cracking jokes with a sly wink and a pout about her "virtue," and to Charles with his easy-going, cynical enjoyment of life! How gladly one would see more of the wicked pair! But the proprieties and Mr. Hope's naturally chaste muse forbid. At one moment, perhaps, the chastity of that muse verges on the ludicrous. "If only you had not been a King, Charles," says Nelly, with a sob in her voice, "you and I might have been ——." She would, it would seem, add "Darby and Joan" or (in the rococo classic style of her age) "Baucis and Philemon." Fortunately the curtain descends and cuts the sentimental incongruity short. Delightful, the roguery of Miss Tempest's Nell. Excellent, the dry humour of Mr. Frank Cooper's King Charles.

If at the Prince of Wales's you have the unreality of tactful suppression, at the Haymarket you have quite another unreality, that of sheer and tactless invention. In Mr. Paul Kester's Sweet Nell of Old Drury you have a Nell Gwyn who, in Mrs. Poyser's phrase, would have to be "born again and born different" to be in the least like the actual woman. She is, for all the text reveals to the contrary, a virtuous lady who carries on a platonic flirtation with the King through the medium of drawing-room ballads. She has a deadly enemy in Judge Jeffreys, whom she outwits by masquerading in his wig and gown, and stealing compromising letters from his pocket. In a word, the whole thing is nonsense. The beautiful Miss Julia Neilson, calling herself Nell Gwyn, remains quite unmistakably the beautiful Miss Julia Neilson. Charles, played by Mr. Fred Terry, is en bois.

A farce by the late Mr. Ralph Lumley, now to be seen at the Strand, is called In the Soup, because at the close of the second act all the personages are put to sleep by an opiate in the consommé. It is a wild and whirling absurdity of a sort which only sanguine believers in theatrical progress can venture to call old-fashioned. Mr. James Welch is amusing enough, but it is a pity that better work cannot be found for so conscientious and thoughtful an actor.

NORWAY.

In issuing Boyesen's NORWAY, which has reached several editions in America, for the Story of the Nations Series (Fisher Unwin, 5s.), the publishers have been well advised, though it is scarcely doubtful that a slight abridgment of the earlier and an enlargement of the later chapters by some competent hand would have enhanced its value for English readers. The author, whose early death has prevented a personal revision, admits in his preface that he has sacrificed proportion to the necessity of treating his subject dramatically. Hence the long period of union with Denmark (1387-1814), which embraces the Reformation, occupies less than fifty pages; while the period for which the Saga Literature is the chief authority takes up three-quarters of the work. If we compare the dates, it is as if a writer, in relating the story of England, were to use up half his space upon the British and Saxon periods, and then devote two-thirds of the remainder to the Norman and Plantagenet Kings.

There are obvious disadvantages in this plan, especially in regard to the object which this series may be presumed to have in view. The Story of a Nation should surely comprise a careful and continuous estimate of its social and political development; and if the people acquiesced for centuries in the extinction of their independence, and yet are distinguished to-day by an intense patriotism and a robust national life, it is of the first importance to explain the causes of so complete a change. Possibly the drain of the constant migration to the south under the Vikings combined with later sanguinary feuds at home to produce a kind of exhaustion in the race from which it took long to recover. On this difficult point Boyesen's book, which is mainly concerned with a distant past, quite fails to satisfy the reader. But as a popular history of Norway to the close of the Middle Ages it is likely to hold the field, for the writer had a profound acquaintance with the old Norse Sagas, while the ease and grace of his simple style seem to revive their very spirit. This edition is judiciously illustrated, chiefly from antiques and characteristic local scenery. It is, perhaps, natural for a Norwegian patriot of to-day to avert his gaze from a time when his countrymen seemed to be politically dormant, hibernating, as it were, in preparation for the spring of a lusty rejuvenescence. But the centuries so lightly passed over in this book are just those in which national progress in the rest of Europe was most conspicuous; and one cannot doubt that, even in Norway's darkest days, the foundations were being slowly laid for that remarkable revival which took place within living memory. The English visitor, while enjoying the hospitality of Norwegians in their marvellously beautiful land, cannot fail to be attracted by the character of the people. Through their kindly and homely way they seem to him, as in fact they are, more like relations than strangers; and he will not forget that the intelligence and sturdy independence of the race contributed largely to the making of his own nation. If he be sometimes irritated by a certain placid indifference to the value of time, this may help him to solve the problem of Norway's long hibernation, for he will remember that the Arendian seclusion of glen, forest, and fjord, so restful to his own wearied spirit, is not exactly favourable to the growth of new ideas. And yet, as Mr. C. F. Keary shows in a chapter appended to this book on the recent politics of Norway, the temper of the people is now strongly democratic; and the introduction of universal suffrage, which comes into force in the present year, is likely to make this tendency more pronounced. Boyesen well points out in his closing pages that, though Norway with her small population can "cut no great figure in the world," she can vie with the best in the arts of peace; and it needs no prophet to foretell a high future for the country which can boast of Grieg and Nansen, of Ibsen and Jonas Lie.

RECENT VERSE.

The poets and poetesses who bloom in the summer are as numerous as ever this year. Though too many of them still put bad and indifferent together with good work there are several to whom this remark does not apply, while it would not be difficult to collect from the general output a fairly substantial volume of lyrics which should possess real worth and interest. In such a volume there would certainly be more than one contribution from a modest little grey pamphlet by Maud Curwen, THORKEL MANI AND OTHER POEMS (Rentell, 1s. n.). The title piece ranks decidedly above the average as a specimen of hexameters, and a little more revision would have made it very good indeed. Miss Curwen's exercise is noticeable for the success which has attended the difficult search for spondees of full weight and value. She has found for her thirty-four lines a fair proportion of disyllables which are natural spondees, but she is less successful in observing the natural dactyl, as witness the following lines:—

> There where his bondsmen first found them, e'en there rose > the smoke of the homestead.
> Many now followed the White Christ, the old gods were > lonely and weary.
> Down to the echoing sea strand where rays of the sun may > fall on me.

As a dactyl "bondsmen first" is a veritable mouthful.

Technically speaking a higher level is attained in other poems and measure, but all the verse in the book shows real poetic feeling and imagination. To two poems in blank verse, "Entering Achill" and "The Mad Musician Speaks," we can turn with unalloyed pleasure. They are both a little too long to quote, but here is a fine sonnet:—

> The wind this evening in the tossing pines
> Chants the fierce hymn that it has sung of old,
> An immemorial song. The rain-drops cold
> Dash in our faces, and the ruined vines
> Trail on the trampled earth, the river twines
> With angry murmur through the barren wold
> To reach the ocean, the black night doth fold
> The world in its embrace as day declines.
> Ah, God, we part! As through the gathering night
> Yon lightning-flash along the stormy skies
> Revealed each hidden pine—so hearts lay bare,
> Soul leapt to soul, clear seen in dazzling light,
> And now we dare not seek each other's eyes
> Lest we should find too deep a knowledge there.

In AD ASTRA, Mr. Charles Whitworth Wynne gives us rather a fine poem, luxuriously printed on hand-made paper, and published by Messrs. Grant Richards at seven shillings and sixpence net. "The night of sorrow," as runs the Shakespearian motto, "now is turned to joy"; for text St. Matt. xxiii., 37-39 is taken (the passage on the two great commandments); and the book is dedicated "To an Unknown Goddess." We mention these introductories advisedly since they are thoroughly indicative of the character of the poem and the trend of its thought. The opening stanzas are, with good judgment, plitted in quiet tones and are quoted as adequately representative of Mr. Wynne's style:—

> The leaves are falling fast, and Winter drear
> Steals on apace with fingers rough and cold,
> With marble touch his hoary hand doth sear
> The very heart-strings of the poor and old—
> The little songsters in the leafy wold
> Are quiet now, no more to charm the sky
> With rapture of a love that cannot die.
> All things must die, all things must have an end
> That tell of a beginning and a birth,
> All things must die, and soon or late must lend
> Their little pile of dust to swell the earth,
> But Love came with us in our baby-mirth,
> Love came beside us, taught us how to smile,
> And Love will guide us through Death's dark defile.

A little later on, however, where a more personal note is struck, the note of despondency is too strongly emphasized. Doubtless it is accentuated designedly in order to heighten the effect of the saner condition of mind which it is the author's intention presently to describe. Still the spectacle of a young poet deliberately sitting down alone to pine luxuriously after the "some one to love" who will probably come to him in the fulness of time is a mournful object for contemplation. There is a morbidness in the attitude which reminds one of the youth who wept copiously on escaping from a shipwreck because, as he said, if he had been drowned there would have been no sweetheart to lament his loss. But all this is soon flung aside, the poet rises into a self-contained enthusiasm for and confidence in the wisdom of a universal Plan, unfathomable yet none the less divine. On one or two minor points we think that a poem of this kind gains nothing by the introduction of stanzas upon the world-wide dominion of the Anglo-Saxon race. And in quite another direction we are at issue with Mr. Wynne's use of the word "Philosophy." "Self," he cries, "is the basis of Philosophy," and again:—

> Only to hearts devoid of human feeling
> Only to natures cold as thy cold creed,
> Can thy trite truths, Philosophy, bring healing.

And there is more of the same sort, all true enough if applied to one philosophic system or another, but obviously unfair to Philosophy in its broadest sense.

The poems in A MODERN PROPHET, by Eleanor Gray, which goes clad in the neat green uniform peculiar to some of Messrs. Kegan Paul's five-shilling publications, are very unequal, though some of them will repay perusal. "Vashti" is too fragmentary to be very effective, though there are good passages in it; while the story of Stradella is the merest sketch of the tragedy of his stolen love, his oratorio, and his assassination. That such a theme can be treated shortly and yet with tremendous force is shown once for all by Browning's "In a Gondola," a touchstone which it would perhaps be kinder not to approach too closely to the piece under discussion. And is not this rather a far-fetched simile?

> The night is kind, the stars bend over us
> So whitely clustered, like the bosom's snow
> Of some sweet mother bending o'er her babe.

In point of verse-craft "A latter-day friendship," a poem on the evolution of women, in the form of letters between two women friends, is not a success, the feet appearing, in many lines, to "buckle-up" through overcrowding. "You write as poets write," begins one friend to the other, yet the style of the letter alluded to serves only to remind us of that of the famous bank-clerk who tried (and failed) to say what he had to say over the counter in rhetorical blank verse. Far more interesting are the strong couplets upon Adam de la Halle, the hunchback and troubadour of Arras, and the author of "Le Jeu de Robin et de Marion," the first comic opera, we think, in existence. This poem should send many to the records of that queer career. The sonnet sequence, too, called "Eloise to Abelard" is well and sympathetically written.

Sonnet sequences are also much in evidence in Mr. J. S. Ingram's SONNETS AND OTHER POEMS (Black, 3s. 6d.), very few of which have been previously published, in spite of the fact that their accomplished author is now well on in years. A notable instance to the contrary, however, is afforded by the last poem in the book, "The Memory of the Dead," which was first published in the Irish "Nation" in 1843, and has since been more than once reprinted in collections of Irish verse. It is better known, perhaps, by its first line, "Who fears to speak of Ninety-Eight?" and has had the distinction of setting many a heart beating in a cause the justice and expediency of which it does not come within the province of Literature to discuss. Outside our range, too, politically speaking, are the poems addressed to 1899, to England and to Mr. Kruger, though here we cannot restrain a protest against the allusion to the Transvaal as the Helvetia of the South. One turns with greater pleasure to the sonnets. In these Mr. Ingram stands revealed as an enthusiastic admirer of Comte, to whose social philosophy is due the series of poems called "The Religion of Humanity," while the ode upon "The Triumph of Humanity" is based upon the conception of the Supreme Being which was a main outcome of his system of thought. In the first series, too, the "Love and Sorrow," it is easy to discern the influence of Comte's mind, in the intense recognition of the value and utility of perfect womanhood (mellowed here by a tender and chastened sympathy), and in the reverence for Dante, an echo of whose sublimity rings here and there through verse to which clings something of the atmosphere that one associates with old cathedrals, dim and finely windowed.

Love and sorrow have also gone to the making of Mr. John Cornwaile's YVONNE (Burleigh, 1s. 6d. n.), a poem which shows him to be an ardent and loyal lover, and a diligent hunter after phrases in which to set forth his devotion. More often, it must be confessed, he returns empty handed from the chase, still we find (if the term conveys anything to our readers) a certain "liquidness" about his verse which, taken together with the above-mentioned attributes, makes it easier to forgive him some doubtful rhymes, a few obscurities, and an occasional metrical audacity.

A little saddened by "Yvonne" we look for something to restore the balance, which swings over with a vengeance upon our taking up BACCHUS AND BOHEMIA, written and published by Mr. Alexander Miller of Glasgow. In these short pieces Mr. Miller lives and loves and enjoys the good things of this world in a truly catholic and enthusiastic spirit, and there is no doubt whatever as to the swing and "go" of his metres. It gives a pleasant sense of security to know that you can start on your way through a lyric with no risk of having to put the brake on to avoid obstructions, and you may read almost any one of these songs aloud with never a fear of that kind. Only (and the title should prepare you for this) be a little careful of your audience. It is all, or nearly all, extremely rollicking and jolly, but it is also, alas! here and there irresponsible to the verge of offence.

THE FISHER SPIRIT AND OTHER POEMS (The Unicorn Press, 6d.) is much more worthy of Mr. T. W. H. Crosland than the little book of his we alluded to a few weeks ago. In this booklet of eight poems, only one of which is of any length, there is both thought and style, a true feeling for the significant word and the dignified rhythm. We quote one of the poems, "The Yeoman," as apt to the times, though we doubt the truth of its contrast between the city and the town:—

Across the counties came the sound
Of war-drums that his fathers knew;
He had no heart for horse or hound,
He said, "Am I not English, too?"

All the old ardours in his blood
Leapt like the flame from smitten steel,
And, to himself revealed, he stood
A buttress of the commonweal.

So that, if cities give their pride
To strengthen England's righteous arm,
Men, too, are bred by countryside
And quiet grange and folded farm.

Mr. Patchett Martin has already referred in these columns to Mr. A. H. Adams, and we have kept for special notice his MAORILAND AND OTHER VERSES (the Bulletin Newspaper Company, Sydney, 3s. 6d.). His love for and pride in his own beautiful country is a pleasant feature of his poems. He is seen to less advantage in his more amatory poems. Here his passion sometimes betrays him into fervid and ecstatic reminiscences which often quite seriously interfere with his metre. In calmer moods, however, he can write such touching and tender lines as are to be found in "A lament" and "A lullaby." "A song of failure" is vigorous, while "And yet—" gives very poignant expression to the tender doubt with which it is concerned. But it is too long to quote, and we give instead a few couplets from a rather striking study, "The Australian":—

Rearing his cities in the sand,
He builds where even God has banned.

With green a continent he crowns
And stars a wilderness with towns.

His gyves of steel the great plain wears,
With paths the distances he snares.

A child who takes a world for toy,
To build a nation, or destroy.

His childish features frozen stern,
A nation's task he has to learn.

From feeble tribes to federate
One splendid peace-encompassed State.

But if there be no goal to reach,
The way lies open, dawns beseech!

Enough that he lay down his load
A little further on the road.

So, toward undreamed-of destinies
He slouches down the centuries.

He often, too, strikes well the lyrical and personal note:—

The world has grown so grey, love,
The weary world so wide;
And autumn seems to stay, love—
'Twas autumn when you died.

And everything is strange and new,
For all my world has died with you
It lacks the light you gave.
And sad-eyed dusk awaits alway,
And the nights wedge in the narrow day
Like the walls of an open grave!

CRICKETING REMINISCENCES.

The close of the cricket season is an appropriate time for reminiscences, and as the cricketer reviews the experiences of the last few months—months which have provided him with wickets of every description, changing at times with great suddenness "from lively to severe"—he will like also to be reminded of the fortunes that alternately smiled and frowned upon the players of an earlier generation. Such amusement is afforded to him by a perusal of THE WALKERS AT SOUTHGATE

(Methuen, 15s.). The author, Mr. W. A. Bettesworth, has been assisted by Mr. E. T. Sachs in putting together the host of reminiscences supplied by old cricketing friends of the Walkers. His book—admirable as it is in many respects—is uneven in merit. The various contributors have perhaps been a little too anxious to commemorate every detail of their connexion with the famous brothers; and the British passion for statistics—greater even than our love for the national game—has always stood in the way of a really first-rate book on cricket. Until some writer is content merely to hold up the mirror to nature on the cricket field we shall not have a Peter Beckford or an Isaac Walton of the bat and ball.

There is, however, a good deal in this book which should appeal to the ordinary reader. In their varied experiences, as leaders of Harrow cricket, founders of Middlesex cricket, and organizers of the famous Southgate Club which lowered the colours of the United England Eleven, the brothers Walker saw a vast amount of that human nature which is common to both "drybobs" and "wetbobs." Both of them are fond of colour.

> To Mr. Alfred Walker belongs the credit of inventing the ne plus ultra of flannels. For a year or two he appeared in brilliant red flannel trousers, and it is rumoured that once, when he was waiting at Colney Hatch Station to see some cricketer off who had been playing at Southgate, he happened to raise his leg just as an express appeared in sight, and the driver, thinking that it was a danger signal, brought his train to a full stop amidst considerable excitement.

Another equally human story is told of Tom Emmett, the famous Yorkshire bowler. In a match between Yorkshire and Middlesex, Tom bowled the late Mr. I. D. Walker with a fast ball, which twisted considerably more than the breadth of the wicket.

> Everybody was astonished, and no one more so than I.D., who, quite taken aback, stood for a moment looking at the destroyed wicket. Whereupon Tom Emmett, in the fulness of his satisfaction, walked up to him and said, "We ca' that oot in ma coontry."

In the chapter of reminiscences contributed by Professor Case we come across a graphic picture of the stickler for form as he appears on the cricket field.

> I was playing on August 1st and 2nd, 1864, for Middlesex v. M.C.C., and was fielding close to Thoms, the umpire, when Mr. Charles Marsham was clearly stumped off Mr. V. E. Walker's bowling, and Thoms gave the famous decision, "Not out—out, I mean." I believe that the dispute arising out of this equivocal response lasted all lunch-time, but I heard nothing of it. When, however, we went out again, Charles Marsham, who had the letter of the law on his side, reappeared at the wicket, but, having thus asserted his right, in a proper spirit deliberately knocked his wicket down first ball, and to this day appears in the cricket scores as "hit wicket, b. V. E. Walker."

In Talks with Old English Cricketers (Blackwood, 6s.), Mr. A. W. Pullin ("Old Ebor") has now and again had some difficulty in getting his "Old English Cricketers" to unburden themselves. Sometimes in his relief at getting them to say something he has attached undue value to their words. On the whole, we think, the great hitter, Mr. C. I. Thornton, has responded most freely to the interviewer's call. There is a relish of romance (we do not mean romancing) in his reminiscences of his mighty hits. After reading them one sees in the mind's eye balls flying about in all directions, over chimney tops, down vast terraces to the sea, through conservatory windows. The air is pregnant with disaster. But Mr. Thornton has not told "Old Ebor" one of his best stories. A cricketer with whom Mr. Thornton was unacquainted turned up to play on a side of which the latter was captain. With a view to arranging the order in which the side should go in to bat he was asked what sort of a player he might be. "I am not a W.G.," was the answer, "but I may as well tell you in confidence that I have never made 0." "Put him down eleven," added Mr. Thornton, "he cannot have seen much cricket."

PHILOSOPHY.

Vague Idealisms.

The increased study in England of German philosophy—a revolt against the dominance in the world of thought of the experimental methods of physical science—has led of late to a good deal of speculative activity which if not, it is to be feared, always very fruitful. The pleasure of metaphysical speculation is quite distinct from that of a simple search for truth. It provides a mental gymnastic, and the intellect, like the body, enjoys the mere consciousness of its own activity. An acrobat is able through certain acquired qualities of bone and muscle to assume an infinity of postures, none of which will be of much service to him in performing the ordinary physical duties of life. So in the world of abstract thought, a mind of sufficient subtlety can devise an immense number of "points of view," and yet produce scarcely any definite and pregnant thought. Nevertheless, it may be admitted that the "point of view" is often stimulating; it may flood a category of thought, a body of facts with a new light. We are, however, entitled to ask that it shall be lucidly expressed and realize itself in concrete illustration. This is what was done by Emerson—whose essays consist mainly of a vast number of points of view. Mr. Santayana, in his Poetry and Religion (A. and C. Black, 6s.), includes an appreciative essay on Emerson; but, unlike Emerson, he himself, endowed with a large philosophic vocabulary, too often goes astray in recondite abstractions. He is a metaphysical acrobat whose gyrations leave an impression of suppleness and flexibility rather than of strength.

In the attempt to prove the identity of poetry and religion—"poetry is called religion when it intervenes on life, and religion, when it merely supervenes upon life, is seen to be nothing but poetry"—he has a subject eminently suited to all kinds of excursions into the abstract. He has a great idea that our age has relapsed into barbarism because it has lost the ideal; it is ignorant of the past because it regards it only as a mechanical stepping-stone to the present. "Existences that cause one another exclude one another; each is alien to the rest inasmuch as it is the product of new and different conditions. Ideas that cause nothing unite all things by giving them a common point of reference and a single standard of value." This, despite its apparent profundity, seems to us the merest word chopping. If "existences" cause one another, they are not the product of new and different conditions. The study of these conditions is one of the most fruitful and familiar pursuits of the modern thinker. Are there any "ideas that cause nothing"? Certainly not, if we mean ideas embodied in human action. If we mean pure conceptions of the mind, it would be interesting to identify one which we can use to-day as a standard of value for the whole course of past human history. Mr. Santayana, Platonist as he is, requires a Socrates to bring him to book. How would that uncompromising inquirer have dealt with the assertion that the essential conception of philosophy is "that the destiny of emotion is to pass into objects which shall contain all its value while losing all its formlessness"? These intellectual gymnastics do not encourage us to find in this book the sound guidance of a clear-headed thinker. Nor do we find this expectation in any degree agreeably falsified in the essay, to take one instance, on Shakespeare. Shakespeare, we are told, does not give us "all that the highest poet could give because he is without a philosophy and without a religion." And the reason for this is given in a remarkable paragraph which tells us that modern taste is "largely exotic, largely a revolution in favour of something ancient or foreign." This has prevented the true expression of either the old or the new. "The strange idea could thus gain admittance that art was not called upon to deal with everything; that its sphere was the world of polite conventions. The serious and sacred things of life were to be left unexpressed and inarticulate." Anything further than the plays of Shakespeare from "the world of polite conventions" it is difficult to imagine; and Mr. Santayana does not seem able to recognize that Shakespeare is not a philosopher nor a theologian because he is a dramatist.

The Rev. P. Hately Waddell, an idealist of a different type, the author of CHRISTIANITY AS AN IDEAL (Blackwood, 3s. 6d.), moves, like Mr. Santayana, too consistently in a world of abstractions, though he has a clearer idea of what it is he is driving at. That the Christian ideal must appeal or should appeal to-day not as of old to faith and emotion only but to man as a thinking being is the thesis which he states and restates in an immense number of academic phrases. It is a thesis which as a statement not tested, not amplified by a direct application to life and experience, remains a mere theological formula; and we fear that readers of Mr. Waddell's book will find the expectations formed by his attractive title disappointed. But they will find a good deal that is suggestive in his book—such passages, for example, as his contrast of the Greek and the Hebrew view of the world. The former, which recognizes "the unity of man and the world in one rational ideal," is undoubtedly prominent in the religious thought of the day, as is also the Hellenic temper of free inquiry. And the religious thinker of the present day will find a curious bond of union with a too much neglected mediæval philosopher who, across ten centuries, in which materialism and dogma have too often stifled the true voice of religion, speaks to us of the inner light of the spiritual reason—in the study, namely, of Scotus Erigena, who has lately been recalled to us in a careful and thoughtful volume by Miss Alice Gardner, called STUDIES IN JOHN THE SCOT (Frowde, 2s. 6d.), in which the apparent inconsistencies and mediæval prepossessions of Scotus are shown to throw into relief the true originality and even modernity of his conceptions.

Evolution and Conduct.

In EVOLUTION (Methuen, 5s.), Dr. Jevons inquires to what extent evolutionism, if accepted as a theory of the universe, does, or rather should (for in an illogical world, such as ours, men's actions are but little affected by their theoretical views), influence human thought and conduct. He notes the variety of conclusions reached by men who, although differing on most points, agree in looking upon themselves as authorized exponents of scientific truth. Dr. Jevons disputes their infallibility, not so much on the ground of bad science, as on that of bad metaphysics.

> Much learned dust
> Involves the combatants, each claiming truth,
> And truth disclaiming both. And thus they spend
> The little wick of life's poor shallow lamp
> In playing tricks with Nature. . . .

Dr. Jevons holds that we are all born speculators. Religious and scientific truth both start from assumptions for which there is little or no evidence. "The axioms of science are not and cannot be proved either by experience or in any other way; on what does the man of science ground his belief in them? On faith." Religion and science alike have their root in faith. "We believe in the axioms of science because we wish to believe that they are true. There is no reason except there first be faith. . . . We believe in the principles of morality not because we can prove them or bring evidence to show that a man ought to do what is right, but because we wish to believe, and because we have faith in the right." We need not pause to inquire whether e.g., the law of causation is not an induction from facts; but surely there is a radical distinction between the man who adopts a working hypothesis, not accepting it as truth, until sufficiently verified, and the metaphysician, who takes his unverified conjectures for facts and raises on them a structure as unstable as the foundation on which it rests. Dr. Jevons, however, is practically at one with the "common-sense" school in holding that the dictates of consciousness are to be implicitly received, and that we have an intuitive knowledge of certain ideas, and the reality of the ne'uell. "The natural world is directly apprehended as at once in our consciousness and beyond it. . . . The reality of existence, of knowledge, of goodness is not an inference, but a matter of direct apprehension." We have no space, of course, to discuss the idealist position. The belief in an external something independent of perception is certainly incapable of scientific proof. Among the best essays in this interesting and suggestive book are those which deal with "Pessimism," "Optimism," and "Progress." The author defines progress as the "continuous approximation to the ideals of truth, beauty, goodness, and holiness," and human evolution "as the progressive revelation of the ideal in and to man." To the evolutionist, who is neither unduly optimistic, nor severely pessimist, but moderately hopeful, progress means nothing more than adaptation, and an act is only moral when it is conducive to the general well-being. Still even here there is room for ideals, and there are other forces and influences operative in human progress than the struggle for life and the survival of the fittest.

AN ESSAY ON MENTAL CULTURE, by G. A. Hight (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), has a promising title. On the cultivation of the mind there is much that is new to be said as social conditions change. But, unfortunately, the book lapses at once into metaphysics, on which too many barren works have already been written; and is devoted to an exposition of the writer's own philosophy, which is founded on perception, and holds that all error proceeds from reason. Here and there some shrewd and well-expressed thoughts will be found on such subjects as the relation of the will to belief.

Dr. J. Hutchison Stirling's WHAT IS THOUGHT? (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 10s. 6d.) contains a general statement of his philosophic position conveyed for the most part in the form of criticisms on the great German thinkers. It is written in his well-known abrupt conversational style, full of solid learning and a vigour which age has not diminished. Many passages breathe an almost lyrical fervour; and, if there is often no effort to make the meaning plain in detail, we always feel that the writer is intensely in earnest with his subject. Dr. Stirling's philosophy is a form of Personal Idealism and his criticism of Kant from that standpoint is true and well put. On Hegel he is less convincing and, as in earlier works, he wastes much time in arguing that Hegel's system was substantially at one with his own.

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF MORALITY, by G. Gore (Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d. n.), is a bulky volume, decidedly ambitious in its scope and promise. Its object is "to place the subject of human conduct upon a comprehensive scientific basis, and supply a rational want." Unfortunately, the author does not seem to have made a very careful study of ethics, or to have formed very definite notions about science. "The limits of science," he says, "are virtually boundless." The work is a rich mine of quotations, largely from the poets, with occasional verses which seem to be of the author's own composition. But it does not throw much light on the basis of morality.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Counsels of Health.

The latest addition to the "Temple Cyclopædic Primers" is THE HUMAN FRAME AND THE LAWS OF HEALTH, by Dr. Rehmann and Dr. Seiler (Dent, 1s. 6d. n.). The book is divided into two sections. The first is concerned with the structure and activities of the body. Here the outline of human anatomy is excellent, a great deal of clear information about the more important structures being packed away in a small compass and illustrated with useful diagrams. But the statements regarding physiological function are not always so satisfactory. One result, probably an inevitable one, of the brief and condensed style adopted is that even the most complicated processes have to be dismissed in a few lines, and though the facts stated in these lines may be accurate enough so far as they go, yet the reader is apt to derive from them that half-knowledge which is of doubtful advantage, together with a fallacious idea of the simplicity of matters about which in some cases the most recent research has found out little more than its own ignorance. To a certain extent the second section on the laws of health exhibits similar defects. In the middle of a mass of ordinary facts that every one should know, there suddenly appears a somewhat dogmatic pronouncement on some measure of practical hygiene as to the necessity or possibility of which there is by no means general agreement, while the trail of the faddist is distinctly over such a dictum as that drinking water must not be brought through leaden or iron pipes—a thing that is constantly done without any ill-effects being produced. The translation from the German original has been made by Mr. F. W. Keeble, and to him are possibly to be ascribed one or two slips that may be noticed in the book—in particular the persistent use of the word typhus where typhoid is doubtless meant.

We have received a new, revised, and cheaper edition of Dr. Yorke Davis' HEALTH AND CONDITION IN THE ACTIVE AND SEDENTARY (Sampson Low, 2s. 6d.). It is a sensible book which airs no fads; but its value would be greater if the author, who insists very emphatically on the need for exercise, would descend to more particulars, and point out the advantages of calisthenics, and particularly of free gymnastics—the easiest kinds of exercise for the dweller in cities to obtain and those which can be most easily adapted to the exigencies of any particular organ.

THE WAY TO BE WELL, by Mrs. Yorke Smith (Wells, Gardner, Darton, 3d.), gives good advice to girls in the matter of preserving their health. Among other things it gives concise directions for performing some of those Swedish exercises which are so useful in keeping the human organism in good trim.

War Books.

Mr. John A. Buttery, the author of WHY KRUGER MADE WAR (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.), is a journalist who has lived and sub-edited in the Transvaal; and his book is apparently a rechauffé of newspaper articles. They have the incisiveness that one expects from the work of the man on the spot, and illuminate the British case with anecdotes and circumstantial details. The relations, for example, of Mr. Kruger—that foe of financiers—with the financial house of Lewis and Marks are set forth in a manner that must be exceedingly disconcerting to pro-Boers; and the prevalent corruption among Transvaal officials is illustrated by typical cases—the case, for instance, of "Old Schutte," head of the police, who embezzled £13,000, and was, nevertheless, permitted after a brief holiday to resume the reins of office. There are also some accounts, derived from Boer sources, of the British reverses at Magersfontein, Colenso, Spion Kop, and Stormberg. In the case of Spion Kop it appears that the Boers agree with General Buller that Colonel Thorneycroft's retirement was well advised. There was no water; the trenches were enfiladed; schanzes could not be made; and the height had little value as a strategical point. Colonel Thorneycroft, therefore, "did the only thing possible." The impression certainly grows that that gallant officer has been hardly used and censured with injudicious haste.

WITH THE BOER FORCES (Methuen, 6s.), by Howard C. Hillegas, a correspondent of the New York World, is, we believe, the first description of the war from the point of view of the enemy's laagers. It is not a consecutive history, but a series of essays on such subjects as "the composition of the Boer army," "the generals of the war," "foreigners in the war," &c.; and the accounts of such military episodes as are related or referred to often differ from those which our own generals have sent home. We are told, for instance, that 350 burghers cleared our men off Spion Kop, though we had been given to understand that the evacuation of that eminence was not due to the burghers at all, but to the shell-fire; and the story of Paardeberg is told without mention of the exploit of the Canadians. Such omissions do not inspire confidence in the accuracy of the author, or dispose us to accept, without confirmation, such statements as that, when Delagoa Bay was blockaded, "the vessels which succeeded in passing the blockading warships were invariably consigned to Englishmen, and without exception these were unpatriotic enough to sell the supplies to agents employed by the Transvaal Government." His book, however, is good reading, and contains some good stories, and some graphic pictures. It will be news to most Englishmen that, when General Cronje surrendered, "a fancy dress ball was held in Johannesburg, in honour of the event, and a champagne dinner was given within a few yards of the Government buildings in Pretoria"; and this picture of laager life is interesting:—

> General Meyer pitched quoits with his men, General Botha swapped tobacco with any one of his burghers, and General Smuts and one of his officers held the whist championship of their laager. Rarely a burgher touched his hat before speaking to an officer, but he invariably shook hands with him at meeting and parting. It is a Boer custom to shake hands with friends or strangers, and whenever a general visited a laager adjoining his own, the hand shaking reminded one of the President's public reception days at Washington. . . . Many of the burghers could not restrain from exercising the habit, and shook hands with British prisoners, much to the astonishment of the captured.

On the whole Mr. Hillegas writes as a pro-Boer, and without that respect for British soldiers which would probably be hammered into him if he himself had occasion to meet them face to face upon the field of battle; but he is also keenly alive to the military deficiencies of the burghers, and is particularly severe upon Joubert, who, he thinks, if he had known his business, might easily have stormed Ladysmith, and raided Natal to the sea. Possibly he is right. Some of our own military experts have expressed the same opinion. But his military criticism shows, on the whole, more ignorance than knowledge of military matters; and it is really his anecdotes that make his book interesting. This is rather a good story of some Boer boys who "bailed up" a hundred Highlanders at Magersfontein:—

> One of the young Boers approached them, then called his friends, and, scratching his head, asked "What shall we do with them?" There was a brief consultation, and it was decided to allow the Highlanders to return to their column. When the young burghers arrived at the Boer laager with the captured rifles and bandoliers, General Cronje asked them why they did not bring the men. The youths looked at each other for a while; then one replied, rather sheepishly: "We did not know they were wanted."

Political Economy.

Mr. A. H. Gibson's little treatise on NATURAL ECONOMY (Birmingham: Cornish Brothers), was intended, he tells us, to form the first portion of a work on Political Economy, which he has not as yet been able to complete. It is an attempt to think out, on independent lines, those preliminary postulates which are occasionally ignored or taken for granted by writers of economic text-books. The term Political Economy, Mr. Gibson thinks, is generally used in a vague way to embrace the whole science of human economics, and confusion of thought has resulted from the lack of distinction between its various divisions. These he names Natural Economy, subjective and objective; Cosmopolitan Economy, Communital Economy, and Individual Economy. It is with the first of these that he deals in this book. He seems to us better able to think for himself than to express his thoughts clearly for others, and we doubt whether any valuable end is served by his new terminology. Not content with the ordinary terms used by economists (some of which, in truth, would bear improvement), Mr. Gibson has, with praiseworthy industry, evolved a new set for himself. It may be prejudice on our part, but, on the whole, we find them more difficult to understand than the old. Moreover, his style is not clear; a beginner might find the following sentence, for example, a little breathless:—

> It will be obvious, from what is stated above, that the happiest economical condition obtains when the potential surplus ratio is greatest, not necessarily in a human community, that all the possible surplus products may be evolved, as the alternative object of improving the conditions of existence may take the direction of rest from, or partial cessation of, production; but the ultimate objects of human existence can only be gratified, in a degree directly dependent on the greater or less potential surplus ratio.

But if the little book cannot be regarded as a strikingly original or profound contribution to economic literature, it shows a patient and praiseworthy effort to analyse and explain the elementary truth which must be grasped by every student of the science.

Before Raphael.

The number of works on Italian painters which have lately appeared in print, or are in course of preparation, is truly marvellous, and if visitors to the picture-galleries of Europe are not thoroughly well acquainted with the contents of these museums and with the qualities of the different schools represented, it will certainly not be for lack of opportunities of instruction. Already two separate series, dealing with the chief Italian artists, and for the most part written by authors of marked ability, are in progress, and now we have a third, published by the Catholic Truth Society. Its first two volumes (6d. n. each), which have appeared simultaneously, are FRA ANGELICO, by Virginia Crawford, and SANDRO BOTTICELLI, by A. Streeter. Both are square in shape, and are simply but tastefully bound in grey and white boards. Each little volume has a portrait of the painter whose name it bears. That of Fra Angelico is reproduced from a work ascribed to another Dominican master, Fra Bartolommeo, of San Marco, while the fine head of Botticelli is taken from the painter's own fresco of The Destruction of Korah in the Sistine Chapel. As might be expected, the authors of these books both write from a Roman Catholic point of view, and Mrs. Crawford quotes largely from Rio's "Art Chrétien" as well as from the works of Montalembert and other approved Roman authorities. Mr. Streeter is more critical and accurate in his description of individual paintings, and has evidently studied Morelli and Richter as well as Müntz and Symonds. But many of his ascriptions would be hotly disputed by these critics, and both the Madonna in the Louvre and the so-called Casa Canigiani Madonna at Vienna, as well as the panels illustrating Boccaccio's weird story of Nastagio degli Onesti, all of which he includes among Botticelli's genuine pictures, have long been recognized to be the work of inferior assistants. On the other hand, the present writer omits all mention of the Ambrosiana Madonna, one of Botticelli's most perfect and indisputable works, and does not allude to his noble portrait of Giovanni de' Medici in the Uffizi. The beautiful Adoration of the Magi in the Hermitage Gallery is certainly not, as Mr. Streeter tells us, a large picture, although it is still finer in quality than the well-known Adoration of the Uffizi. On the whole, however, both of these little monographs are well and carefully put together, and their convenient size and cheapness will not fail, we feel sure, to commend them to that large class of travellers who shrink from embarking on more solid literature.

Books on the exploits of the various regiments in our Army have been frequent of late; but Major Arthur Griffiths' FAMOUS BRITISH REGIMENTS (Unwin, 2s. 6d.) pleases us better than the rest. It is not merely a dull catalogue of stirring deeds, but has numerous anecdotes scattered about its pages, clears up many points obscure to the unprofessional reader—the difference, for instance, between the three sorts of artillery, and between rifle regiments and regiments of the Line—and pays particular attention to recent events in South Africa. It is a pity that the author could not find space to deal with the Royal Engineers. His book is so short that his apologies for omitting them will hardly seem satisfactory to sappers.

A somewhat pathetic interest is attached to the essay on SIR WILLIAM WALLACE: THE HERO OF SCOTLAND, by P. H. M'Kerlie, F.S.A.Scot., F.R.G.S., &c. (Glasgow: Morison Bros.), owing to the death of the writer on the very day on which it was published. Mr. M'Kerlie was the last of the male descendants of Wallace's friend and companion Kerlie, who was slain when the Scottish hero was captured; and the present eulogy of Wallace was written in view of the unveiling of the memorial which has been erected on the spot where, according to tradition, the capture occurred. Although it is claimed for the paper that it "contains fresh information about the traitorous opposition he (Wallace) had to encounter in his struggle for Scottish independence," there is really little in it that is new to those familiar with the various biographies of Wallace.

Mr. Thiselton-Dyer has told us that the Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha originated the Botanic Garden at Kew in 1759, but it was not until the year 1841 that it became a public scientific establishment. It is now so well-known that the volume of photographs which Mr. E. J. Wallis has taken of its principal features is sure of a welcome. One of the most successful page illustrations of this memorial of the ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS (Effingham Wilson, 2s. 6d. n.) is that of the Rhododendron Dell, but all the 30 photographs are good.

Professor Wilbur M. Stine's PHOTOMETRICAL MEASUREMENTS (The Macmillan Company, 6s. 6d.) is an admirably clear little book on a difficult subject. A great part of the space is naturally occupied with descriptions of photometers and of the many—mostly disappointing—efforts that have been made to discover a satisfactory standard of illuminating power. But there is also a good deal of theoretical matter, for the author rightly holds that the blind following of bare directions is not enough to ensure results of value in an operation so beset with pitfalls as the measurement of light, unless the reasons for these directions are also appreciated. The concluding chapters deal particularly with the photometry of the incandescent lamp and the arc light, special attention being paid to the former as a comparison light. As a pleasant novelty in a book of American origin the "u" is not omitted in words like colour and vapour.

FICTION.

The Pseudo Romance and Real Romance.

Many readers of current fiction incline to the view that a romance differs from a novel in that one is clothed in the trappings and the phraseology of a distant period and the other tells its tale of the people, and in the diction, of to-day. Now there is a very much subtler difference than this, and it happens that two sincere and clever authors have just produced books which may go to show that it is not only the trappings which make a romance. Mr. Ernest Rhys' book THE WHISTLING MAID (Hutchinson, 6s.), with its clever picture of Welsh life and manners in the fourteenth century, is one of the best examples of the "costume" romance that we have seen of late years. The period is the historic one of Isabella and her paramour Mortimer. Luned, the charming (in the theatrical sense) Welsh girl, whose life and love and adventures we read, is full of spirit and local colour. Like many another historical novelist Mr. Rhys mingles the fortunes of his heroine with those of some of the great persons of the day. Again following the lines of the great romances, Luned is soon to be found in the "grey tunic and coat, and boy's hose" of a pretty page. In this disguise she acts after a fashion hardly likely to deceive the most naïf of fourteenth century ladies and gentlemen. But that is a convention of the pseudo-romance "and the public like it best." The author, however, uses well his special knowledge of the country to give his people the right historic air and frequently captures something of the feeling of his period; but, alas, he leaves us unconvinced. The fate of the young mistress of Rhos comes so pat, the re-creation of the atmosphere is so carefully planned that one hears the wheels go round and becomes slightly bored with the clever machinery.

On the other hand, Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist creates the real romance. His period is to-day or yesterday, but his story contains the essentials of "fair fortunes"—it is for all periods. THE COURTESY DAME (Heinemann, 6s.) possesses all the sweetness and rusticity of a pastoral, but through it a thousand lights and shades of human passion are seen to play. The author appears to face every difficulty which the ordinary novelist would avoid, and overcomes them all with the delicacy and mastery of an artist. He is always original; you cannot forecast his coming chapter. If occasionally the grace of his diction hints an affectation it is balanced by his admirable use of rustic phrases and his power to fix the right word at vital moments. In the delightful story of Anne Wilehest's love for the invalid Lord Bostern we have real people, we know their passions and feel the weight of their tragedy. This is the story: "He had made her idolize him; the highest gratification she would ever know, the highest she ever wished to know, was the delight of being by his side, of listening to his voice, of watching his eyes." But to this romance of the soul, to this striking analysis of temperaments, Mr. Gilchrist adds a complete and entertaining picture of the Peakland country and its people. We knew of his power to reproduce many of the qualities of these country folk, but in "The Courtesy Dame" (a name given to Anne by the rustic people), he shows their hearts with a power rarely equalled in fiction. The story will, we think, immediately grip the reader and hold him until he reaches the last sad and beautiful chapter.

There is one weakness in the story. That the author should make so acute and generous a man as his Lord Bostern think that he could assure the future worldly happiness of his beautiful, devoted friend, the courtesy dame, by marrying her either to his pleasant kinsman Stan, or her early faithful lover Jud, strains the reader's powers of belief. At the eleventh hour of Bostern's life, when every moment of Anne's presence is paradise enough to him, and every glance of his eyes is an ecstacy to her, he plots and plans to send her from him. This makes an interesting situation, of course, but at what cost! That the man with all his grace and tact and love should so misread the heart of Anne pains the sympathetic reader.

In the telling of this story of the devotion of a beautiful and gifted girl of the people to the "spirit" of a noble gentleman, Mr. Murray Gilchrist puts severely from him all temptation to become involved in rhodomontade, yet writes with a fine sense of colour and freedom from the conventions. But he understands the depth and purity of human love as few novelists do, and with that knowledge style is easy. A poet's heart inspires many a tender, deep passage in the book; a love of lovely things—evanescent, mysterious, yet unfailingly real. To write a novel in the historical manner of Mr. Rhys is to prove oneself a skilful maker of stories, an earnest student of a country and a period, but to invent, compose, and place before us a vital study of the heart, almost an epic of the beautiful compensations of a pure passion, such as may be found in "The Courtesy Dame," is an accomplishment of true merit.

Antipodean.

Mr. William Sylvester Walker ("Coo-ee") has gained some reputation for his stories of antipodean life such as those contained in "When the Mopoke Calls" and "From the Land of the Wombat." In his new book, NATIVE BORN (Long, 6s.), he attempts a considerable novel in the same manner. If the longer book lacks something of the vigorous style of the sketches, we are compensated by the skilfully drawn characters and by the deeper sense of Australian life which the continued narration gives. "Native Born" has in it that note of melancholy which all bushmen know and something more than a mere echo of the melody and sentiment which one connects with the land of Adam Lindsay Gordon. But there is laughter and love, too, in Mr. Walker's straightforward, clearly-told story—

'Twas merry 'mid the backwoods, when we saw the station roofs,
To wheel the wild scrub-cattle at the yard,
With a running fire of stock-whips, and a fiery run of hoofs,
Oh the hardest day was never then too hard!

gives the keynote of his work. The prologue and envoi in rhyme are admirable in sentiment, but lacking in beauty and even technical skill.

"FitzJames."

Miss Lilian Street must lack something of humour to name her hero FITZJAMES (Methuen, 6s.). It is too suggestive of Thackeray's "Jeames of Buckley Square." But, quite apart from the title, FitzJames is ridiculous in many ways. "Galt FitzJames was in his forties. Known far and wide as a poet, a consummate artist, and critic, he was greatly loved and greatly feared. He had an atmosphere that was unique, electric, stimulating; and his secret lay not so much in his genius proper as in his bewildering personality." That is how he appears to Miss Street, but to the reader who can only construct him from his conversation and actions he seems to be what children call a "silly," and one that, if he were not the conception of an evidently sincere lady, we should be inclined to call something far stronger. His chat with Ruth about her painting bears a "bewildering personality" that leads him to suggest to an artist at work with oils upon canvas that she shall "wash that sky out, and that, and that, now at once!"

THE HOME-READING UNION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed to remind your readers that the syllabus of subjects for the Twelfth Reading Season of the National Home-Reading Union is ready?

For the information of those who are not acquainted with the Union, I should like to state that its aim is, briefly, to render reading attractive and profitable by issuing lists drawn up by authorities of the best books in various subjects, and by publishing magazines which contain introductions to the subjects under study, suggestions as to the best methods of reading the prescribed books, answers to questions, and criticism of essays as well as news of other readers' doings.

The subjects included in the "Young People's" Course are:—I. History and Biography, with special reference to King Alfred and his Times; II. Literature (Shakespeare, Prose, and Poetry); III. Travel; IV. Romance and Humour; and V. Nature-Study (for this, special editions of Richard Jefferies' "The Open Air" and "Nature near London" have been obtained).

For the "General Course"—a section intended for those who have but little leisure—the subjects are:—

I. Social Science; II. The Reformation and the Revival of Learning (for this group special editions of the following have been obtained: Kostlin's "Luther," "Froude's "Erasmus" Hudson Shaw's "Lectures on the Oxford Reformers," and Mrs. Charles' "Chronicles of the Schönberg Cotta Family); III. Geology; IV. Italy in the Revival of Learning; V. Rome; VI. Travel; VII. Biography; VIII. Novels, Essays, and Poetry; and IX. A group of books specially chosen for Sunday School Teachers.

The Special Course Section is intended for more advanced students who desire to receive systematic tutorial help, and includes the following subjects:—I. English History, from 1789; II. Modern English Literature; III. The Tragedies of Shakespeare; IV. Browning; V. Mediæval and Early Renaissance Literature; VI. India; VII. French History, 1275-1789; VIII. German Lyrical Poetry; IX. Education; X. Astronomy.

Full information may be obtained from the secretary, National Home-Reading Union office, Surrey-house, Victoria-embankment, W.C.

Yours faithfully,
MARIA C. MONDY, Secretary.

TRANSLATIONS OF TOLSTOY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Coming across a volume entitled "Vicious Pleasures," by "Count L. Tolstoi," and knowing that Count Leo Tolstoy never wrote a work under any name of that kind, I examined the matter, and have come to the conclusion that the book mentioned is a translation of a French volume made up of five essays written by Tolstoy between 1880 and 1890, and put together by Mons. E. Halpérine-Kaminsky, under the title of "Plaisirs Vicieux." The preface reads as though a work written and arranged by Tolstoy were being offered to the public; the dates of the different articles are not given, and the one, "Church and State," which happens to have been written first, is put last in the volume, being, one must admit, a strange ingredient in a book on "vicious pleasures."

Having gone thus far it occurred to me to look at another volume of Mons. Halpérine-Kaminsky's translations, "Plaisirs Cruels." This, again, is a title Tolstoy has never used; and, again, the book is offered, not as a compilation made by the translator, but as though it were a book of Tolstoy's own arranging. No dates are given to the separate parts; they consist of an essay on vegetarianism, "The First Step" (which is re-named "Les Mangeurs de Viande"); of two long extracts from books by Tolstoy; of a letter from Tolstoy to a correspondent; and of an article, "La Chasse," the real author of which is not Leo Tolstoy but Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff.

That Mons. E. Halpérine-Kaminsky should publish this essay under Tolstoy's name is the more peculiar in view of the fact that Tolstoy wrote a preface commending this essay of Mr. Tchertkoff's, and that Mons. Halpérine-Kaminsky was not merely aware of the existence of this preface, but actually makes use of it in "Plaisirs Cruels," with the result that Tolstoy is made to appear to praise his own work in the following strain:—

> It is to be hoped that the article before us will produce a salutary influence on those who read it. God grant that it will have many readers, especially among the young.

> Yours truly,

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Whatever else the autumn may bring forth, students of Shakespeare and Dickens, at least, will be well provided for. Most of the Dickens items we have already enumerated, but one or two other announcements are made to-day. For students of Shakespeare there will be a fresh edition of his works, just as another edition—Dent's Larger Temple Shakespeare—closes with the twelfth volume, containing, among other things, a new life of the poet by Mr. Israel Gollancz, the editor, who, by the way, has written "An Introduction to Shakespeare" for the new Temple Primers. The latest set is to be the "Knickerbocker Edition," of Messrs. Putnam, in fifteen volumes, with notes. The last volume will include a glossary, an index of characters, and several famous critical essays on Shakespeare. The chief feature of the "Knickerbocker Edition," however, will be some hundreds of illustrations in outline by Mr. Frank Howard, and photogravure frontispieces reproduced from the Boydell gallery. Messrs. Putnam, too, are publishing the "New Study of the Sonnets of Shakespeare," by Mr. Parke Godwin, and will probably have it ready by the end of the month.

A fresh campaign by the Baconian zealots is also threatened. Mrs. Elizabeth Wells Gallup, who assisted Dr. Owen in the preparation of the later books of "Sir Francis Bacon's Cipher Story," claims to have discovered and deciphered the mysterious secrets which Bacon, she would have us believe, buried in his writings. She tells the story in "The Bi-literal cipher of Sir Francis Bacon," which Messrs. Gay and Bird are to publish on this side of the Atlantic. Greene, Peele, and Marlowe, as well as Shakespeare, all go by the board; Sir Francis explains to Mrs. Gallup that their dramatic works were written by him alone. The proofs, she says, are "overwhelming and irresistible."

The Countess von Arnim, who, it seems, is the real Elisabeth, of the "German Garden" and "A Solitary Summer," will shortly publish a volume of quaint children's verses from German sources which are being illustrated by Miss Kate Greenaway. Her maiden name was Beauchamp, and she lives in North Germany, twelve miles from the shores of the Baltic Sea. The neighbouring town is Stettin.

Some months ago Mr. Gordon Duff, of the Rylands' Library, Manchester, and a few serious students of bibliography formed a small society, whose membership is limited, we believe, to fifty, for the purpose of reproducing pages of interesting old books—preference to be given to work of little known printers which at the same time possesses genuine character. This week members have received the publications of the society for the year 1900. At first sight some may feel disappointed at their guinea's worth, but half an hour spent in careful examination of the plates should suffice to bring a self-congratulatory smile to the face of each member. In all, forty-two collotype reproductions from as many books printed in the fifteenth century have been distributed. No trouble has been spared in making these reproductions as perfect as may be, and, printed at the Oxford University Press, the series is in all respects worthy of praise. For the most part books in the British Museum and the Bodleian Library have been requisitioned, but a Statius, printed at Rome circa 1470, at C.C.C., Oxford, has been used, as, too, volumes in All Souls' College, Oxford, and the University Library, Cambridge. Among the most satisfactory pages from a decorative standpoint is an example in Gothic type by Bartolommeo da Cremona from a folio volume, "Nic. de Ausmo, supplementum," dating from 1473, in the Bloomsbury collection. The two-column page, by reason of its melodious capital M.'s, the vigour and beauty of each letter, above all, perhaps, because of its just spacing, would have delighted the late William Morris. Here, indeed, is a printed page possessed of much of the attraction of one traced by a skilled scribe in some quiet monastery; it has unity, dignity, significance as a design. Those to whose initiative the formation of the society is due are to be congratulated on thus enabling members to study at leisure characteristic and beautiful specimens of the splendid youth of printing.

As a gift to his fellow members, Dr. Konrad Burger has caused to be distributed three additional plates. His instructive note on these may appropriately be quoted:—

> In the last century two catalogues of incunables appeared almost simultaneously, which are of interest as being the first in which to any great extent facsimiles are given of the types employed for the books described in them. The first is Placidus Braun's "Notitia historico-literaria de libris ab artis typographicae inuentione usque ad annum MD. impressio, in bibiotheca monasterii ad SS. Vdalricum et Afram Augustae extantibus." This was published in 1788-89, and has eleven plates of alphabets engraved on copper. The other is the "Verzeichniss typographischer Denkmaler welche sich in der Bibliothek des regulirten Horherrenstiftes des heil. Augustin zu Neustift in Tirol befinden," of Franz Gras, published at Brixen in two parts; the first, dealing with the fifteenth century, in 1789, the second (sixteenth and seventeenth centuries), in 1790. Each part has six engravings on copper. On inquiry at the monastery of Neustift some time ago, I was informed by the then librarian, P. Leander Felder, that no copies of Gras' work, of which only 100 copies were printed, remained there, but that they had three copper plates belonging to it. I was very kindly allowed to print impressions from these plates, and I am glad of the opportunity to hand them over to my fellow members of the T.F.S. A comparison with the book of Gras shows that these plates were not used in it; his plate I. contains five alphabets only, that here numbered I. has six, the fourth being an addition. It must be admitted that the copper plates, engraved by Gras with his own hand, are markedly inferior in accuracy by those of Braun, and are useless for the identification of types, though of distinct interest to the historian of printing.

The elaborate "Universal History" in course of publication by the Bibliographisches Institut at Leipzig is to be published in English in eight volumes by Mr. Heinemann in London, and by Messrs. Dodd, Mead, and Co. in America. The work is under the direction of Professor Helmolt, and some of the first historians of the day are contributors. The English edition will have an editorial introduction on the general idea of universal history by the Right Hon. Professor James Bryce, M.P. It will be illustrated by coloured and black and white plates, and also by numerous maps. The first volume will appear towards the end of this year, and the succeeding seven at quarterly intervals.

In connexion with the announcement of the Scottish Text Society's intention to issue an index of Scottish MSS. before 1600, it is interesting to observe that the index is to include all Scottish MSS. in British and Continental collections—original texts, copies, translations, or recensions—of which the language is Early or Middle Scots or Northern (where there is no evidence of composition by a Northern English writer). There is really no such thing as a distinctive Scottish language or dialect in the earliest Scottish literature. Wyntoun and Barbour show no distinct separation in language between England and Scotland. Barbour's "The Bruce" is really Saxon, and is sometimes spoken of as "Northern English." It is not till about the close of the fifteenth century that we find Scottish poetry couched in a language, or dialect, distinct from that of England. The recognition by the Scottish Text Society of "Northern" is significant. Such an index as the society intends to compile will be very valuable, and it is to be hoped that all those possessing MSS. will co-operate with the society's committee, so that the index may be made as complete as possible.

"Tronçons du Glaive" is the title of the new book by Paul and Victor Margueritte. It commences this month as a serial in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and will form the second volume of "Une Epoque." "Le Désastre" was the first volume of this work, and the "Tronçons du Glaive" comprises, in the form of a novel, the events which took place during the period of the "Défense Nationale," from October, 1870, to March, 1871.

A new book by Tolstoy is to see the light this autumn, called "The Slavery of our Times," containing the conclusions which he has reached from a study of modern industrialism. It will be translated by Mr. Aylmer Maude and published by the Free Age Press, which describes itself as existing for the publication of "Tolstoyan and kindred literature," and which has published during this summer some handy little paper-covered volumes at 3d. each, containing some of the smaller "Tolstoyan" works, as "Letters on War," "Thoughts on God," "Religion and Morality," "Letters on the Personal Religious Life," "Some Social Remedies," and the recently written "Patriotism and Government." There is talk, we believe, of a collected English edition of Tolstoy's works. The bibliography of them is certainly not without its difficulties, as is shown by the letter which we have received from Mr. Aylmer Maude, and which appears in another column.

Dickens will figure in Messrs. Dent's autumn publications with "The Holly Tree Inn and the Seven Poor Travellers," containing photogravure and text illustrations, by C. E. Brock. There will also be a farcical comedy in three scenes, entitled "The Gentlemen in the Next House," adapted from "Nicholas Nickleby," by Isabelle M. Pagan. To Dent's "Master Musicians" Series will shortly be added a volume on Mendelssohn, by Stephen S. Stratton. The following volumes are in preparation for the Temple Cyclopædic Primers: "The English Constitution," by the Right Hon. Leonard Courtney; "The Making of English," by Henry Bradley; "Child Life," by W. B. Drummond; "The British Empire," by George R. Parkin; "International Law," by F. S. Smith; and "Education," by Foster Watson. Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford" will be added to "The Temple Classics" next month, and among the other volumes in preparation for the same series are Lamb's "Letters"; Heine's "Buch der Lieder" (in the original); Augustine's "City of God"; Horace's Odes; Coleridge's "Biographia Literaria"; Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living," and Lady Mary W. Montagu's Letters. Dr. Horton's volume on "Alfred Lord Tennyson," in the "Saintly Lives" Series, will be ready shortly, and will be followed by "Alfred the Great," by the Rev. D. Macfadyen. The next addition to the "Mediæval Town" Series will be "Florence," by E. G. Gardner, and volumes on "Constantinople," by W. H. Hutton; "Assisi," by Lina Duff-Gordon; "Prague," by Count Lutzow; "Siena," by R. L. Douglas; "Rome," by Norwood Young; "Mediæval London," by H. B. Wheatley; and "Bruges," by E. G. Smith, are in preparation. Among Messrs. Dent's other publications will be Captain Marryat's "Peter Simple," in the "Illustrated Romances" Series, and the first volume of a new series entitled "The True Annals of Fairyland," edited by William Canton, and illustrated by Charles Robinson. The first volume will be "The Reign of King Herla."

Messrs. Bell have entered into an arrangement with the New York publishing house of Holt and Co., and will in future issue their books over here. The first publication under the new agreement will be Mr. Ernest Henderson's "Sidelights on English History." The same publishers are preparing a series of "Handbooks to Continental Churches," uniform with their English "Cathedral Series." The first volumes on "Chartres," by Mr. H. J. L. J. Massé, and "Rouen," by the Rev. T. Perkins, will be ready this month. The volumes will deal not only with the cathedrals but with the other important churches in each town. In their "Handbooks of the Great Public Schools," the next volume, "Eton," by A. Clutton Brock, will be published in two or three weeks: "Winchester," by R. T. Warner, at the beginning of November, and "Harrow," by J. Fischer Williams, about a month later. To Bell's Standard Library are being added "Gaspary's "History of Italian Literature," translated by Hermann Oelsner (the first volume of which will probably be ready this month), and Gray's Letters, edited by the Rev. D. C. Tovey. A list of Messrs. Bell's other principal announcements appeared in last week's Literature.

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co.'s publications this month will include a new religious tale ("The Cross Triumphant"), by Mrs. Florence Kingsley, whose "Titus," it is said, had a circulation in America as large as Mr. Sheldon's "In His Steps." Other stories for the month will be "The House of Giants," by "Yorick Everett"—a name which is stated to "veil the identity of a famous novelist"—"Three Little Maids," by Ethel Turner, and "A Son of Austerity," by George Knight. The next volume in the New Minerva Library will be Darwin's "Coral Reefs," with a reproduction of the portrait by Collier in the National Gallery and Professor Judd's introductions.

"Reminiscences of Oxford," by the Rev. W. Tuckwell, is one of the chief books announced in Messrs. Cassell's new list. It begins with Oxford in the Thirties, and deals with life at the University for the next twenty years, giving reminiscences, among other men, of Dr. Jowett, Max Müller, Dr. Pusey, Cardinal Newman and Dr. Arnold. Biography is represented in Messrs. Cassell's list by a memoir of Dr. Landels, the Baptist preacher and lecturer, by the Rev. Thomas D. Landels, his son. Dr. John Clifford, who followed him in the presidential chair of the Baptist Union, writes an introduction to it. Two books on military matters are announced, one being a review of the military situation in 1900, by Mr. Arnold-Forster, M.P., entitled "The War Office, the Army and the Empire," and the other being a record of the training college of the R.E.'s and R.A.'s, by Captain Guggisberg, R.E., entitled "'The Shop': The Story of the Royal Military Academy." The Far East is represented by a popular account of the history of China by Mr. Alexis Krausse, under the title of "The Chinese Crisis: Its Causes and Effects." There are several art announcements, including a sketch of the contents of "The Wallace Collection at Hertford House," by Mr. M. H. Spielmann. The Fine Art work on "The National Gallery," edited by the President of the Royal Academy, will be completed by the publication of the third volume, dealing with the British Masters and Modern Schools. In fiction Messrs. Cassell will publish the new novel by Mr. J. M. Barrie, entitled "Tommy and Grizel," which ran serially in Scribner's Magazine; and many reprints of popular tales and new books for boys and girls. The list also announces "Cassell's Cyclopædia of Mechanics," a new work edited by Mr. Paul N. Hasluck, editor of the "Building World" and "Work"; a volume of selections from English verse—mainly intended for dramatic recitation—entitled "The Troubadour," edited and annotated by Mr. Philip Gibbs; and a new series of readers for country schools, written by Arabella Buckley to meet the requirements of the Code of 1900-1. The series is called "Eyes and No Eyes," and gives a succession of lessons on country objects, with illustrations as a special feature of the books.

Mr. Grant Richards has opened his season this week with the Rev. W. J. Dawson's drama "Savonarola"; the first volume of Mr. K. D. Cotes' "Social and Imperial Life of Britain"; Mr. Oswald Crawfurd's novel "The New Order," and a little book on "How to Write for the Magazines," by one who manages to make "£600 a year from it." Later will follow a volume of "Rectorial Addresses: Delivered before the University of Edinburgh, 1859-99," edited, with an introduction, by A. Stodart-Walker; the two volumes previously announced of "Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times, &c," by Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, edited by John M. Robertson; "Three Plays for Puritans," by G. Bernard Shaw; "The Struggle for Success: A Study in Social Compromise, Expediency, and Adaptability," by A. Stodart-Walker; "Ethical Democracy," edited by Stanton Coit; a life of "Jean Paul Marat: The People's Friend," by E. Belfort Bax; "Memoirs of Edward Hare, C.S.I., late Inspector-General of Hospitals, Bengal," by Major Edward Hare; "The Story of Burnt Njal," the late Sir George W. Dasent's translation from the Icelandic of the Njals Saga, with a prefatory note and the introduction abridged from the original edition of 1861; Vol. III. of "Heresies: Or Agnostic Theism, Ethics, Sociology, and Metaphysics," by H. Croft Hiller; "The Confessions of St. Augustine," with an introduction by Alice Meynell (the first number of a "Religious Life Series"); "What is Catholicism?" by Edmond Scherer, with an introduction by Dr. Horton; "Unto You Young Men," by Archdeacon Sinclair; "The Handy Man: and Other Verses," by Harold Begbie, and "Clothes and the Man," by "the Major" of To-Day, a book of masculine modes and manners. About a dozen novels and a number of children's and miscellaneous books complete Mr. Grant Richards' programme for the season.

The first volume of "The Writings of James Madison" (uniform with "The Writings of Jefferson," "Washington," &c.), edited by Gaillard Hunt, will be published by Messrs. Putnam towards the end of the month. There will be six or seven volumes in all. Later the same publishers will issue another volume of essays by Charlotte Perkins Stetson (now Mrs. Gilman) entitled "Concerning Children." Among their other new announcements are a life of "Roger Ludlow, the Colonial Law-Maker (1590-1664)," by John M. Taylor, author of "Maximilian and Carlotta,"; a volume on "Medical and Surgical Nursing," edited by Dr. H. J. O'Brien, Professor of Clinical Surgery at Hamline University; and a new English edition of Dock's "Materia Medica for Nurses," revised in accordance with the British Pharmacopœia. Some new volumes in the "Story of the Nations" Series are "The American Colonies," by Helen Ainslie Smith, a history of the thirteen colonies which now form the United States of America from their foundation to the declaration of Independence, 1625-1783, and "The United States of America" (1783-1900). This will probably be published in two volumes, and is being written by Mr. A. C. McLaughlin, Professor of American History in the University of Michigan.

Messrs. Pearson began their autumn season this week with the record of the Siege of Mafeking ("Besieged with B.-P."), by Mr. J. Emerson Neilly, the Pall Mall Gazette correspondent. Another book to follow very shortly will contain the autobiographies of the youth of the thirty-four celebrities of the day, including the Duke of Argyll, Madame Patti, Mrs. Langtry, Sarah Grand, and many other representatives of Literature, Music, the Stage, and so on. "In the Days of My Youth," as the volume is called, is edited, with an introduction, by T. P. O'Connor, M.P. Messrs. Pearson will bring out on the 19th inst. new novels by F. Frankfort Moore ("Conscience or Coralie") and Paul Cushing ("God's Hand"). In October Messrs. Pearson and Co. will publish an historical tale, by Agnes Giberne, of the great war between England and France in the first decade of this century, entitled "Roy: A Tale in the Days of Sir John Moore."

Messrs. Sands are publishing in England four books by Mr. Charles Garvice, whose work, though little known in this country, is extremely popular in America—viz., "The Outcast of the Family," "The Heart's Desire," "A Coronet of Shame," and "Nance." Messrs. Sands will also publish, besides a few novels, a second series of Military Dialogues by Lieut.-Colonel Newnham-Davis: "The Bystander," by Mr. Ashby-Sterry (mainly from his weekly column in the Graphic); a book on "Billiards for Beginners," by John Roberts, and a little series of handbooks of games by R. F. Foster, dealing with "Dice," "Poker," and "Chess."

Mr. John Long starts his new autumn novels on the 15th inst. His list includes "The Realization of Justus Moran," by Frederick Carrel, who wrote "The Progress of Pauline Kessler"; "The Way Out," by G. B. Burgin; "I'd Crowns Resign," by J. MacLaren Cobban; "Men of Marlowe's," by Mrs. Henry Dudeney; "Yolande the Parisienne," by Lucas Cleeve (Mrs. Howard Kingscote); "The Strength of Straw," by Esme Stuart; "The Ivory Bride," by Thomas Pinkerton; "The Luck of a Lowland Laddie," by May Crommelin; "A Tenner in London," by Fergus Hume; "Jean Keir of Craigneil," by Sarah Tytler; and "Straight Shoes," by G. G. Chatterton. In miscellaneous literature Mr. Long will publish "Happiness: Its Pursuit and Attainment," by the Rev. W. J. Kelly, and "Glimpses from Wonderland," by John Ingold.

Messrs. Hodder Marshall and Son will shortly publish a "Life of Samuel Richardson," the novelist, by Miss Clara Linklater Thomson. It will utilize the unpublished correspondence of Richardson in the Forster Library at the South Kensington Museum. There has been no complete life of Richardson since that of Mrs. Barbauld, published in 1804.

The Jurors of the Paris Exhibition have awarded a Grand Prix to the Collective Exhibit of Books organized by the Publishers' Association, with the assistance of Sir E. Maunde Thompson, K.C.B., and Mr. F. Macmillan, for the Liberal Arts Sub-Committee of the Royal British Commission.

The Sanitary Publishing Company, Ltd., announce as ready shortly "Essays on Consumption," by Dr. J. Edward Squire, physician to the North London Hospital for Consumptives. An introduction is contributed by Sir William Broadbent.

The price of Miss Annabel Gray's new book "The Mystic Number Seven" should be 3s. 6d., not 6s. as stated in our review on August 25th.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The impression gains ground that Lord Monkswell's Copyright Bill will really be passed into law next Session; and it must be very gratifying to the members of the Society of Authors to know that the firm but reasonable attitude of the Society on the question of Canadian Copyright has largely contributed to bringing general copyright legislation within the range of practical politics.

* * * *

It is now a long time since the Society of Authors grasped the fact that the Canadian difficulty was really the key to the whole position. So long as copyright legislation threatened to make trouble between Canada and the Colonial Office, Governments were naturally very shy of touching it; and so long as Canada wanted to be empowered to override Imperial Acts, and to refuse protection to authors who did not print in Canada, the clash of interests made trouble unavoidable. It was necessary, therefore, to educate Canadian opinion, and the Society of Authors set itself this task, and even went so far as to despatch ambassadors to Canada for that purpose. Mr. Hall Caine undertook a mission as long ago as 1895, but the compromise which he favoured—the "H. C. Compromise," as it has sometimes been called—conceded a good deal more than the Society intended to concede. The question entered on a fresh phase with the death of Sir John Thompson—the great friend of the Canadian printers—and the accession to power of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Other negotiations were opened by Mr. Gilbert Parker and the Society's secretary, with satisfactory results.

* * * *

Roughly speaking, the change that has come over Canadian opinion is this. A little while ago the Canadian publishers wanted to be free to "pirate" any author who did not obtain the protection of the Canadian law by producing a Canadian edition of his books, printed in Canadian territory. Now they are satisfied with a law which will enable any publisher to contract with any author for the exclusive right of publication, in Canada, of any work, and will protect him against the competition of copies printed elsewhere. Nothing could be more reasonable; and this is the arrangement embodied in Lord Monkswell's Bill, which also includes many other copyright reforms for which we might have had to wait a long time if the difference with our Canadian cousins had not been composed.

The original intention was to close the Ruskin exhibition at Coniston last Saturday; fortunately, however, for those who during the past few days have been in the Lake country, it was afterwards determined to postpone the closing until to-day. Between seven and eight thousand persons have visited the exhibition, we understand, and the sixpenny catalogue—applied for by many who could not themselves fare to Coniston—has gone into three editions. The receipts should bring into the range of the practical the formation of a permanent Ruskin museum at Coniston, towards which many objects have already been given. In one of the cases there was on view a punning letter "To Papa, on his birthday, May 10, 1831. From his affectionate son, J. R." It begins:—

> Sadness with me is quite a rara avis,
> My disposition is not that way bent,
> For with me even to be grave is gravis,
> Which gravies want some solace of merriment—

a not unpleasant reminiscence of the boyhood of Ruskin the sage.

At the meeting of the Institute of Journalists our old friend the New Journalism was roughly handled by Sir James Henderson. Are not these attacks on the New Journalism being a little overdone? Those who have studied newspaper history know—what some of those who talk about it do not seem to know—that almost all its alleged faults existed in a much worse form in the older journalism. The trivial personalities of "social diaries" can easily be paralleled from the early numbers of the European Magazine. No contemporary society paper would dare to say such things as the society papers of the beginning of the century said about Mr. Coutts, the banker, and the actress whom he married. No contemporary comic paper would dare to print such coarse jokes as disfigured the comic papers before Punch. Even reviewing is more courteous nowadays than in the days of our rude forefathers. The new journalism, like all other human creations, has its faults; but, on the whole, we have moved forward, and not backward, since the days of Colonel Sheridan and of the Eatanswill Gazette.

It is curious at this time of day to find the writer of a letter in the Spectator being allowed to revive, without comment, the old legend about an original French version of Wolfe's elegy on "The Burial of Sir John Moore." This writer says it "is not an original composition of the Rev. Mr. Wolfe's, but a very happy and spirited translation from the French of, I think, an unknown writer of lines descriptive of the hasty burial of Colonel de Beaumanoir, killed in the defence of Pondicherry when it was taken by the British under Sir Eyre Coote." As a matter of fact, the writer of the French version is by no means unknown. That version is the work of the ingenious Francis Mahony, commonly called Father Prout. Mahony had an extraordinary aptitude for verse translation, and his French rendering of Wolfe's poem appeared in the first number of Bentley's Miscellany in 1837. He had previously played a similar jest on Tom Moore, translating some of his verses into Latin or French and then charging him with plagiarism. In the case of Wolfe's elegy, in order to add a touch of personal interest to his version, "Father Prout" invented a mythical Colonel de Beaumanoir, and killed and buried him at Pondicherry. Thus he set going the legend of the original French version "Les Funérailles de Beaumanoir," which a scholar like M. Octave Delepierre accepted without question in his book on Parodies, but which has been scotched and killed more than once. A writer in Notes and Queries, by the way, has recently been pleading for a standard text of Wolfe's Poem. On points of punctuation and spelling editors have been very irregular; and sometimes they vary on points more important, as the following alternative versions show:—

But half our heavy task was done
When the clock { struck / told } the hour for retiring:
And we heard the distant random gun
{ Of the enemy / That the foe was } sullenly firing.

The version in Archdeacon Russell's "Remains" of Wolfe could, we suppose, be taken as the canonical text.

Professor Rhys, it may be presumed, has been giving at the British Association some foretaste of his forthcoming work on "Celtic Folk-lore: Welsh and Manx," which is among the announcements of the Clarendon Press. The folk-lore of Wales is a field that has been very insufficiently cultivated by comparison with many of its Celtic and Teutonic neighbours, and Professor Rhys is essentially the man to make good the deficiency by completing the excellent work he has already done in this field. One good work that Professor Rhys is doing is to remind the good easy souls who are fond of talking of the characteristics of the pure Celt how mixed a breed the pure Celt is. His theory (based at least on an unusual acquaintance with Celtic history, legend, and language) is that both waves of Celtic immigration, the Goidelic and Brythonic, were to a great extent absorbed (as proved by the non-Aryan syntax of the languages) by the races already inhabiting the country. Of these Professor Rhys distinguishes the early cave-dwellers and the tall, fair race that conquered them, the history of these earlier races being the source of the fairy legend and folk-lore of the Celts.

It has often been said that the penny dreadful is responsible for the youthful criminal, and now the attempt has been made to make Madame Sarah Grand responsible for the misdemeanour of a young lady who was found wandering about London in the attire of a boy. It comes, said the young lady's father, of reading books like "The Heavenly Twins." Angela, in that novel certainly did something of the sort, but it does not follow that Madame Grand is any more to be blamed in this particular instance than Harrison Ainsworth is to be blamed for the eccentricities of the man who was discovered, the other day, doing the Solomon Eagle business on account of the outbreak of the plague at Glasgow. Whether the wearing of "rational dress" is an integral part of Madame Grand's philosophy of life is, indeed, doubtful—the inevitable result of expounding philosophy in the guise of fiction. We know exactly why, in what circumstances, and to what extent Mr. Herbert Spencer considers that top hats and dress [illegible] are incompatible with the higher life; but Madame Grand's views on the division of skirts can only be inferred, and are apt, as the case before us shows, to be inferred erroneously.

A correspondent writes:—A propos of the recent note in Literature on the subject of the Daly Catalogue, I suggest that the interest of the accompanying price list would have been much enhanced by the addition of the names of the purchasers of at least the more important items. With reference to the shortcomings of the catalogue, I am in a position to state (on the authority of some of the buyers) that a good many valuable items were unrecognized, or ignored, in the cataloguing, and consequently were practically given away at the sale. As an instance I may mention that a copy of J. Westland Marston's tragedy "The Patrician's Daughter" is entered as having "the MS. Prologue inserted"; no hint is given that this is in Dickens' autograph, and the result was that it changed hands for the miserable sum of ten dollars (£2). Writing to Macready (who recited the Prologue when the play was produced at Drury-lane in 1842), Dickens said:—"The more I think of Marston's play, the more I feel that a prologue to the purpose would help it materially, and almost decide the fate of any ticklish point on the first night. Now I have an idea (not easily explainable in writing, but told in five words) that would take the prologue out of the conventional dress of prologues quite. Get the curtain up with a dash, and begin the play with a sledge-hammer blow. If, on consideration, you should agree with me, I will write the prologue heartily."

Father Clarke had done good work for the education of Roman Catholics as the Principal of Clarke's Hall, at Oxford; and Roman Catholics will probably admit that it was work that badly needed to be done, and still needs to be extended. In spite of the popular belief that the Jesuits are great educators the fact remains that, both here and abroad, they produce no very great results. Even in professedly Roman Catholic countries the best contributions to scholarship and science are rarely the work of Roman Catholics; and the few notable exceptions that come to mind are mainly furnished by men who have joined the Roman Church after their education was finished. The reason has been that the principal seats of learning are "lay" institutions, which Roman Catholics avoid. The foundation of Clarke's Hall, giving Roman Catholics the opportunity of getting a sound education without exposing themselves to the untempered winds of theological criticism, was a step in the right direction; and Father Clarke was the man to guide it to success. He was a convert to Rome. He had rowed in the Oxford boat, and been a Fellow and Tutor of St. John's.

India loses an eminent journalist by the death of Mr. Grattan Geary. He was the editor and proprietor of the Bombay Gazette, and had previously edited the Times of India. He was also the author of a book of travel, "Through Asiatic Turkey: A Narrative of a Journey from Bombay to the Bosphorus," published in 1878.

Mr. John Sands, who has died at Dunnichen, Forfarshire, was the author of a very interesting work on St. Kilda and its Islanders. Among his other books the best known is a volume entitled "King James's Wedding, and other Rhymes." Life on the islands to the west and north of Scotland had a strange fascination for Mr. Sands, and he took a strong personal interest in the crofters and fishermen. He was the inventor of the method of communication between St. Kilda and the mainland which is known as "the St. Kilda Post."

One of the most delicate of the young poets of France has passed away recently in Albert Samain. Born in 1859, he was, with Alfred Valette, Louis Denise, Louis Dumur, and others, one of the founders of the Mercure de France. Less eccentric than some of his associates of the "symbolist" school, he remained loyal to the sonorous rhyme of traditional French verse. But he also introduced the muse of French poetic utterance into quiet and less known byways. Not since the précieux of the seventeenth century had French poets been so tender and subtle as Samain in such lines as these, which are like a sonnet of Keats:—

La vie est une fleur que je respire à peine,
Car tout parfum terrestre est douloureux au fond.
J'ignore l'heure vaine, et les hommes qui vont,
Et dans l'Ile d'Email ma fantaisie est reine.

Mes bonheurs délicats sont faits de porcelaine,
Je n'y touche jamais qu'avec un soin profond ;
Et l'azur fin qu'exhale en fumant mon thé blond
En sa fuite odorante emporte au loin ma peine.

J'habite un kiosque rose au fond du merveilleux,
J'y passe tout le jour à voir de ma fenêtre
Les fleuves d'or parmi les paysages bleus ;

Et, poète royal en robe vermillon,
Autour de l'éventail fleuri qui l'a fait naître
Je regarde voler mon rêve, papillon.

Albert Samain leaves two volumes—"Le Jardin de l'Infante" and "Au Flanc du Vase," and materials for a third, the "Chariot d'Or," which the Mercure de France will undoubtedly publish. A one-act play in verse, Polyphème, is also completed.

Mr. F. G. Kitton writes:—In many of the obituary notices of the late Sir John Lawes it is asserted that Dickens composed the verses on "The Blacksmith," which appeared in the first number of All the Year Round—a statement obviously based upon Forster, who, quoting a letter received by him from Sir John when preparing his biography of the Novelist, observes that the aforesaid verses were composed by Dickens and repeated to Sir John while he (Dickens) was walking about the Rothamsted Estate during his visit in 1859. I venture to warn future bibliographers, however, that there is good authority for declaring that the actual author was Dickens' friend, B. W. Procter ("Barry Cornwall"), who anonymously contributed to the same journal several poetical compositions of a like character. Evidence of this is afforded by an "office" set of All the Year Round, in which the name of the author has been officially appended (in manuscript) to each article, &c., which I imagine was done at the time of publication. The venerable baronet's memory must, therefore, have played him false in this particular instance.

M. Octave Uzanne, happening during his holidays in the Normandy country to find himself in the neighbourhood of the little hamlet of Gruchet-Saint Simeon, made a pilgrimage to the quiet home where M. Maurice Maeterlinck has taken refuge. His description of the retreat of the author of "The Treasure of the Humble" is characteristic:—

Am I really in France? At the end of the avenue . . . I behold a simple bright, attractive, building, with a Directory air, much the sort of house, if I remember well, which I saw near Breskens above Bruges, and even in the neighbourhood of the canals of Middlebourg, in that incomparable Walcheren, which is like a miniature Dutch province, with a Japanese physiognomy. Here, in a wall which has the tones of butter, white windows are set in shutters painted a lively green, the Flemish green, gay, intense, like the green of a plate of spinach, that has not been chopped. The imposts of the windows are lined with red, and the whole is for the eye like the joy of a polychrome song. All about, meadows and orchards. In front a little garden, behind a white circular gate, and full of pretty simple plants, like a country curate's garden. . . . Within, the house is of a holy simplicity, so rich in intentional harmonies that you might believe a Ruskin or William Morris had passed that way. Yet there is nothing but white woodwork without pictures or other accessories. . . . In the study of the writer of "Wisdom and Destiny," I see on the table and among the books, a flight of friendly bees who do not appear to be disturbed by our approach. A dozen or more are quenching their thirst about a little lake of honey which appears to have been intentionally poured on the carpet. Maurice Maeterlinck tells me of his taste for apiculture. Even in childhood he was interested in his father's beehives, and he knows the habits of all the different bee tribes. He is now finishing a long chapter on "The Life of Bees," which will form the third part of his next book, the title of which, still uncertain, may possibly be, he confesses, "The Double Garden," in this sense, that he will cultivate there in turns the favourite garden plots of his science and his literature.

Publishers' Readers.

We naturally have no intention of bearing a hand in the dispute which has broken out between the author of "The Christian" and the authoress of "The Master Christian" in the halfpenny morning papers. The personalities in which the latter has thought right to indulge have as little interest for literary people as her announcement that she does not read her opponent's works "on principle." Principles should be capable of definition; and this particular principle seems to be as nebulous as the principle on which some people refuse to begin fires, whatever the weather may be, before November. What is interesting, however—and even important—is the light which the controversy throws upon the perils which beset the profession of publisher's reader. It appears—or, at all events, it is stated—that, in the days when both these writers were obscure, one, in the capacity of literary adviser to Messrs. Bentley, recommended those publishers to have nothing to do with the other, and consequently incurred her undying antipathy. The reason certainly does not seem to us sufficient to explain the rancour; and one is glad to know that rancour does not always result in such a case. Mr. James Payn, in his entertaining reminiscences, confesses that he was responsible for the rejection by a great house of "John Inglesant"—which afterwards had an enormous sale, and earned its author a great reputation. It had bored him in manuscript, and he erroneously concluded that, in print, it would bore the community at large. The interesting part of the story lies in the fact that it never entered his mind that the author would bear him any malice, or would be more likely to denounce him in print than to lie in wait for him with a cudgel. His one painful reflection was that he had lost his publishers a "good thing," and his relief was great when the head of the firm assured him that he, too, considered the book in question very dull, and its success a thing which no man could be expected to foresee. And that, of course, is the line which any publisher's reader ought to be able to take without any fear of injury from men with big sticks or ladies with sharp tongues. He is not a critic in the usual sense of the word, and his duty is not to the author but to his employers. He is merely—or, at least, mainly—called upon to answer the question, "Is there or is there not the promise of success in this book?" Even when work appeals to him he must harden his heart against it, if he fears that it will only be appreciated by the few. And he must also be prepared, in other cases, to report:—"This is sad rubbish, but it is what the public want." But the quarrel before us shows how important it is that these reports should be regarded by publishers as absolutely confidential. Mr. George Bentley, it seems, revealed the name of his reader to the writer of the book read. Even if he had not told her she would probably have had no great difficulty in finding out. It is, in fact, a great deal easier than it ought to be to ascertain such things; and as some women are as sensitive to criticisms of their books as other women are to criticisms of their personal appearance, much greater secrecy ought to be observed. One is almost tempted to suggest that authors, like the competitors for prize poems, should be required to enclose their papers of identification in sealed envelopes to be opened only after the reader had sat in judgment on their works. Even if this proposal is impracticable, all possible discretion should be exercised in order to avoid setting men and women of letters by the ears.

Personal Views.

TRANSLATIONS.

Has the art of translating ever been estimated at its proper value, in spite of everything that has been said and done in its favour?

There is no doubt that an important section of the public takes a very keen interest in the literatures of foreign countries, and as there are after all very few people capable of reading a work in the original, recourse must necessarily be had to translations. How and by whom are these translations made? This is a question to which nobody pays any attention. It is generally imagined that translating is a kind of hack work which demands no special literary qualities, a task necessarily inferior, to be performed hastily and painfully. The translator himself, despised and ill-paid, is largely responsible for the existence of this deplorable idea in the mind of the reader; he has a distinct tendency to minimize the value of his work; he does not realize that he ought to be, as Goethe has said, the interpreter of the nations, and that he plays a rôle of extreme dignity and importance in spite of the fact that a certain measure of inaccuracy is inherent to all translations.

There is hardly any important English work which has not been translated into French. In the eighteenth century the number of translations from the English was enormous. The influence of Voltaire, above all, contributed powerfully to the translation of many English works into French. In the preface to the first edition of the French version of the "Travels of Captain Lemuel Gulliver," the Abbé des Fontaines invokes the authority of Voltaire as a plausible excuse for his undertaking. But the translators of this epoch were content with a purely relative fidelity, and their theory of the art of translation was more than questionable. In this connexion, it is interesting to read, together with the preface already mentioned, the letter which the Abbé des Fontaines wrote to Swift when sending him a copy of the second edition of "Gulliver's Travels," and also the admirable letter which Swift wrote him in reply. (The works of Jonathan Swift, D.D., edited by Sir Walter Scott, Bart., Second Edition, Vol. XVII., p. 125.) The poor abbé, so roughly handled by the Dean of St. Patrick's, expresses, nevertheless, the current ideas of his time on the art of translation. According to him, the translator is at liberty to rearrange, excise, make additions, without scruple:—"Au reste," he says, "je me suis figuré que j'étais capable de suppléer à ces défauts et de réparer ces pertes par le secours de mon imagination. . . ." Further on he observes:—". . . Je proteste que si j'eusse trouvé dans mon auteur des traits piquants dont l'allusion m'eut paru marquée et naturelle et dont j'eusse senti le rapport injurieux à quelque personne de ce pays-ci, je les aurais supprimés sans balancer comme j'ai retranché tout ce qui m'a paru grossier et indécent." And he refers to his translation as "un ouvrage ingrat qui ne flatte point la vanité et qui n'en peut jamais inspirer qu'à un esprit extrêmement faible et superficiel." It is in accordance with these principles that the majority of the best English authors of the eighteenth century were translated. A faithful translation is impossible, nay, it was severely condemned, and the Abbé des Fontaines, writing on the subject of a rival version which was said to be on the point of publication, says:—"Si elle est littérale et si elle est faite par quelque traducteur ordinaire de ce pays-là (the Hague, Holland), je prononce sans l'avoir vue qu'elle est fort mauvaise et je suis bien sûr que quand elle paraîtra je ne serai ni démenti, ni détrompé." Similarly, the famous Abbé Prévost translated Richardson's novels, Targe translated Smollett, Laplace gave a version of Tom Jones, and eight volumes of the "Théâtre Anglois" (translating among other things "Love's Last Shift" by "La Dernière Chemise de l'Amour"); in a word, all the English authors of the time were completely disfigured and travestied.

In the first half of this century the translator renounced the privilege of adapting the original work to the taste of the French public, and he made strenuous efforts to reproduce his author faithfully, although his love of "fine writing" often led him to take unwarrantable liberties with the text of the original. Defauconpret translated Walter Scott, Amédée Pichot translated Byron, Henri Blaze translated Goethe. Later on Emile Montégut and François Victor Hugo translated Shakespeare. The influence of the new historical method was already beginning to make itself felt. There was a distinct tendency to render accurately and faithfully the different aspects of a work without paying any attention to the prejudices and susceptibilities of the public. But at this moment the literary output began to increase in enormous proportions. People wanted to know, and know quickly—there was so much to learn. What then was the use of laying too much stress on scholarly accuracy and fidelity? It occurred to a well-known publisher that there was "money" in French translations from the "English." The competence of the translator was a matter of no moment to him. His only ambition was to pay as little as possible. The result was that the market was flooded with a mass of inferior translations. Then, in the same collection, appeared "pêle-mêle" Jane Austen and Miss Braddon, Dickens and Mayne Reid, the Brontës and Miss Cummins, Bulwer Lytton and Thackeray, Mrs. Wood and Mrs. Gaskell. No discretion was exercised in the choice of authors, no attention was paid to the manner in which the works were rendered. In spite of this, the public bought these deplorable translations by thousands and the success of the enterprise seemed to justify the publisher.

Nevertheless, the French public tired of translations. For several years it seemed to prefer its own authors—the Goncourts, Zola, Daudet, Maupassant. The trade of the translator languished. A few isolated volumes were issued by different publishers, but they met with no success.

It is of the utmost importance that the general reader who takes an interest in English literature should be able to find the works of his favourite author or authors in the same collection. The writer of this article has had considerable experience in the matter and has often had occasion to notice how necessary it is for a foreign author to have his works published in one uniform collection. But how few have realized that necessity. Usually, the author, whether from indifference or because he is over sensible to flattery, gives the right of translating his works into French to the first comer without even inquiring whether his translator is a competent and properly qualified person.

Now, one cannot too earnestly warn the English author against the horde of translators who offer to disfigure and mutilate him at pleasure. One has not always the good fortune to meet with a Baudelaire who will turn out a translation more rich and magnificent than the original. The would-be translator almost always writes in French for permission to translate, whereas certainly the most elementary prudence demands that he should write in English in order to show the author, the victim elect, that he can, at least, express himself in that tongue. Sometimes the author grants the required permission by letter or, failing this, he refers the translator to his literary agent, and the latter, without further formalities, hastens to demand sums of money which the hapless wight is incapable of paying. Meanwhile, the work itself suffers and no one troubles about the fate reserved for it. The translator has a vague smattering of English, having studied it more or less at school; with the help of the dictionary he will turn out laborious absurdities, and the result will be an unspeakable translation written in a jargon which has nothing French about it but the spelling. The bulk of these would-be translators, old maids, professors' widows, literary failures, journalists, do not know the language which they affect to translate, and they are equally ignorant of their own. Little reck they of the proprieties and delicacies of the language, of which Dryden speaks—"To know them requires not only learning but experience of life and good society. . . It appears necessary that a man should be a nice critic in his mother tongue before he attempts to translate a foreign language. Neither is it sufficient that he be able to judge of words and style, but he must be a master of them too: he must perfectly understand his author's tongue and absolutely command his own." These antiquated sentiments almost provoke a smile. It would be so easy to show the English authors how they have been ruined in French. Thomas Hardy is completely distorted, whereas he, of all men, requires intelligent translators, men with sufficient enterprise to visit his beloved Wessex, the intimate and characteristic background of his works. Stevenson has been wretchedly done; his translated works, almost unreadable in French, are scattered among all the publishers of Paris, and the result is that Stevenson is totally unknown to the reading public, whereas he ought to be one of its favourites. There is no necessity to found a Society for the Protection of Foreign Authors, since it would be so easy to undertake the task themselves. All they have to do is to make serious inquiries into the competence of those who propose to subject them to the dangerous test of translations, and to obtain guarantees that their work, which they have taken the trouble to write in good English, shall be rendered into good French, that their thought and their style shall be reproduced as exactly and faithfully as the tongue into which it is to be translated will allow. The painter does not have his picture engraved by a whitewasher, the sculptor does not have his statue cast by a stone-cutter, and we do not have our watches mended by a blacksmith.

HENRY D. DAVRAY.

"READING MATTER."

Once upon a time—it is not really so very long ago—the popular magazines, as they understood popularity in those days, were "repositories," as the good old term was, of literature, and were edited by men of letters. Nowadays they are edited by men of business, and are repositories of what is known to those men of business indifferently as "stuff" and "reading matter." It is a literary development hardly less important in its way than the transition from classicism to romanticism or from romanticism to realism; and the irony of it lies in the fact that it is due in part to the spread of education and in part to the progress of the arts. The schoolmaster went among the masses and taught them how to read, often without raising the general level of their intelligence much more than he might have raised it by teaching them to stand on their heads or to walk on the tight-rope. The men of science discovered a cheap and easy process of reproducing photographs. When these two things happened the hour had come; and when the hour came the man came also. He was nobody in particular, but he had an idea that was worth a good deal more than the proverbial five hundred thousand francs. Like another philosopher, he asked himself:—"What, in the name of the Bodleian, has the general public to do with literature?" But he went a step further than that philosopher and realized that, though the general public had nothing to do with literature, it might be persuaded to have a good deal to do with reading matter—especially if the reading matter were accompanied by pictures. He gave the public what it wanted—a penny weekly paper in which absolutely useless information jostled absolutely obvious jokes about landladies and mothers-in-law, and a sixpenny magazine which the most illiterate could understand—and his reward was not slow in coming to him. He prospered and still prospers as the founder of an ingenious new industry deserves.

These remarks are suggested by a manual entitled "How to Write for the Magazines" (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.) by a writer who professes to make "£600 a year from it." We do not know which to admire more: the light-hearted, business-like Philistinism of this philosopher, or his ingenuity, while dispensing a good deal of useful information, in keeping other information, no less useful, up his capacious sleeve. His hints on such matters as the folding of MSS. and the procuring of photographs are admirable; his advice to young authors to write not what they want to write but what the public wants to read is sound, and no one can say that it is not required: the stories in which he relates how he has himself driven celebrities into consenting to be interviewed are as instructive in their way as the parable of the importunate widow. Where he fails, if at all—and we rather suspect that the failure is deliberate—is in indicating the great principles which underlie and inform the public taste and curiosity, and in pointing out the exceedingly simple means by which material for the gratification of that taste and curiosity can be got together. The broad rule is, we take it, that the magazine public is indifferent to the great events that shake the world, but likes to hear about everything that is odd, and curious, and out of the way. Concerning a great thinker, for example, it does not want to know what he thinks, but what he drinks, and whether he drinks it with his meals or whenever he happens to be thirsty. A discussion of the policy of a statesman would leave it cold, but a list, with photographs, of statesmen who wear eye-glasses would arouse its respectful interest. And it likes its curiosities grouped under some general heading. "Remarkable Monuments," "Wonderful Waterworks," "Famous Drinking Cups" are titles which indicate one group of articles always sure of a market, though it takes some time and trouble to collect the necessary photographs. Groups of celebrities preferably contemporary celebrities such as "Eminent War Correspondents," "Actresses' Mothers," "Infant Prodigies" are also welcomed by editors: and a polite and insidious letter-writer can generally get his work done for him by the celebrities themselves. We know some magazine-writers, indeed, who send out printed forms, something like census papers, which they request the celebrities to fill up for them. But the simplest of all magazine articles are those which are written round "faked" or mutilated photographs, whether of persons or of places. You can tickle your readers' palates, for instance, by showing them what St. Paul's Cathedral would look like if it were rebuilt in Rosherville Gardens, or what would be the effect of transporting the Pyramids from Cairo to Primrose Hill. Or you can cut full-length photographs in half and illustrate "the Legs of the Bishops," as a certain popular monthly lately did. The letterpress, in the latter case, is easily composed: all that is necessary being to criticize the legs and consider how far they helped the owner in climbing the ladder of preferment.

It is usual to speak contemptuously of this sort of thing; we may even, at one time or another, have spoken contemptuously of it ourselves. But, with this manual in front of us, we are disposed to chant a palinode. For the author introduces himself to us not as a literary man, but as a manufacturer of "stuff"—not as an artist, but as a craftsman. He does not pretend that it is more dignified to turn out reading matter than to make boots and shoes. He merely shows us how to do it according to the rules, and points out that there is money in it. And why not? Surely the world needs reading matter as well as literature, and there is no more reason why everything that is printed should be a work of art than there is any reason why every man should always talk like a book. The statement has been published that Mr. Kipling regularly buys Answers, a certain well-known weekly, because "there are times when a fellow doesn't want to think," and most of us occasionally feel and act as he does. Just as there are times when we can enjoy bread and cheese and beer better than any of Joseph's most sublime culinary creations, so there are times when the most intellectual of us would rather examine even the gaiters of the Bishops than study their contributions to biblical criticism. Let us be duly grateful, therefore, to those who give us the opportunity of thus unbending. So long as they do not pose as men of letters they are doing us no injury; and we gather from "How to Write for the Magazines" that those of them, at all events, who succeed in life are no more guilty of such arrogance than are the compilers of wine merchants' circulars, and of the prospectuses of public companies.

THE ROMANCE OF THE ROSE.

When Socrates was lying in prison under sentence of death he called to mind an oracle which had given direction to all the energies of his mature life—an oracle which had bidden him pursue as his vocation the art of poetry—τὴν μουσικήν. Convinced of the supreme excellence of "divine philosophy," he had regarded the oracle as an exhortation to follow out his philosophic ambitions. For he believed that philosophy was the finest and most essential poetry. But as the end of his life faced him, he began to consider the possibility of misapprehension. Suppose the oracle should have borne its literal sense after all! With quiet and characteristic humour he set himself in those last few days to render a literal obedience by turning some of the Fables of Æsop into verse, an exercise about as easy and graceful to his seventy years as the gymnastics of an Egyptian tumbler. There are few men who have not, at some time in their lives, experienced the same return upon one's self, but scarcely with the sanguine urbanity of Socrates. Even so the romantic poetry of France, as it drew near its destined close, began to be affected with doubts whether it had not mistaken its mission.

The poetry of France had drawn its inspiration from the light-hearted casuistry of the Courts of Love. Reared in an environment of leisure and irresponsible luxury, Poetry had lent itself to all the quaint conceits and fantasies of chivalrous and artificial passion. As it found itself likely to die of sheer old age and inanition, anxious self-questionings began to make themselves felt. Perhaps the Love which had engrossed its whole attention was not the Love which is the true inspiration. So the dying poetry of the troubadours made a return in its last moments, and, with a self-mocking humour, began to hymn quite a different order of emotions under the disguise of Love.

It is in one of the most famous of mediæval poems—a work which, in spite of subsequent centuries of neglect, exerted a universal influence on the mediæval mind and became the most valuable document of mediæval humanity—that this return has been made. The "Romance of the Rose," a translation of which has, as we mention elsewhere, just appeared in the "Temple Classics" Series, was begun by a young poet who was steeped in the traditions of the troubadours. The history of Guillaume de Lorris is a mere lacuna, but there is no reason to doubt his description of himself as a young man of twenty-five. His poem has all the characteristics of youth; delight in beauty posing as passion, voluptuous reverie mistaken for melancholy, self-absorption passing for obsession. The "Romance" is the relation, converted into a story by the simplest process of allegory, of the incidents of a courtship which seems to have had nothing unusual about it. It is modelled on the refined and subtly superficial discussions of the Courts of Love. The psychology of the passion is developed as it would be in a circle of indolent knights and ladies, gathered in one of the sunny castle gardens of old France. The whole setting is voluptuously aristocratic—lawns smooth and bright as emerald, arbours of holly and holm and hornbeam, groves of "graceful birch with silvery bark," shimmering aspen, maple, ash, hazel, dark olive and squirrel-haunted beech, shaded pathways of "bruised mint and fennel savouring sweet," and from this delicious seclusion—

> Rondelettes burst forth amain
> To merry tunes of old Lorraine.

The dark outer world of lowering wastes, wild-eyed and beast-like Jacquerie, squalid ruelles of plague-stricken Paris, does not penetrate with the suspicion of a sigh. There is a conclusion—surely a spurious conclusion—to the first part of the "Romance," which makes the Lover happy with his Love.

The Rose was never plucked by Lorris. Like the Adrienne of Gérard de Nerval she withered in a convent, or was worn by a bolder lover. But Guillaume de Lorris was of those whom the gods love. Forty years after, the dead poet's work was taken up by a writer of very different calibre and temperament—a Jean of Meun, on the Loire, who was called Clopinel, because of some deformity. This clerk, deeply read in all the learning of his time, thoroughly bourgeois in his contempt alike for chivalrous fantasies and ascetic dreams, with an added bitterness of humour springing out of the consciousness of physical deformity, was to give utterance in caustic self-mockery to the death-bed repentance of Romantic Love. He dissects the passion with the ruthless precision of a man who is incapable of feeling or at least of enjoying it. The mere sexual appetite he would treat as any other appetite, neither to be glorified nor suppressed. The glamour which troubadours would throw about it is only the figment of indolence and luxury. True Love is but friendship under another name, whether of man for man, or man for woman.

A new spirit had entered into the Middle Ages, which is exemplified in many other matters besides this of Love. It was a secular, bourgeois, almost Philistine spirit, protesting with many a gibe and flout against the monastic ideals, but equally unsympathetic to the thoughts and motives that worked in the Reformation, through Luther, Calvin, or Knox. It derived much of its inspiration and sustenance from the worldly wisdom of men like Horace. Jean de Meun is the intellectual progenitor of Chaucer, Erasmus, and Montaigne.

But there was also the new leaven of another spirit at work. It is very conspicuous in the sympathies of such a passage as this:—

> Light-heart and gay
> Goes many a beggar by the way,
> But little heeding though his back
> Be bent beneath a charcoal sack.
> They labour patiently and sing,
> And dance, and laugh at whatso thing
> Befalls; for havings care they nought,
> But feed on scraps and chitlings bought
> Beside St. Marcel's, and dispend
> Their gains for wassail, then, straight wend
> Once more to work, not grumblingly,
> But light of heart as bird on tree,
> Winning their bread without desire
> To fleece their neighbours.

Villon and Rousseau, perhaps even the French Revolution, are latent in this halting, cynical, loveless clerk of Meun.

Now that the "Romance" has been rendered into English—for the first time since Chaucer—it is to be hoped that others besides the professional student will make acquaintance with this invaluable document of medievalism. Mr. Ellis is to be congratulated on the manner in which he has performed his task. We shall await with interest the completion of the work.

"THE NEEDLE'S EXCELLENCY."

In the year 1640 a little oblong folio, some 8in. by 5½in., showing the richest and clearest copper-plate designs for point lace and embroideries, was so popular among early Stuart ladies that it had reached its twelfth edition. John Taylor, the Water Poet (1580-1651), was the lucky producer of the book; he prefaced the patterns by three or four pages of descriptive verse and a few sonnets (more suo); his employer was James Bater, who sold "at the Signe of the Marigold, in Paules Churchyard"; the title of the little work was "The Needle's Excellency," and it was stated to be "inlarged with diuers newe workes as needle workes purles and others neuer before printed."

It is a fascinating relic; and it has a fascinating frontispiece, whatever the eleven preceding editions may have had. A fair orderly garden is shown in it, with an abundance of neat flower-beds and neat paths for its perspective, and with its foreground occupied by three ladies. One, who is grave and who is labelled "Wisdome," stands with a book between her fingers; the centre one sits on a low stool at needlework, comfortably tall-hatted and caped, her work-box on her knees, and her label setting her out as "Industrie"; the third, all liveliness and frolic, named "Follie," holds up her hands in amused amaze at the others' occupations. Looking at the group, in their Tudor-Stuart costumes, they seem a vivid representation of the opening of Scene 3 in Act I. of Coriolanus, where Valeria enters upon the other two Roman ladies crying,

> What! Are you sewing here! . . . Come, lay aside your stitchery! I must have you play the idle huswife with me this afternoon! . . . You would be another Penelope! . . . I would your cambrick were as sensible as your finger that you might leave pricking it for pity!

Valeria, Virgilia, Volumnia were to all intents and purposes Tudor-Stuart ladies, although they figure as Romans. John Taylor spoke of what he saw under his own eyes. Shakespeare saw the same; and Shakespeare had it in his mind when he wrote what has been quoted, when he made Hamlet stride in to Ophelia "as she was sewing in her closet," when he made Baptista bid Katharine "Go! Ply thy needle!" when he recalled Lavinia's "pretty fingers" which "could have better sewed than Philomel," when he caused Othello to lapse into tender memory of his murdered Desdemona, crying out, "So delicate with her needle!" and when he allied needlework with others of his heroines, in passages which will flash into memory readily.

Not, however, that the Water Poet's text fails of zest, self-administered. His verses possess it in every line, albeit possibly not for reasons anticipated by him. Thus, his First Sonnet is on Henry VIII.'s divorced "faire Katharine, Daughter to the Castile King," and he narrates how

> . . . . her dayes did passe
> In working with the Needle curiously,
> As in the Towre, and places more beside,
> Her excellent Memorials may be seene.

The little domestic scene makes a rare background to the sad story of Katharine told in the history books. Again:—Of this poor Katharine's sole child, Mary Tudor, Taylor says Sonnet II., her

> . . . . workes are likewise in the Tower,
> In Windsor Castle, and in Hampton Court,
> In that most pompous room called Paradise.

Of Elizabeth, Sonnet III., he says,

> . . . . howsoeuer Sorrow came or went,
> She made her Needle her companion still,
> And in that exercise her time she spent,
> As many living yet doe know her skill.
> Thus she was still a Captive or else crown'd,
> A Needle-woman Royall and renown'd

Taylor's other Sonnets are not less acceptable. One of the "high borne Ladies" he praised was "Mary, Countesse of Pembroke," a mistress of "stitchery" as well as the corrector of her brother's "Arcadia" written at her earliest leisure. Says Taylor,

> She wrought so well in Needle-worke that shee
> Nor yet her workes shall ere forgotten bee;

and he states how

> Braue Wilton house in Wiltshire well can show
> Her admirable workes in Arras fram'd.

Then he praised "Elizabeth, wife of Lord Robert Dormer, deceased," saying,

> And though her reuerent selfe with many dayes
> Of honourable age is loaden deepe,
> Yet with her Needle (to her worthy prayse),
> She's working often ere the Sunne doth peepe.

It is admirable testimony. Leaving the Sonnets and turning to the general descriptive verse, there is proof how closely Taylor looked at "The Needle's Excellency" displayed around him. His sub-title is "The Praise of the Needle," and he says,

> Yea, till the world be quite dissolu'd and past,
> So long at least the Needles use shall last, because

> A Needle (though it be but small and slender),
> Yet it is both a maker and a mender.

Also, with halberds, casques, rapiers, and petards, all around him as he plied on the Thames, and collected wine dues there for the Lieutenant of the Tower, he takes to dignifying the needle as a weapon, saying,

> And more the Needles honour to aduance
> It is a Taylor's Javelin, or his Launce.
> And for my countries quiet I should like
> That woman-kinde should use no other Pike!

What he incidentally says of Tudor-Stuart garments is of great value; a needle being, according to him,

> A grave Reformer of old rents decay'd
> [It] Stops holes, and seames, and desperate cuts display'd;
> And thus without the Needle we may see
> We should without our Bibs and Biggins bee,
> No Shirts or Smockes our nakednesse to hide,
> No garments gay to make us magnifide.
> No Shadowes, Shapperoones, Ca[illegible], Bands, Ruffs, Kuffs,
> No Kerchiefs, Quoyfes, Chin-clouts, or Marry-Muffes,
> No Cros-cloaths, Aprons, Hand-kerchiefs or Falls,
> No Table-cloathes for Parlours or for Halls,
> No Sheetes, no Towels, Napkins, Pillow-beares,
> Nor any Garment man or woman weares.

It might be a laundry-list, it goes so searchingly into the linen-press, into the nursery, and pieces of personal gear sent, say, to Datchet Mead for bucking and whiting, with a certain Falstaff in their company.

The Water-Poet at length, in enumerating his points, says,

> Thus is a Needle prov'd an Instrument
> Of profit, pleasure, and of Ornament.
> Which mighty Queenes haue grac'd in hand to take,
> And high borne Ladies such esteeme did make,
> That as their Daughters' Daughters up did grow
> The Needles Art they to their Children show.

But his Needle-Women Royall and Renown'd and his Daughters' Daughters need never fear that their craft had but one department, to keep in which would soon bring weariness. Far and wide, into vista after vista, went the Needle's Excellency, Taylor assured them. They could sew, or stitch, for ornamentation, for beauty. At their choice, they could produce

> Flowers, Plants, and Fishes, Beasts, Birds, Flyes and Bees, > Hils, Dales, Plaines, Pastures, Skies, Seas, Rivers, Trees.
> . . . . .

Moreover, Posies rare, and Anagrams,
Sigunique searching sentences from Names,
True History, or various pleasant fiction,
In sundry colours mixt, with Arts commixion.

. . . . .

There's nothing neere at hand, or farthest sought,
But with the Needle may be shap'd and wrought.

Even the stitches, or methods, by which they could embody their picturesque inclinations were set down by Taylor in long variety. He told of as many as seven kinds of "workes," these being Rais'd, Laid, Frost, Net, Purl, Tent, Cut. The last he distinguished as "rare" and "Italian"; was it the stitch used to make "the slip-tire, the tire-valiant, or any tire of Venetian admittance," which Falstaff swore would suit the brew of Mistress Ford? Fourteen different stitches were also catalogued in verse by Taylor for his high-borne ladies. These were Spanish, Irish, Rosemary, Mowse, Bred, Farne, Finny, Fisher, Queen, New, Chain, Whip, Back, Crowse. It is a pity that, though the names of a few of these still linger, there is no knowing which was Mowse, say, or Queen, or Rosemary, in the apparel to be seen by us as Holbein painted it.

There had to be teachers of the correct execution of these difficult Workes and Stitches. Whilst Taylor was still keeping his tavern in Long-acre, there was struggling into acceptance a Cook-Book writer, Hannah Wolley, who, at the end of a volume issued by her twenty years after Taylor's death, in 1671, "The Queene-Like Closet or Rich Cabinet," sets out how she will likewise "teach to embroider at peoples homes for four shillings the day. . . . If any Person desire to speak with me, they may find me at Mr. Richard Wolleys House in the Old Bailey in Golden Cup Court." In order to attract her clients she persuaded them that "it is more commendable a great deal to wear ones own work than to be made fine with the Art of others," and she added, with printing emphasis, "Any fool may be made fine with cost, but give me those who can be neat and nobly habited with a reasonable charge."

We cannot turn from brocades, gold and silver braid, spangles, thread-papers, "huzzifs," spools, silks, and crewels without a short allusion to Cowper's evidence about them. Writing "The Task," in 1784, he waxes eloquent on what his companions were producing in the tranquillity of a fire-side winter evening. He says:—

. . . . the needle plies its busy task,
The pattern grows; the well-depicted flower,
Wrought patiently into the snowy lawn,
Unfolds its bosom; buds, and leaves, and sprigs,
And curling tendrils gracefully disposed,
Follow the nimble fingers of the fair.

Again, take what he says of Patchwork. According to him, it was not only a piece of delicate, refined and artistic workmanship, as it was when delicacy and refinement and art were put into it by "ladies of quality" and gentlewomen, but a pretty meaning lay at the back of all the patches. They were snips from the gown cuttings of lady-acquaintances, sent to the friend who was industriously making them into a whole as emblems of friendship and admiration. Consequently, when Mrs. King, of Portenhall, gave Cowper "a kind Present of a Patchwork Counterpane of her own making," and he wrote his Poem of Thanks to her, he was urged to cry, with all his courteous and gentle humour,

Should every maiden come
To scramble for the patch that bears
The impress of the robe she wears,
The bell would toll for some!

And oh, what havoc would ensue!
This bright display of every hue
All in a moment fled,
. . . .
Each picketing a shred!

JENNETT HUMPHREYS.

BEZA.

The life of Beza reviewed in our columns the other day was the first life of Beza written in the English language. Let us hope that it may do something to prevent Beza from being forgotten by English Protestants. The illustrious Reformer is remembered by too many of us only as the man who presented the Codex Bezæ to the University of Cambridge. He ought to be remembered also as one of the most picturesque figures in the history of Protestantism, and distinctly the most human figure in the history of Calvinism. He was a scholar and a gentleman, whereas Calvin was only a scholar; he had been a man of the world before he became a man of God, and he remained a man of the world afterwards. His bonhomie was such that the Genevans said that they would rather go to hell with him than to heaven with Calvin; he was a poet of great versatility—the precursor, in different veins, one might almost say, of Herrick, of Sternhold and Hopkins, and of Mr. F. C. Burnand.

There is a prevalent belief that Beza wrote improper Latin verses in his unregenerate days; but this is hardly in accordance with the facts. The charge was originally preferred by Roman Catholic calumniators; and a certain number of Protestant writers, accepting the Roman Catholic estimate of the verses, have apologized for them. If they had taken the trouble to read the notorious "Poemata" they would have discovered that there was very little in them to apologize for. That branch of the subject, therefore, may be left. After Beza had found religion, he imitated Clément Marot in writing a metrical version of the Psalms; but his superiority to Clément Marot was not so much poetical as moral. Clément Marot got into trouble with the spiritual powers at Geneva for playing backgammon in an inn with the prisoner of Chillon; and Beza's comment on his rival's character and conduct was:—"Mores parum Christianos ne in extrema quidem ætate emendavit." One cannot help thinking that professional jealousy had as much to do with the verdict as righteous indignation.

Finally Beza was a comic poet. His performances in that direction are naturally little dwelt upon by the majority of his Protestant biographers, but they are interesting all the same. Together with Henri Estienne, the printer, and some other humorists, he was engaged in the composition of a burlesque entitled "Cuisine Papale." As a sample of Beza's humour we may offer a rough translation of the passage in which President Lizet, burner of heretics, bewails the loss of his nose:—

O nose that must with drink be dyed,
O nose, my glory and my pride,
O nose that didst enjoy aright,
Nose, my alembic of delight.

My bibulous big bottle nose
As highly coloured as the rose,
It was my hope that thou would'st share
My shifting fortunes everywhere.

A Churchman's nose thou wast indeed,
The partner of his prayers and creed,
Proof against all doctrinal shocks,
And never aught but orthodox.

It is poor fooling; but, of course, Beza's reputation no more depends upon it than General Baden-Powell's reputation depends upon

You may bet your boots
It's the gun that shoots
The high velocity shell.

His reputation, in fact, does not depend upon his books at all, though he wrote eighty-seven of them, including a Life of Calvin, which is, in most respects, better than Bungener's. His real claim to our respect is as a man of action, who could do any number of things at once and do them all very thoroughly. He was the first Rector of the University of Geneva; and when the University chest was empty, and the salaries of the professors could not be paid, he acted as locum tenens for all of them, without losing either his health or his high spirits. After Calvin's death he took Calvin's place as the head of the Genevan theocracy; and in that capacity he became a veritable Pope of Protestantism, protecting Protestant interests at all the Courts of Europe, and steering the Genevans themselves through the most troubled period of their history.

For one thing it was during his régime that the ministers of religion first learnt not to be afraid of the plague—a thing which Calvin had signally failed to do. The change of tone which he introduced in this regard can be clearly illustrated by two extracts from the Registers of the Council of the City. The entry referring to the epidemic of Calvin's time runs thus:—

> The ministers appeared before the Council confessing that it was their duty to go and offer consolation to the sufferers from the plague, but that not one of them had the courage to do so. They begged the Council to overlook their weakness, seeing that God had not given them the grace to brave and overcome the peril with the intrepidity required.

Calvin does not seem to have considered that the situation called for any particular action on his part. But, when a similar, though graver, epidemic broke out in Beza's time, the ministers were thoroughly well kept up to the mark; and we read that:—

> Though M. de Bèze vehemently insisted that he should not be exempted from the duty of comforting the plague stricken, his colleagues refused to grant his request—not because they wish to spare him, but because they must keep him among them as long as God will let them.

Evidently Beza was a man of finer courage and character than Calvin. The Libertines used to set their dogs at Calvin; one does not picture them setting their dogs at Beza. We find him displaying his courage again during the long religious wars which began in 1589. There had been atrocities; Genevan peasants had been roasted alive over slow fires; the Genevan soldiers wanted to retaliate at least by pillaging; but Beza would not let them. He paraded and harangued them; told them that they were degrading Geneva to the level of a brigand's cave, and bade them make instant restitution of the plunder which they had taken. It is recorded that they obeyed him; and there could be no better proof alike of his courage and of his force of character.

Another occasion on which Beza figures picturesquely is the famous Escalade. The Duke of Savoy had tried to rush the town at night, in time of peace. There was a rough and trouble in the streets. A brave woman, who was making soup for an early breakfast, flung the scalding fluid, saucepan and all, out of window on to the heads of the intruders; the guard turned out and fought en déshabillé; the enterprise was defeated. Beza, who was now an old man and very deaf, had slept through the fighting undisturbed, and only heard what had happened on the following morning. Though he had now retired from the active duties of the pastorate, he dressed himself and went down to the Cathedral, where he mounted the pulpit stairs, and called upon the congregation to sing Psalm cxxiv.:—

> If the Lord had not been on our side, now may Israel say: if the Lord himself had not been on our side, when men rose up against us.

It was the old Reformer's last public appearance—and a fitting one, giving the last dramatic touch to the most dramatic incident in Genevan annals. He lived till 1605, but he was growing feebler and feebler. He suffered from no actual malady, but it was obvious to all that the light was flickering out. His intellect, however, was clear until the last, and the picture of his last days, drawn by his friend La Faye, recalls Bunyan's picture of the Christian pilgrims waiting in the Land of Beulah for their summons to cross the river to the shining city.

The venerable Company of Pastors in conclave resolved that no day should be allowed to pass without at least two of their number paying him a visit. For the rest, "he found his pleasure in reading grave and pious colloquies and sermons, and particularly in those words of Augustine—Long have I lived; long have I sinned. Blessed be the name of the Lord!" And, at the last, "Without pain and without a struggle, all his senses, as it seemed, failing him simultaneously, in one single instant, he gave back his soul to God, his bodily pilgrimage having last eighty-six years, three months, and nine days, and forty of his years having been spent in the holy office of the ministry."

And so he died—the most human of the Genevan Reformers—the only one of them whom one would greatly care to know if he were still living in our midst.

THE DRAMA.

"A DEBT OF HONOUR."

Questions of literary plagiarism are apt to receive much more attention from the public than they deserve. For one person who can take an interest in the artistic merits of a novel or a play there are a score who find personal disputes between authors far more piquant. Nothing is so rare as plagiarism, the deliberate pilfering of plots and "motives" and "situations"; nothing is so common as their undesigned coincidence. Plagiarism is rare because literary dishonesty does not pay. Undesigned coincidence is common because two authors presenting the same theme before the same public are bound, partly by the inherent conditions of the subject, partly by the lawful requirements of the public, to travel over much the same ground in much the same way. Mrs. W. K. Clifford has written and published in the Anglo-Saxon Review a drama turning upon the relations of a man with two women, one of whom is his mistress, the other his wife. Mr. Sydney Grundy has written a drama on the same subject, which has been produced by Mr. George Alexander at the St. James's; and Mrs. Clifford says that hers is remarkably like hers. Though she does not bring a charge of plagiarism, she is puzzled and chagrined by the coincidence. Her chagrin is natural, but her bewilderment is uncalled for. The truth is that out of the many dramas which may be based on a given theme there is always one which may be regarded as the drama proper to that theme, and writers with the same dramatic instinct will always select that one drama. The drama of a man between two women is bound (1) to divide the sympathy of the audience between the two women, (2) to bring the women face to face in a crucial scene, and (3) to remove one of the women by a catastrophe. For, unless there is a balance of sympathies, there is no real conflict of forces, in other words no drama. Not to bring the two women face to face would be to shirk the scène-à-faire, the most exciting situation which is possible in the given circumstances and which, therefore, the audience will not dispense with. And one of the women must be removed before the curtain descends or we should have a cynical conclusion which the average theatrical audience, certainly the average English audience, would never stomach. Some subsidiary features are equally inevitable. For an English audience both women must be virtuous—that is, the mistress must be as innocent in intention as the wife; and, that being so, their meeting must be one of mutual pity and sympathy, not of recrimination. It is possible for the author of La Gioconda to balance the sympathies of an Italian audience by crediting the wife with all the virtue and the mistress with the task of artistically inspiring the man; it is possible for him to make their meeting a war-to-the-knife between these two forces of domestic affection and artistic inspiration. Neither course would be possible to an English dramatist. His lines are plainly marked out for him in the directions I have indicated. Now this identity of direction is what puzzles and vexes Mrs. Clifford. It really indicates that she and Mr. Grundy both know their business; they have independently arrived at the same goal by the same road, because they have given their subject its natural development, they have extracted from it the one drama which it contains. This is the commonsense of a very simple matter. But it is not a view which is ever likely to console the one who has the mischance to be second in the field; nor will it ever get due recognition from the public, which is more amused by dramatists' squabbles than by cool consideration of the laws of dramaturgy.

So much for the inevitable points in two plays developing the same theme. As a matter of fact I do not think these points are the best things in Mr. Grundy's play. Their very inevitability discounts their effect in advance. It is in the points which were not inevitable, in which Mr. Grundy's invention—or rather his skill in applying observation—has had free scope that he seems to me at his best. Thus his scene of the parting between Carlyon and his mistress was not necessarily involved in his theme, and it is certainly the strongest thing in the play. Without wasting a word or a pause or an attitude it shows with great skill the inherent superiority of the mistress to the man—her self-abnegation contrasted with his egoism, her wealth of tenderness with his emotional poverty, her clear knowledge of him with his inability either to appreciate her or to realize himself. She makes the parting easy for him by assuming a forced levity to hide her agony of heart, and succeeds so well that he actually departs congratulating himself that he is no longer to waste his life on so heartless a woman. The scene is admirable not only as a bit of adroit stage-writing, but in its neat, biting irony as a "criticism of life." If only that ironical treatment had been sustained and pushed home! If only Mr. Grundy had been at the pains to show what a miserable creature au fond this Carlyon is, and had held him up to our contempt in the end! But that was not to be, partly, I suppose, because the part was written for Mr. Alexander, who must, even at the risk of a contresense, figure as a more or less "sympathetic personage," and partly because Mr. Grundy did not desire to write a play which should leave a bitter taste in the mouth. So Carlyon gets his worldly success, his seat in Parliament, his wife's promise of forgiveness, in short the prospect of "living happy ever afterwards"—and all this over the dead body of his deserted mistress! In reality, this is a ferociously cynical conclusion, but it is carefully wrapped up and coated with sugar, so that the public swallow it as a pleasant bon-bon.

Another point by no means inevitable is the device by which the scene of the two women is brought about—a well-meaning blunder of a good-hearted, puzzle-headed little friend of the wife's, who, finding her pining for some active piece of benevolence, suggests that she cannot do better than visit and console a poor woman in distress. The woman, of course, is the deserted mistress. A clumsier dramatist would have adopted some cheaper expedient—an incriminating letter accidentally read or a challenge levelled by the distracted mistress at the wife's peace of mind. Mr. Grundy's expedient is not only more fresh and human in itself, but it serves as the pretext for elaborating a subsidiary character into something very quaint and genial. This character, by the way, is admirably played by Mr. Esmond. Miss Fay Davis, too, is very sweet as the innocent mistress, Miss Julie Opp very handsome, if nothing more, as the wife, and Mr. Alexander very comfortably (if—as I have hinted—somewhat inopportunely) Alexandrine as the husband.

THE FUNCTION OF WAR.

Social and Imperial Life of Britain. By Kenelm D. Cotes, M.A. Vol. I.—War and Empire. (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. n.)

This is the first volume of a series, the general method of which will be best inferred from the titles of those which are to follow. After "War and Empire" will come "The Diversity of National Life," which will discuss the influence of Britain, geographically considered, in training its inhabitants for the task of empire, and will depict the character of the successive bands of invaders who occupied it. When national life has been exhibited as the result of these geographical and ethnological causes it will be shown how this national life became imperial in the northern seas and the Mediterranean, and finally achieved its destiny on the oceans. A third volume will treat of "The Geography of Sea Power and Empire." In this it will be shown how the path of empire has been marked out, how the European horizon has widened, how pioneers have pushed their way into the unknown, and in the end covered the sphere with a network of roads by land and sea.

"Geography studied in this way," says Mr. Cotes, "shows that by the plan of the world empires are placed where lands connect the maritime regions, that all empires have depended on sea power, that sea power only falls to a people whose plebeians are armed and therefore free." We are not sure that any one of these three propositions will bear examination, and the dark saying that "empires are placed where lands connect the maritime regions" is too much for us. Does Mr. Cotes mean that an empire must necessarily border on more than one sea, and intend by this to lead up to the principle that "all empires have depended on sea power?" Assuredly neither Russia, China, nor the United States are dependent on sea power, any more than were the ancient empires of the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians. The Austrian Empire, with its single port, is by no means dependent on sea power; neither is the German Empire, though the Germans appear to be perfectly miserable because it is not so. What Mr. Cotes probably means is that a maritime empire is dependent on sea power, which is a truism. Nor can we concede that "sea power only falls to a people whose plebeians are armed and therefore free." We see no necessary connexion between sea power and the arming of the plebeian landsman. The plebeian has universally been armed in the sense intended by Mr. Cotes, except where he has been held in slavery, or a state equivalent to slavery. But the instances in which maritime power has been developed to such an extent as to make it the mainstay of empire are few indeed.

Mr. Cotes, to tell the truth, is weakest in his generalizations; and the "Laws of Imperial Life," for which he claims something of the merit which belongs to scientific discovery, do not strike us as either original or important. Where he succeeds is in bringing a vast number of illustrations, drawn from many distant sources, to bear on the various stages of his argument. He has read widely and to good purpose, and he has a keen sense of historical analogy. The main drift of his volume is to show that national life, character, and organization have in this country been chiefly moulded by war and its results. This indicates a strong reaction against the doctrine that history is no mere record of reigns and campaigns, but has its true roots in the legal, economic, and literary aspects of society. It is too often forgotten that down to the reign of Charles II. English society rested on a system which made every free man a soldier. In England, as Mr. Cotes puts it, the plebeian had been armed ever since the Anglo-Saxon immigration, and adopted every change which made military equipment more effective. The consequence was that feudalism was earlier checked and counterbalanced, and the substantial liberty of the subject achieved. The arming of the plebeian raised his industrial status, and prepared the nation for the part it was destined to play in transmarine conquest and colonization. In this island the first condition of all empire, as laid down by Bacon—"that before all things the breed of men be stout and warlike"—was fulfilled at an early date, and there were circumstances which enabled Englishmen to start in the race for the world's dominion with other advantages. Notwithstanding some faults incident to the work of a youthful writer, Mr. Cotes has produced an interesting volume, and we shall be glad to hear of the publication of a further instalment of what should prove to be a work of permanent value.

NORFOLK.

Norfolk. By Wm. A. Dutt. (Dent's County Guides, 4s. 6d. n.)

"We Norfolk folk, or 'North Folk of East Anglia,' are firmly of opinion that there is no county in England to compare with our own." With these words Mr. Dutt commences his little book on Norfolk in the series of "County Guides," published by Messrs. Dent and Co., and all Norfolk men will no doubt agree with him. But we may go further, and say that this book certainly affords some justification for this healthy patriotism. This series of County Guides is not of the ordinary guide-book type, containing a list of places to be visited, ticketed and described as separate items, which, however accurate and instructive, can hardly fail to be dry. On the contrary, there is not a dull or a dry page in the present volume.

The book is divided into three parts, of which the first, and longest, by Mr. Dutt himself, contains the account of "Norfolk: its Story and Scenery." A short introduction deals with its geological features, which have largely conduced to the present undulating and diversified appearance of the country; this is followed by an historical summary from its earliest Iberian or Euskarian inhabitants of the Neolithic period, whose remains are to be seen in the "Shrieking Pits" at Aylmerton, near Cromer, in the lake-dwellings at Wretham, near Thetford, and in the flint-workings near Brandon, to their Iceuian conquerors and so to Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, and modern times. Short as it is, this sketch gives a more picturesque and accurate account of Norfolk history than is to be found in more elaborate books, such as Mr. Walter Rye's "History of Norfolk." At the present day, as the author shows, Norfolk is peculiarly attractive not only to the archæologist, from the number of its Churches—there are more than a hundred within a twelve-mile radius of Thetford—its Castles, and its old Halls, but also to the sportsman, or to the simple tourist. We have no fault to find with the arrangement of the sixteen itineraries, and the headings are attractive. "The City of Churches" describes Norwich; "Peggotty's Port" describes Great Yarmouth; "Byways and an old Turnpike," the road from Norwich through Caistor and Wymondham to Thetford; "A Royal Town and a Flint Village," Thetford and Brandon; "Anne Boleyn's Country," Aylsham, Blickling, and Cromer; "By the Wild North Sea," the coast route from Yarmouth through Caister, Cromer, Cley, and Wells to Hunstanton; while seven itineraries are devoted to the glories of Broadland, with its quiet streams, its wide stretches of reed-bounded meres, and its magnificent sunsets. Each itinerary takes the form of a narrative in which writer and reader wander together, finding new beauties in well-known scenes and fresh objects of interest in out-of-the-way districts. There is, too, in these pages something of the glamour of the country, of the open expanses of common and the invigorating breeze, the song of birds, the hum of insect-life. Natural history and sport are dealt with by specialists in the second part. The papers are short, but contain good hints for the sportsman, the fisherman, the cyclist, and the tourist who is interested in geology, botany, entomology, or ornithology. That on "Bird-life," by the Rev. R. C. Nightingale, is particularly good. In a third part comes a list of places to be visited, a gazetteer and an index.

We have noted very few mistakes or omissions. By a curious oversight, which should be corrected in a future edition, the itineraries are numbered "one" to "seventeen" in the headings, but the seventh is omitted. On p. 21 it is stated that "the Cathedral suffered a good deal during the Reformation, when the people of Yarmouth, who wanted a workhouse, petitioned the Lord Protector that it might be pulled down for the purpose." This should, of course, be "after the Civil War," the Lord Protector being Oliver Cromwell. More might have been said about the Church of St. Peter Mancroft, in Norwich, which is one of the most interesting in the county. The fine round towers of St. Julian and St. Mary Coslany, at Norwich, are most certainly not Saxon (p. 25); that of the former is Early Norman, while that of the latter is of the same age as the Church, viz., Perpendicular. To come to more modern times, we should not do our sea-fishing with a rod (p. 241); we should use the square frame round which the line is wound, and which is employed by the fishermen all round the coasts of Great Britain.

There are a number of good maps; and many illustrations, full-page and vignette, by Mr. J. A. Symington. The book is charmingly got-up, with a flavour of the eighteenth century about its appearance. We recommend the tourist to make it his vade mecum for a ramble through Norfolk.

PLATONISM AND THE LADIES OF THE RENAISSANCE.

Les Femmes de la Renaissance. By R. de Maulde la Clavière. Paris, 1898. (Perrin, Fr.7.50.)

To give his readers a better comprehension of the periods of history with which he was dealing, M. Renan would often allude to contemporary events or creeds, and, à propos of Greece or Israel, expatiate on the Crimean War, the Commune, or Socialism. The same method has been adopted by M. de Maulde la Clavière, with the added excuse that the epoch of which he treats—the Renaissance—bears some resemblance to our own century. Our contemporaries, like those of Marguerite de Navarre, are tormented with the same Pagan desire for happiness here below. It is only the means of securing this end that have changed; scholars, noblemen, especially noblewomen, were devoted to the cult of Plato. At first France showed some hesitation in adopting what she considered as an Italian importation; but the women having become adepts of the new creed, it finally flourished in France as in the rest of Europe. This attempt at happiness, however, was short-lived; it lasted the few years of Francis I. and Henri II.'s reign. The corruption of the Valois Court, the stern reality of civil war, and the spirit of France itself—always too ready to laugh down enthusiasms and an ideal—quickly killed it. Marot knew the Platonists and was in high favour with them; Ronsard and Du Bellay were quite opposed to them—a proof that the noble adepts had become much less numerous.

The book falls into two separate parts; in the first part, we have a very interesting study of the manners of the sixteenth century; the chapters on marriage, on the education of children are both instructive and amusing, especially as by a trick of the author they are constantly written in the present tense, producing the illusion that he is speaking not of manners and customs three hundred years old, but of our present "decadence":—

L'instruction s'est fort répandue, tout le monde veut en avoir, plutôt par amour-propre que pour correspondre à des besoins réels; il en résulte qu'on se préoccupe moins d'armer quelques intelligences d'élite, et davantage de vernir superficiellement la banalité des esprits. Le monde est encombré d'aimables jeunes hommes, types de correction mondaine, saluant bien, dansant bien, se tenant bien à table, pourvus d'ailleurs de quelques bribes latines ou grecques, élégamment bisifs, et, dans cet état, orgueil du bon commerçant qui a l'honneur de leur donner le jour et de leur assurer des revenus. Leur côté faible, c'est qu'encore imberbes ils connaissent trop la vie; l'esthétisme ne les a menés ni aux illusions ni à l'enthousiasme; mais ils sont docteurs en évaluation marchande de telle demoiselle à la mode et de son mobilier.

These observations apply almost as much to one of Gyp's favourite characters as to a young contemporary of Erasmus. In the second part of the book the author becomes frankly the scholar. The value of Platonism as a system of ethics is discussed, its perils duly set forth, its fair exponents' lives elaborately recounted. This is how Platonism is defined:—

Pour être heureux, il faut s'élever au-dessus de la matière, et établir le monde sur une philosophie de l'amour. . . . L'art consiste à réaliser autant que possible la plénitude de la vie, c'est-à-dire à tirer du christianisme une philosophie esthétique. . . . La doctrine d'amour s'était retugiée étioler dans les cloitres, comme dans une serre chaude, et laissait la place libre au vice. . . . Il faut rendre au monde la philosophie méconnue, traduire l'amour comme il doit l'être, par des impressions, par la sensibilité, et non par l'esprit; c'est pourquoi Castiglione a dit: On ne voit Dieu que par les femmes.

All this is very vague, no doubt, and not calculated to satisfy the philosophical historian, but the author may plead that to define such a subtle creed is to take away part of its charm.

M. de Maulde la Clavière has the love of a scholar for the slight detail, the mere fragment of a letter; he has spent long hours in a library in company with the fair shadows of Isabelle d'Este, Anne de France, Marguerite de Navarre; he knows, even better than Bayle, the gossip and scandal of their brilliant little courts, and can name the exact sums of money which Arctino extorted from Italian noblewomen; he has not forgotten the story about Joan of Arragon's various portraits, especially the one that that old pedant Nifo had the audacity to write out in all its details; but, unfortunately, he forgets at times that his readers are not so familiar as he is with this special branch of history, and he has a bewildering way of proceeding at times by a series of allusions which are disconcerting.

The book is a bulky quarto and some of the chapters might easily be cut down, yet it is incomplete. France and Italy were not all Europe in the sixteenth century; Platonism, the cult of beauty and love, flourished also in England, and in England, too, there reigned a Queen who encouraged it. Of all the Princesses introduced by M. de Maulde la Clavière to his readers, none was so thorough-going a Platonist as the "Virgin Queen" Elizabeth. The doctrine gave rise in England to works that have been more lasting than Cardinal Bembo's or Vivès' treatises. Sir Philip Sidney and Spenser might have held as great a place in the book as the innumerable unknown Italian poets that the author loves to quote. "An hymne of heavenly love" is, to our thinking, well worth all the rhymes of Saint-Gelais, Héroët, and Salel. But M. de Maulde la Clavière is an erudite historian who cares little for paths that others have trodden; he has discovered a new land, and guides us in it with the enthusiasm and perhaps the insistent earnestness of an antiquary displaying his treasures.

AN AMERICAN ON ENGLISH POLITICS.

An Outline of Political Growth in the Nineteenth Century. By E. H. Sears. (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. n.)

"Sapere in aliena republica" was a phrase used a good many centuries ago to convey a warning tinged with something of reproach and a large measure of irony. But, nowadays, we are all wise in the affairs of other nations, and to display our wisdom, or our want of it, is regarded as a sort of literary obligation. We really do not see why a literary man should take upon himself to pass moral sentence on statesmen and the policy of empires. In the days when we committed to memory the Kings of Israel and Judah we were expected to distinguish between those who did right in the sight of the Lord and those who did evil; and this involved the less incongruity because the matter had been decided for us by the public opinion of the Israelites themselves. Without this black or white ticket attached to each name the list of the Hebrew Sovereigns would have been intolerably monotonous, and the label facilitated the task of getting the names by heart. But we feel it to be a superfluity verging on impertinence when the compiler of a mere outline of recent history seasons his pages with the crudest judgments on those who figure in them; and all the more so when those judgments are founded on the application of a single test of an extremely trite description. Mr. Sears is an American writer who glories in his devotion to the principles of democracy, and sees in the promotion of those principles the only criterion of statesmanship. For him, as might be expected, Lord Beaconsfield's policy was simply "a wicked waste of blood and treasure," and Mr. Gladstone earned "lasting honour" by granting a "brave little people" their independence after the disaster of Majuba. At a later stage in his work, when Mr. Sears has bestowed a little more attention on South African questions, his opinion of the Boers undergoes considerable modification, though he still thinks that the primary cause of the war was nothing less (he probably means "nothing more") than Anglo-Saxon greed. Mr. Sears seems to have been under the impression that by the time his work issued from the press Lord Salisbury would somehow have disappeared from the scene. At any rate, he writes of the Prime Minister and his present administration in the past tense, and very grotesque reading it is:—

> Lord Salisbury's administration was not in the end successful. He was not a great leader or a great executive (sic). He lacked the energy and the intrepidity which characterized Lord Palmerston; he had not the intellectual breadth or the moral elevation of Mr. Gladstone. In no direction did he show great vigour and ability; and his foreign policy was so timid and cautious as to give offence even to his own party. He soon found himself confronted with problems of a peculiarly difficult and delicate character—problems which would have taxed the resources of a statesman of first-class genius, and which proved too formidable for Lord Salisbury's astute but halting diplomacy. In handling them he gradually lost the confidence of the nation.

Probably by this time Mr. Sears has repented of these conspicuously silly remarks, which only serve to show how perilous it is for a writer who can only take his cue from others to sit in judgment on the contemporary statesmen of foreign countries. Had Mr. Sears exercised more self-restraint in this respect he would have had leisure to correct some of the inaccuracies which disfigure his pages. One who knows so much as he does about the shortcomings of English Cabinets ought not to be under the impression that the Lord Chancellor holds office for life; and there is something irresistibly ludicrous in his statement that Australia was discovered by the Portuguese in the earlier part of the fifteenth century, and "is designated Terra Australis on the maps of that period." Mr. Sears, as might be anticipated, is most worth attention when dealing with the affairs of his own country. With all his attachment to democratic principles he does not appear to be satisfied with the existing condition of American politics; and he expressly congratulates Great Britain on the fact that she has not yet experienced the full force of democratic tendencies. "Her civil service has not been corrupted by the spoils system; her finances are not controlled by the untrained masses; her laws are not framed at the instigation of the lobby; her diplomats are not appointed for party reasons." It augurs ill for the cause of civil service reform in the United States that President McKinley, reversing the policy pursued since Garfield's death in 1881, withdrew last year an immense number of offices from the application of the rules which throw the civil service open to the public without party nomination. On the President's side it is alleged that the offices so restored to the "spoils system" after all numbered no more than 1,000. The National Civil Service Reform League estimates them at 10,000. If this reactionary policy is persisted in, one of the few hopeful signs for the future of American democracy will have vanished.

"THE EVIL EYE."

In Horns of Honour (Murray, 10s. 6d. n.) Mr. F. T. Elworthy treats a subject similar to that of his former book "The Evil Eye," in an equally interesting manner. His scope is wider than his title indicates, and he propounds the theory that the purpose of many ornaments was to ward off the evil eye from the wearer by drawing it to the ornaments. Thus the warrior adorned his helmet with a thing much like the crest of a cock, that creature being an enemy of the evil one, as it is of ghosts—though, possibly, the ghosts dislike the light of which the cock is herald, rather than the cock himself. Some of us may have fancied it incongruous that Michael Angelo should have represented Moses as adorned with horns, but it seems that the word translated "shone" means "sent forth beams," and that these beams were horns, and thus a link is fashioned to connect Moses with the butting Zedekiah and the German soldier with his pickelhaube. Alexander the Great was called the two-horned. Hannah said "mine horn is exalted in the Lord." Perhaps the oddest horned helmet of which an illustration appears in this book is one of copper, said to be ancient British, found in the Thames. The three high plumes which form the Prince of Wales' crest may be a survival or development of the horns of honour.

Mr. Elworthy had the good fortune to find out in Naples frescoes representing splendid specimens of horns. They are in a side chapel of the Cathedral of San Gennaro, and hand down to us the figures and the faces of members of the old family of the Minutoli. Owing to the darkness of the chapel and the silence of Baedeker and others, few people have taken any notice of these frescoes, which date, it is said, from the thirteenth century. There are twenty-one figures, about life-size, ending at the knees. Two are given in this book in black and white, and one, that serves as a frontispiece, in colour. Every one will remember Jacques' words about setting "the deer's" horns upon his head for a branch of victory:—

> Take thou no scorn, to wear the horn;
> It was a crest ere thou wast born.

A horse-shoe is a symbol of good luck, but its value consists in its crescent shape—the horned moon—and therefore it ought, so to say, to stand upon its head. A Somerset farmer as lately as five years ago had bad luck with his cattle; it was clear that they were "overzeed"; a neighbour "told'n he could'n expect no other, zo long as he did keep the 'oss shoe wrong zide up"; the "heels" were put "up on end" and all was well. Some of the weirdest of the pictures in this book represent what are supposed to be horned Medusæ from Tarentum; the faces have a scared and troubled look, and a sketch of a bronze boss found at Pompeii is quaint in another way, for it inserts the trunk of an elephant between the horns. The Etruscans lived in terror of the "evil eye" and, indeed, may be said to have died in terror of it also, and so their relatives cremated the dead bodies to lessen the material for the evil eye to play upon. But even this might not suffice, and so they placed the ashes in a little urn of pottery shaped like the huts in which they lived, and on the top of this they placed protecting horns. These urns are proved by facts to be found in this book to belong to a remote antiquity. When the mitre is placed upon the head of a newly-consecrated Bishop in the Roman Church his head is spoken of as "armed with the horns of either Testament." Most of us have doubtless wondered at the ingenious ugliness of gargoyles without realizing that their intention was to ward off the evil eye. The early purpose of trepanning was to let the demon, who was in the head, come out, and the illustrations given here disclose the fact that, with this purpose in the mind, no great tenderness of touch was shown. One cure recalls a picturesque sentence of Carlyle; "Si quis graviter scorpione ictus id in aurem insusurret asini, ex tempore curetur." It was once suggested to Carlyle, who was ill, that he should consult a young doctor who was staying in the house, "I would as soon whisper my symptoms into the long hairy ear of an ass"—or words to that effect. A beast stranger than the long-eared ass is to be seen in the "Dorset Ooser" which recalls the days of the hobby horse and mystery.

There is much in this book about the human hand, which plays its part in most unlikely places. It is the glory of the Roman standard, and a sign upon a Roman weight. The red hand of Ulster, which is said to have been brought to Ulster by Phœnicians, is, as everybody knows, the cognisance of baronet. A lighted candle placed in a dead man's hand was long thought to make the company in which it was invisible, and thus it was a favourite with burglars. Hands of interest are to be found on a Wells seal of about the year A.D. 1200, and on the cross of Ashburton. On one hand, of which a picture is presented, a striking creature is a scarabæus, which was in Egypt a sort of resurrection symbol owing, it is supposed, to its persistency in rolling balls of clay. This is, indeed, our old friend the "tumble-bug" of which the late Tom Hughes wrote so charmingly twenty years ago. This with many others of his letters, was republished as "Vacation Rambles," in book form. He wrote from Rugby, Tennessee:—

> The gentleman in question took no notice of me, but went on rolling his lump of accumulated dirt three times his own size with his hind legs, as if his life depended on it. Presently his lump came right up against a stone and stopped dead. It was a "caution" to see that bug strain to push it further, but it wouldn't budge, all he could do. Then he stopped for a moment or two and evidently made up his small mind that something must be wrong behind, for no bug could have pushed harder than he. So he quitted hold with his hind legs and turned round to take a good look at the situation, in order, I suppose, to see what must be done next. At any rate, he presently caught hold again on a different side, and so steered successfully past the obstacle.

On the Dischi Sacri or the plaques Mr. Elworthy has much to say, for he had the good fortune to pick up many at Tarentum in 1895, dating from about B.C. 300; these, like the bands, contain many prophylactics, lyres, ladders, tiger's teeth, wheels of fortune, owl, dove and cock, Osiris' whip, Priapus' pruning-hook, and many other things. It is thought that these plaques were intended to be affixed to the interior walls of houses to ward off the evil eye—in a word—and that a long word—they were meant to be 'apotropaic.'"

BUDDHISM.

Sacred Books of the Buddhists. Edited by F. Max Müller. Vol. II. Dialogues of the Buddha. Translated from the Pâli, by T. W. Rhys Davids. (Frowde. 10s. 6d.)

Of non-Christian religions none has excited in recent years a tenth of the interest that has been aroused by Buddhism, and these ancient "Dialogues of the Buddha" will be very welcome to the large number of enthusiastic admirers of "Gótama, the recluse." Professor Rhys Davids agrees with the late Hofrath Bühler that they are probably "good evidence of the fifth century B.C.," and he sees in them the earliest traditions of the Buddha's teaching, as committed to memory by his first disciples, and handed down orally for some generations, before being reduced to writing. If this view be accepted we have in these remarkable conversations a record of the Buddha's doctrine and method of dialectic at least as authentic and nearly as contemporary as Plato's representation of the dialogues of Socrates. The method of argument employed by the Indian teacher is, indeed, quite different from the Socratic. As Mr. Rhys Davids remarks, in one of the admirable introductions which he prefixes to each of the "Suttas":—

> When speaking on sacrifice to a sacrificial priest, on union with God to an adherent of the current theology, on Brahman claims to social rank to a proud Brâhman, on mystic insight to one who believes in the soul theory, the method followed is always the same. Gotama puts himself as far as possible in the mental position of the questioner. He attacks none of his cherished convictions. He accepts as the starting point of his own exposition the desirability of the act or condition prized by his opponent. . . . He even adopts the very phraseology of his questioner. And then, partly by putting a new and (from the Buddhist point of view) higher meaning into the words, partly by an appeal to such ethical conceptions as are common ground between them, he gradually leads his opponent up to his conclusion. This is, of course, always Arahatship (Nirvâna)—that is the sweetest fruit of the life of a recluse, that is the best sacrifice, that the highest social rank, that the best means of seeing heavenly sights. . . . There is both courtesy and dignity in the method employed. But no little dialectic skill and an easy mastery of the ethical points involved are required to bring about the result.

No doubt the method has its disadvantages. The argumentum ad hominem is never a complete and abstract exposition of doctrine, and in these dialogues we are often compelled to read between the lines. Nevertheless we possess in this important work a reproduction of the Buddha's original teaching, probably more exact than Plato's representation of the teaching of Socrates, because the compilers, the early disciples, were merely compilers, and, unlike Plato, had no independent views of their own to impart. All the dialogues are of the utmost value for the comprehension of the real doctrine of the Buddha, and some rise to the highest plane of the Buddhist creed. Of the others, one of the most interesting is that on "the naked ascetic," in which Gotama explains that mere physical asceticism is not enough to purify the heart, to attain to "Arahatship":—

> And if a man, O Kassapa, wear coarse hempen cloth, or carry out all or any of those other practices you gave in detail, down to bathing in water three times a day, and the state of blissful attainment in conduct, in heart, in intellect, has not been practised by him, realized by him, then he is far from Samanaship, far from Brâhmanaship. But from the time, O Kassapa, when a Bhikkhu (disciple) has cultivated the heart of love that knows no anger, that knows no ill-will—from the time when, by the destruction of the deadly intoxications (the lusts of the flesh, the lusts after future life, and the defilements of delusion and ignorance), he dwells in that emancipation of heart, that emancipation of mind, that is free from those intoxications, and that he, while yet in this visible world, has come to realize and know—from that time, O Kassapa, is it that the Bhikkhu is called a Samana, is called a Brâhmana.

But the dialogues have another side besides the exposition of Gotama's teaching. They indirectly present a valuable picture of Indian life at the time, or at least shortly after the time, of his ministry. The lists of practices condemned, of games, amusements, sports, luxuries, ornaments, cosmetics to be eschewed by the true disciple, the denunciations of magical rites and incantations, quack nostrums, and a number of other references, illustrate in no ordinary way the social, religious, and even political condition and habits of the people of India at an early period. Readers will be surprised perhaps to find that the vulgar delights of hop-scotch, tip-cat, and spillikins were highly appreciated even by "recluses and Brâhmans who lived on food provided by the faithful," and there is a reference to a game played on "a board with eight or ten squares," which looks very like chess. In fine, whether as an historical document or as a very early authentic representation of the Buddha's teaching, Mr. Rhys Davids' translation of the Dialogues of the Nikâyas is a singularly interesting and important work. We should add that these translations of "Buddhist Sacred Books" owe their inception to the enlightened patronage of the present King of Siam and the indomitable energy of the doyen of Oriental studies in England, Professor Max Müller.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Reprints.

The two latest additions to Messrs. Macmillan's fine Library of English Classics are THE TRAVELS OF SIR JOHN MANDEVILLE and LOCKHART'S LIFE OF SCOTT (3s. 6d. each vol.). The version of Mandeville which the editor, Mr. A. W. Pollard, gives us is that of the Cotton manuscript, in modern spelling. The volume also includes three Hakluyt narratives, the Voyage of Johannes de Plano Carpini, the Journal of Friar William de Rubruquis, and the Journal of Friar Odoric. The two latter narratives have also been reprinted by the Hakluyt Society. Mr. Pollard naturally has a word to say about the genuineness of the Mandeville story. For some of us its accuracy, at any rate, is settled by the account of the atmospheric condition at the top of Mount Athos, where "is the air so clear that men may find no wind there, and therefore may no beast live there, so is the air dry."

The "Life of Scott" is to occupy five volumes, two of which have now appeared. It has not been reprinted apparently since 1850. Its merits are well established. The only question is whether it should rank at the head of English biographies or next after Boswell. Mr. Leslie Stephen in the "Dictionary of National Biography" says that "The biography may safely be described as—next to 'Boswell's Johnson'—the best in the language." Mr. A. W. Pollard, the editor of the present edition, is slightly more indulgent. He says that it "has taken its place, beside 'Boswell's Life of Johnson,' as one of the two greatest biographies in our language." Its bibliography is interesting. Ten years after its first publication—in 1847—Robert Cadell, who was advancing about £30,000 to help the settlement of Scott's estate, stipulated as part of the arrangement that Lockhart should prepare an abridgment of the biography. Lockhart said he would much rather have enlarged it than shortened it. But a proposal which would benefit Scott was not likely to be refused by Scott's son-in-law, who had already devoted to the same purpose all the profits of the original publication. The abridgment was made, and some names and details were inserted which do not appear in the larger work. These additions and alterations Mr. Pollard gives at the end of each volume.

Another series which Messrs. Macmillan are publishing is one of reprints of some of their own books well printed and bound in red covers at 3s. 6d. a volume. We have before us the four series of Frank Buckland's CURIOSITIES OF NATURAL HISTORY, originally written 1857-1865, which every naturalist will be glad to see republished; Richard Jefferies' novel THE DEWY MORN, and Sir Henry Bulwer's HISTORICAL CHARACTERS.

With volume three of the "Tudor Translations," RABELAIS (Nutt, £2 14s. net the three volumes), we sacrifice Sir Thomas Urquhart for Peter Motteux. Motteux was a busy literary hack, for whose migration to England we have to thank the Edict of Nantes. He mastered English with extraordinary facility; but he wrote the language not as Bolingbroke or Beckford or Gibbon wrote French, in the classic and literary manner, but in the familiar vernacular of Fleet-street and Leadenhall-street. "A pert flippancy," says Mr. C. Whibley in his excellent introduction, "replaces Sir Thomas' majestic eccentricity; the slang of the coffee-house makes what poor substitute it can for the curious slang of the study; the facile familiarity of the journal comes forth a bitter contrast with the balanced gravity of scholarship." Motteux was editor of the Gentleman's Journal, and died a violent and mysterious death in 1718.

One of the most important books which we owe to the enterprise of the publishers of the "Temple Classics" has just appeared in THE ROMANCE OF THE ROSE (Dent, 1s. 6d.), translated for the first time, since Chaucer, into English. With this we deal elsewhere. Hazlitt's LECTURES ON THE ENGLISH COMIC WRITERS, in the same series, is to be welcomed at a time when we particularly need good examples of the art and practice of sound criticism; and Milton's AREOPAGITICA in a handy form will be greeted at any rate with respect. Mr. A. Rackham provides some capitally-drawn illustrations of the immortal experiences among "several remote nations of the world" contained in GULLIVER'S TRAVELS; and the first volume out of five appears of MACAULAY'S ESSAYS.

Messrs. Sampson Low have a good idea in their new set of "Famous Novels of the Sea" including six of the best known among such novels, Herman Melville's MOBY DICK, a classic now too little read, THE TWO ADMIRALS, THE GREEN HAND, TOM CRINGLES' LOG, MIDSHIPMAN EASY, and THE WRECK OF THE GROSVENOR (2s. n.).

The Wallace Collection.

While we await the volume Mr. Claude Phillips is preparing on the treasures of Hertford-house, Mr. M. H. Spielmann very opportunely offers us his interesting notes on the pictures and other works of art now on view in Manchester-square. THE WALLACE COLLECTION (Cassell, 1s.) contains certain papers contributed to the Magazine of Art at the time when the bequest was made known, their aim being to give a general idea of the extent and value, æsthetic and material, of these wonderful galleries. In Mr. Spielmann's opening chapter, "The Story of the Collection," and in a recent article by the late M. Charles Yriarte, we have no small part of its history, although it is a subject upon which entertaining stories may be written for many a day. For the present, Mr. Spielmann's book is full of carefully collected information and wise comment, and it gives a large amount of particulars essential to the pleasure of a visitor who has not followed the fortunes of the masterpieces now the property of the nation.

A Note on the War.

It may safely be said, we suppose, that no siege in history has produced a book at all similar to the LEAGUER OF LADYSMITH (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 3s. 6d.). Captain Clive Dixon, A.D.C. to Sir George White, is an artist who could do credit to any illustrated journal in existence. He is also a smart officer; and, whatever other services are on record to prove this fact, it would certainly be established by this book, which show him to be a man of unfailing coolness, observation, and humour in the hour of danger. We owe him a debt of gratitude for these excellently drawn coloured pictures of the humours of the siege.

China.

A new edition is opportunely issued of Mr. Demetrius Charles Boulger's SHORT HISTORY OF CHINA (Gibbings, 7s. 6d.). The word short apparently means "short relatively to the magnitude of the subject," for there are about 430 large pages of somewhat small print. A chapter dealing with the events of the last decade is added by a writer whose name is not given, and who has the wisdom to refrain from offering suggestions for the solution of the crisis.

Mr. J. Passmore Edwards having undertaken to pay for the building of a sailors' palace in the Port of London, and funds being required to furnish that palace when it is built, Mr. Frank T. Bullen has written a little book, THE PALACE OF POOR JACK (Nisbet, 1s. n.), giving an account of the scheme, and asking for contributions. It is a vigorous pamphlet, and well worth reading. We wish all appeals to the charitable were written with the same literary skill.

MUNICIPAL LONDON, 1900, by C. A. Whitmore, M.P. (Black, 1s.), is about the County Council and the Local Government Act of 1899. The Act itself, with its schedules, fills about half the book.

The latest Baedeker is a thirteenth edition of NORTHERN GERMANY (Dulau, 8s.). It proves, among other things, that Thuringia would be an excellent substitute for the Black Forest for any one who considers the Black Forest too near to the centres of civilization. Among other attractions Thuringia includes the Goethe country.

SOUTH AFRICA (Allenson, 1s.) relates the personal experiences and impressions of Mr. John Dickie, who made a tour, in 1898, to Cape Town, Durban, Ladysmith, Johannesburg, Pretoria, Bloemfontein, Kimberley, &c. The experiences were normal, and the impressions pretty much those of the average man.

The Great Eastern Railway Company's bright and well-illustrated TOURIST GUIDE TO THE CONTINENT (6d.) increases in bulk. Among the fresh features are particulars of new Ober-Ammergau tours.

The Shropshire Parish Registers Society has printed the register of Fitz—a list of names beginning with the year 1559 and ending with the year 1812. Thirty-seven registers in all have been printed by the enterprise of this Society, a work for which the historians of the future will no doubt be duly grateful.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has sent us another copy of Mrs. Elizabeth Robins Pennell's OVER THE ALPS ON A BICYCLE (1s.), a bright little book which we reviewed not very long ago.

FICTION.

Platform Novels.

The novel with an ulterior object will in most cases depend for its success, as a novel, on a very simple issue—viz., which is it that swings the beam downwards, the story or the ulterior object? If the motive of the writer shows itself merely in a general sympathy with certain social or moral teachings, the story may still hold its own throughout; but if the story has definitely to support some special platform it will probably suffer. We have, for instance, novels written against vivisection in which no one but an earnest member of a Social Science Congress would be likely to find any real picture of life. Mr. Oswald Crawfurd in THE NEW ORDER (Grant Richards, 6s.) has chosen a better way. He is anxious to preach the doctrine of Fair Trade, or modified Protection, which, however large an amount of fiction may appear in the arguments commonly used for or against it, does not, on the face of it, seem likely to provide entertainment for the ordinary novel reader. We must do Mr. Crawfurd the justice to say that his story swings down the beam with a rush. He wants badly to bring the British yeoman back to the land, but his economic theories have no chance against his instincts as a literary man. His arguments for a duty on wheat will, we fear, serve no purpose but to exasperate any orthodox member of the Cobden Club into whose hands "The New Order" may fall, and, indeed, he does not attempt to use any reasoning but such as might be addressed to the limited understanding of a provincial town. But his story of Herbert Strangway, who, with his twin sister, peregrinates the world on a bicycle to show rustic audiences how fair trade may irrigate and fertilize the land, is well told. There is a suggestion of the original type of novel, the story of detached adventures encountered by a particular person in his wanderings; and we have to thank Mr. Crawfurd for giving us in his preface a new word descriptive of the novels which, from "Gil Blas" to "Pickwick," conform to this type—viz., "processional"—only Mr. Crawfurd intends his "processional novel" to describe the course of an idea rather than a person. Despite this exalted aim, we prefer to rank "The New Order" with the old-fashioned stories of a pilgrimage which have stood the test of time, and we quite forget the question of tariffs in following the fortunes of the hero, who picks up another party of bicyclists and takes them along with him from place to place in his electioneering campaign. As a matter of fact, the whole thing resolves itself into a simple love story, the hero of which is not the revolutionary bicyclist at all, but one Robert Sturge, who provides a most excellent character study. But the book is full of pleasant and interesting people moving through the changing scenes of a country road, and there is at the end a capital description of a poaching affray which brings Sturge's love story to a satisfactory climax.

A purpose novel of a different kind is Miss Marie Corelli's MASTER CHRISTIAN (Methuen, 6s.). Here the authoress is completely enthralled by her horror of the Roman Church, and we have some doubts whether the book should not be classed under the heading of Theology rather than Fiction. Miss Corelli, we believe, does not like her books to fall into the hands of reviewers, whom, as a class, she distrusts, and she therefore takes no steps to that end; but in a literary journal one can hardly ignore a work of which 100,000 copies have been sold on publication. For a writer who, we imagine, makes no pretence of studying or depicting life as it really is, this success certainly commands admiration. It is due to a combination of qualities. First, no figure in fiction approaches, in popularity among the masses, that of the religious enthusiast battling against formalism and prejudice against the tyranny and narrowness of "the Churches" and for the supremacy of a broad human charity. This, like the familiar outcry against "cant" and "humbug," appeals very strongly to people whose feelings and generous instincts are stronger than their intelligence, and also to the perhaps still larger class who like to fit the cap on to their neighbours, and who rank precept higher than example.

Still, the gospel of charity, however preached, is a good one, and Miss Corelli heightens the effect by a truly lurid picture of the Church of Rome and its leading representatives. Further, she possesses an immense wealth of florid and fluent rhetoric: and—the case of one of our leading morning dailies is perhaps a proof of it—an abundance of words sometimes touching eloquence and sometimes falling into windy verbiage has a wonderful attraction for a vast number of people. Lastly, the book contains an adequate quantity of that sensational element which, the Publisher's Circular informs us, is the chief essential to popular fiction at the present moment. One can hardly keep count in reading "The Master Christian" of the number of suicides, murders, and attempted murders in which the villains of the story are involved. To utilize these qualities with success is a feat one cannot but admire: and it is hardly worth while to dwell on the absurdities of the tale—such as the boy Manuel's interview with the Pope, whom he leaves dumbfounded—or its errors of taste, such as the reference to the private life of a universally respected Roman Catholic family, for which it is impossible to find an excuse. The Cardinal, who is, perhaps, the "hero" of the book, is a fine character, well drawn: Aubrey Leigh, a sort of secondary hero who stands for the enthusiast above mentioned, is a person over whom the judicious cannot but grieve. He calls upon a Roman ecclesiastic at his own house for no purpose but that of lecturing him at enormous length when the latter's time was valuable to him; he does not hesitate to "lie low" when he finds himself well placed for overhearing a conversation in secret; and after rebuking a rather narrow-minded young curate who lost his head at a critical moment, he sends him a rude note to reveal his own identity as the great and popular author Aubrey Leigh, enclosing a number of cuttings from reviews of his highly successful book! Apart from the snobbishness of the proceeding, it is interesting to see in it a trace of the prevalent conviction that a popular writer is necessarily the right person to teach and guide the public on all subjects whatsoever and is always to be listened to with respect. We are afraid we cannot endorse this theory. Miss Corelli herself writes with immense enthusiasm and conviction; her impassioned and effusive plea for Christian charity may do good and can certainly do little harm. But her very want of touch with life and character inevitably inclines one to suspect a similar failure to grapple with facts in her treatment of the Romish Church. And it certainly does not promise well for any real advance in the discussion of such profound and serious subjects as the value of Church discipline and the true method of raising the moral life of the people. This is no question of passion or emotion, but one which needs above all things a wise and statesmanlike consideration of the needs and motive forces of human nature.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The resignation is announced of Mr. E. Gordon Duff, one of the joint librarians of the John Rylands Library at Manchester, whose special knowledge of early printed books must have been of the utmost value in the initiation of the collection. The exhibitions he has organized since the opening of the library have done much to afford an insight into the history of printing and its kindred arts, and proved the best way of displaying the treasures contained in the library. The catalogue, in spite of certain criticisms, is a very valuable basis for further lists, and owes its production entirely to Mr. Duff.

The Diamond Jubilee Library at Weston-super-Mare was opened on September 4th by the President-elect of the Library Association, Sir Edward Fry. Although Weston adopted the Acts as far back as 1886, there had been no attempt to carry them into execution until the conditional offer of a valuable reference library stimulated the citizens to the effort which has completed the library building. As Sir Edward Fry remarked, warmth, light, and a newspaper should not sum up the functions of a library, even in a seaside town with a floating population. He recommended them to read with purpose, and to endeavour to gain full knowledge of one subject, as well as a little of many subjects.

The Australasian colonies are still in the preliminary stage of the public library movement, but it is gratifying to note the earnestness with which they attack the difficulties of distance and organization. The Library Association of Australasia, while unable, as yet, to hold an annual meeting, has established a biennial one. The next gathering will be at Adelaide on October 9th and three following days. A spice of intercolonial rivalry appears in these meetings; the last was held in Sydney, and was a great success. South Australia is invited to make an effort to equal this. The Organizing Committee includes the Chief Justice and the Speaker of the House of Assembly, and the Government has promised liberal assistance.

Some time ago the London School Board prepared a list of books for a Pedagogical Library, selected by experts of the Board as being specially useful to teachers. Feeling, however, that some teachers might not be able to avail themselves, by purchase, of all these text-books, the Board lately issued the list to London Public Libraries, expressing a hope that the works mentioned might be added to the various reference libraries. The list is extensive enough to earn for some of the smaller libraries the reputation of specializing for teachers. Is the progressive London School Board, which is ready to spend money in teaching music and other higher accomplishments to children of the slums, now seeking to thrust a really necessary expense upon other shoulders? There is, too, an old proverb about bringing a horse to the water. If teachers will study these books the expenditure may be justified, but even then such a vicarious generosity is ill bestowed if it makes the public library fulfil the functions of the pedagogical.

Annual reports have been issued by the public libraries of Durban (Natal), Leeds, and Tynemouth, also continuations of the Manchester Libraries Quarterly Record, and the Bootle Library Journal. The Durban report contains a striking side-light on the war. We are told that the reading-room was crowded all day with those who had been driven from their homes, and the issue of books increased by 2,212. The list of papers and magazines taken is an excellent one. Leeds has a record of progress in many ways, although the issue of books has decreased. New branches are being freely established and special lists of books published. To encourage juvenile reading 5,500 recently published children's books have been purchased. The Manchester Record and the Bootle Journal both contain lists of works on China and the far eastern question.

Other publications which have come under our notice include library reports from West Ham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Baillie's Institution, Glasgow, and Hammersmith, also the second number of the Chorley Library Journal. The first mentioned records the results of the fire which so seriously damaged the new central library last year. The work, however, has not been permanently interrupted, and will soon regain its former extent. The staff has been increased owing to the adoption by the Corporation of an eight-hours day. Newcastle notes Mr. David Laing's offer of an art gallery to cost £20,000. A site has been placed at the donor's disposal by the Libraries Committee, who have decided to purchase an adjacent plot with a view to extension. At Hammersmith a new reading-room and book delivery station has been provided. The Chorley Journal contains some interesting notes on books and a list of accessions.

A Glasgow local journal reminds Glasgow people of the treasure they possess in the musical library of Anderson's College, which is open daily without payment. It was bequeathed by the late Mr. William Euing (who also established a lectureship in connexion with the college), and contains some 3,000 volumes and a number of music scores, many of them of great antiquarian interest.

Correspondence.

MULTIPLE REVIEWING AND ITS DANGERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have only just seen a paragraph in your issue of the 1st (p. 146) in which the story is told of two reviewers conspiring to kill the work of a rival. All three were, it seems, folk-lorists, indeed, the only three recognized authorities on a particular branch of folk-lore. Between them the two wicked plotters wrote seventeen notices, all "damning with faint praise" so that the victim's volumes "fell stillborn from the press."

May I venture, in spite of what you have reason to believe authentic evidence, to express my utter disbelief in the story? The writer who records it, in all good faith I doubt not, had his "leg pulled."

I think I am fairly acquainted with the very small (alas!) world of folk-lore; I have also some knowledge of reviewing, some familiarity with notices that appear of works interesting to folk-lorists. It is simply impossible that any two "recognized authorities" in any branch of folk-lore could write seventeen notices between them, for the simple reason that no two could command access to as many papers. But I also wish to add, from my personal knowledge of and friendship with almost every English writer who has any claim to be called an authority on any branch of folk-lore, that not one of them would do such a thing even if he could do it. And here I venture to most earnestly deprecate the insertion of anonymous statements of this kind in a paper such as Literature. The world of English folk-lore is, as I have said, so small, that there are only two or three writers to whom the statement could by any possibility refer. I am convinced that every folk-lorist would at once think of, let us say, M., W., B., and D. The majority of my fellow students would, I am sure, dismiss the story as incredible. None the less in some cases and with some minds it might do harm. Hence my protest, which, in spite of its belatedness, you will, I hope, insert.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

ALFRED NUTT.

Royal Societies Club, St. James's-street, S.W., Sept. 8.

P.S.—May I add, speaking from very considerable experience, that, in the case of a work appealing to a small public of specialists, it is quite out of the power of any reviewer to make or mar the future of a book?

 We willingly insert Mr. Nutt's letter, despite the fact that he seems to have quite misread our paragraph. We agree with him that to insert anonymous statements such as he describes would be very undesirable. We agree with him also that such a proceeding as our paragraph described would at the present moment be impossible. Indeed, in the sphere of folk-lore, Mr. Nutt's own testimony would be quite sufficient, for no one can speak with more authority than he. But he apparently did not observe that the event took place many years ago and that all the actors in it are dead. We were careful to state this, and should certainly not have told the story otherwise. We can assure him that the story is a true one and that the writer who records it has not had his "leg pulled." In these circumstances, we are strongly of opinion that the story has a value and well deserved publicity as an illustration of the possible dangers of multiple reviewing. Putting folk-lore out of the question, we are by no means sure that, in these days of great specialization the warning conveyed by the story is likely in the future to be wholly inapplicable.—ED.

LITERARY PIRACY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Some time since I noticed among the new publications, I think it was in The Times, but am not certain of it, Mr. Albert D. Vandam's new book "A Court Tragedy," and having read with great pleasure "An Englishman in Paris," and other stories of this writer, I noted the new book down amongst others for reading in its turn. Lately I sent for it, and what was my astonishment to find on reading it that what purports to be an original story is nothing but an adaptation, in many cases a translation (with the exceptions, as under) of a German story called "Othello," by Wm. Hauff. No hint is given that "A Court Tragedy" is not original, unless the following sentence, given in the introductory chapter of "The Colonel's Story," can be understood by any one:—

> The events I am going to relate to you are partly known to many German Court chroniclers, and so is the legend which preceded these events by a great many years. The latter has been used by at least one German novelist a long while ago.

I have the two books before me, Wilhelm Hauff's "Othello," in the original German, published by Riegers, Stuttgart, 1851, and Mr. Vandam's "A Court Tragedy," published by Chatto and Windus, 1900.

The differences, of little moment, are: In the German "Othello," the story is told in the third person, the hero or villain appears under his own proper name without disguise, and makes the acquaintance of his friend, a German major, on one of the Polish battlefields.

In "A Court Tragedy" there is an introductory chapter, called the "Editor's Story," consisting of about 20 pages, introducing the narrator, an English colonel, who tells the story in the first person, becomes a friend of the hero on one of the Crimean battlefields, the latter for political and other reasons assuming a false name, and appearing in the guise of an operatic singer. The introduction of the foreign singer and the episode referring to her is also new.

With the exception of these alterations, necessitating some slight changes, "A Court Tragedy" is a simple reproduction of "Othello," by W. Hauff. Surely this may justly be termed "Literary Piracy." Yours truly,

July 30. A CONSTANT READER.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Many readers of the writings of the author of "Poe's'le Yarns," have inferred that he was likely to be a good letter-writer, and were accordingly specially interested by Messrs. Constable's announcement that a collection, in two volumes, of the late Rev. T. E. Brown's letters was shortly to see the light. Nor, it seems, is the expectation to be disappointed, for we find Mr. S. T. Irwin, the editor of the letters, pronouncing them some of the best letters in the language, and talking of them in the same breath with Gray's and Cowper's, and Byron's, and Lamb's, and FitzGerald's. This is to raise expectation to the highest pitch. Mr. Brown, as perhaps is now generally known, was one of the masters at Clifton College, the school of Mr. Quiller Couch, and Mr. Henry Newbolt. One will look with interest for the reviews of the letters in the Speaker and the new Monthly Review.

Professor Dowden, who excited wide attention and interest by his advocacy in this journal of a scheme to do for our literature what has been so successfully done for France by the history edited by the late Professor Petit de Julleville, has himself taken no insignificant share in the literary education of his generation, both by his printed books and by his professorial work at Trinity College, Dublin. He has, moreover, been notably successful in training certain other teachers of literature, who are carrying on his good work in other centres. His next book, which is promised by Messrs. Kegan Paul early next month, is devoted to the subject of "Puritanism and English Literature." The view which (perhaps largely owing to Matthew Arnold's phrase, about the English spirit having the key turned on it for a hundred years) has obtained widely that Puritanism was wholly inimical to literature is no longer likely to be held without qualification.

Messrs. Longmans have announced for the 6th of next month the publication of Mr. A. W. Jackson's "James Martineau: a Biography and a Study." It may be hoped that the biography will do something to make the general English reader realize more fully than he would hitherto appear to have done the important influence Martineau exercised during his long life on the higher ethical speculation in this country. Bred in a utilitarian atmosphere, a personal friend of John Mill, he insisted, long before the rise of New Kantianism in England, on the insufficiency of the utilitarian or hedonistic basis for a true theory of morals, and to the end continued to throw all the weight of his character and teaching into the opposite scale. Nor was Martineau altogether enamoured of our latest methods and doctrines with regard to the education of the people. He once professed that he expected to see the day when the State would be called upon to pay the poor parent for lending his child to be educated.

Family history is assuming more and more importance. Mr. J. H. Round's new book, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Constable, is entitled "Studies in Peerage and Family History," and, it is said, will make some amusing revelations on the subject of fictitious pedigrees and throw fresh light on problems connected with the peerage. The proud owners of doubtful pedigrees and fancy coats of arms have not been having altogether a quiet time of it lately, what with the terrible X. of the Saturday Review and other inquisitive iconoclasts. And Mr. Horace Round is eminently a man, in Mr. Punch's phrase, to "give them fits." Mr. Round, it will be remembered, was the author of a trenchant article in the Quarterly on Freeman's flaws and faults as an historian, which made its appearance shortly after Freeman's death. When adverse comment was made on the critic's prudence in waiting till his antagonist was powerless to reply, Mr. Round was permitted to avow his authorship, and was in a position to prove not only that the article had been written while Freeman was alive, but, furthermore, that he had not shrunk from making over his own signature the same charges against Freeman while Freeman was alive. The article is not likely to be forgotten as it was the fons et origo of a bitter and prolonged controversy about a point in the account of the Battle of Hastings between Mr. Round, Mr. Archer, and others.

In "Humphry Clinker" Smollett described Walter Macfarlane "the greatest genealogist I ever knew in any country, and perfectly acquainted with all the antiquities of Scotland." The late Sir William Fraser conferred the right upon his trustees to publish the "Genealogical Collections concerning Families in Scotland, made by Walter Macfarlane, 1750-1751." The trustees resolved to print these collections and to present them to the members of the Scottish History Society. They are now in the hands of the society in the shape of two handsome volumes. The work of editor has been done by Mr. James Toshach Clark, the Keeper of the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, who has "endeavoured to reproduce as faithfully as possible the manuscript as it stands." No attempt has been made to fill up the numerous blanks in the narratives, to correct errors, or to rectify the spelling. What Mr. Clark has done is done well, but it is unfortunate that his view of the duties of editorship should have been so very restricted. The present volumes will certainly make the Macfarlane collections much more easily accessible, but they might have been made even more valuable. Walter Macfarlane, who formed the collections, was one of the most accurate antiquaries of his age. He died at his town house in Edinburgh in 1767, and in 1785 his niece, Miss Janet Macfarlane, sold his collection of manuscripts, including his "Genealogical Collections," his "Geographical Collections," and many other papers to the Faculty of Advocates for the sum of twenty guineas! For more than a century the "Genealogical Collections" have been constantly consulted by inquirers into Scottish family history. This mass of genealogical information is now to appear in print for the first time.

A correspondent writes:—

The last novel of Mr. W. E. Norris, "The Flower of the Flock," which has just been published by Messrs. Nisbet, is the latest illustration of the inconvenience to writers and readers alike which is continually being caused by the lack of any legal copyright in a title. A novel with a precisely similar title was written by the late Pierce Egan. It is true, of course, that though there is no copyright in a title qua title, a certain measure of protection is given to authors by common law, which recognizes a property in a title, but it is much to be desired that the law as to titles could be assimilated with that which governs trade-marks.

Mr. Christopher St. John, the author of "The Crimson Weed," writes to point out that in our appreciative notice of his novel we inadvertently gave a somewhat wrong impression of one point in the story—viz., as to the death of Maria Anguissola. This does not take place early in the book, as a reader might infer from our review. It was in fact to a great extent the way in which her struggle to uproot the weed "wild justice" from her son's mind is narrated that we considered worthy of special commendation.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall's Authentic Edition of the Works of Charles Dickens will begin to appear early in October, and will be completed in 21 volumes, price 5s. a volume, with the original illustrations and a coloured frontispiece to each volume. "Pickwick" will be the first to appear, then "A Tale of Two Cities," and the rest will be published at the rate of two volumes a month.

A translation of Dante G. Rossetti's sonnet series, "The House of Life," by Otto Hauser, is running the gauntlet of criticism in Germany. Most of the reviewers find the poems wanting in warm human sympathy, but praise the grandeur of Rossetti's wealth of ideas. The latest contribution to the series of researches in the History of Modern Literature, edited by Dr. Franz Muncker, is a pamphlet on Sterne and Wieland, proving, from a careful study of Wieland's letters, the influence of the English humorist upon the first modern German romance-writer.

"Semantics," the English translation of Professor Bréal's contribution to the science of meaning, will be published by Mr. Heinemann in October. Professor J. P. Postgate introduces it in a preface. Professor Postgate has given a sum of about £50 to the Council of University College for the encouragement of research in comparative philology. It is hoped that this will form the nucleus of a larger fund.

Messrs. Constable opened their autumn season this week. Among their volumes are the second volume of "Travels in the East of Nicholas II.," written by order of the Tsar by Prince Ookhtomsky, and translated by Mr. Robert Goodlet; "A History of Education," by Mr. Thomas Davidson; "The Mind of Tennyson," by Professor E. Hershey Sneath; "Elementary Studies in Chemistry," by Mr. Joseph Torrey, Instructor in Yale University; and a novel by Marian Bower, entitled "The Puppet Show." Next week the same publishers expect to follow with the "Letters of T. E. Brown"; "Practical Electro-Chemistry," by Bertram Blount; and "The Princess Story-Book," being historical stories collected out of English romantic literature in illustration of the reigns of English Monarchs from the Conquest to Queen Victoria (uniform with the "King's," "Queen's," and "Prince's Story-Books"), edited by Mr. G. Laurence Gomme. The second volume of "The Paston Letters," edited by Mr. James Gairdner, will also be ready immediately, and the third volume will be issued early next month. In the new edition of "The Paston Letters" the separate prefaces and introductions to the three volumes by Mr. Gairdner will be superseded by a general preface and a general introduction in a volume by itself. This prefatory volume will contain a supplement, in which the Roydon Hall Letters, noticed at the end of the third volume, will be printed from the original MSS. now in the British Museum, with a few other originals. Messrs. Constable have taken over from Messrs. Sands the last work written by the late Mr. Traill, "England, Egypt, and the Soudan," and will publish it towards the end of the month. About the same time they will bring out a history of "The Fight with France for North America," by Mr. J. A. Bradley, the biographer of General Wolfe, and author of "Old Virginia." A volume of sermons by Archdeacon Wilson may be expected about the 24th inst., entitled "Things Old and New"—a selection from the author's sermons preached to his congregation at Rochdale. This volume is an attempt to show that the old truths of revelation gain force from the new truths reached by scientific and historical methods. "Modern Astronomy," by Professor H. H. Turner, should make its appearance early next month, giving an account of the changes and methods of astronomical science during the last quarter of a century. The beginning of October, too, will see Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's new volume of essays on "War and Policy"; Mr. J. Horace Round's "Peerage and other Studies in Family History"; and a book on Hayti by Mr. Hesketh Prichard, entitled "Where Black rules White." Several later volumes should be mentioned before exhausting Messrs. Constable's new list. One is "Ephemera Critica: Plain Truths about Current Literature," by Mr. John Churton Collins, described as "a series of studies in serious, patient, and absolutely impartial criticism, having for its object a comprehensive survey of the vices and defects, as well as the merits, characteristic of current Belles Lettres." Another volume is "Through Siberia," by Mr. J. Stadling, edited by Dr. F. H. H. Guillemard, giving an account of the author's journey through Northern Siberia, the ethnology of the native races, the exile system, and the Trans-Siberian Railway. A third is "Dante and Giovanni del Vergilio," including a critical edition of Dante's "Eclogæ Latinæ" and of the poetic remains of Giovanni del Vergilio, by Philip H. Wicksteed and Edmund G. Gardner.

Yet another edition of Shakespeare is announced. It is to come from Messrs. Blackie and Son. "Blackie's Picture Shakespeare," as it is to be called, will include all the chief plays, in single volumes, with coloured frontispieces and illustrations in black and white. The text will be revised "for home and school," and accompanied by explanatory notes. The two next volumes for Messrs. Blackie's Victorian Era Series will be "Indian Life and Thought since the Mutiny," by R. P. Karkaria, and "Ireland during the Victorian Era," by J. A. R. Marriott. The same publishers announce "The Parliament of Scotland," by Robert S. Rait, which is believed to be the first attempt to treat the constitutional side of Scottish history otherwise than as incidental to the general history of Scotland. The book is based upon the essay on the Scottish Parliament which won the Stanhope Prize at Oxford last year. Mr. Rait has also arranged "The Story of Prince Charlie" from "Tales of a Grandfather" for Blackie's Library of Famous Books. Another interesting item is "The Story of Don Quixote," retold by Judge Parry and illustrated by Walter Crane. Judge Parry has abridged Cervantes for the younger generation of readers. A comparatively fresh field of romance for the same class of readers has been opened up by Professor Macmillan, of Elphinstone College, Bombay, whose knowledge of Indian literature has led to a volume of "Tales of Indian Chivalry," which Messrs. Blackie have in preparation. Mr. G. A. Henty, who will publish three books with them during the autumn, has not unnaturally turned to South Africa for at least one of his plots. "With Buller in Natal" is the title of this book, and it deals with the perilous doings of a band of boy scouts. Mr. Henty's other volumes are "In the Irish Brigade: A Tale of War in Flanders and Spain," and "Out with Garibaldi: A Story of the Liberation of Italy." Another story of the Boer war, "With Rifle and Bayonet," is told by Captain F. S. Brereton, R.A.M.C., who is now on active service at the front, and who has also written for the present season a tale of Cromwell's invasion of Ireland, entitled "In the King's Service." Other autumn books in Messrs. Blackie's list are "Three Fair Maids," by Katherine Tynan; "In Far Bolivia," by Dr. Gordon Stables; "Boy Crusoes," adapted from the Russian by Léon Golschmann; "Cynthia's Bonnet Shop," by Rose Mulholland (Lady Gilbert); "Queen Charlotte's Maidens," by Sarah Tytler; and "Droll Doings," another volume of animal caricatures, by Mr. H. B. Neilson.

At the end of this month Messrs. Walter Scott will begin a new series of Manuals of Employment for Educated Women, edited by Christabel Osborn. The first two volumes will be "Secondary Teaching," by Christabel Osborn and Florence B. Low, with an introduction by Miss E. P. Hughes, associate of Newnham College; and "Elementary Teaching," by Christabel Osborn, with an introduction by Sir Joshua Fitch. The editor will also write the third volume, dealing with "Sick Nursing," and other volumes will follow on "Medicine," "Art," "Crafts," and other occupations suitable for girls of the educated classes who wish to earn their own living. A new volume will be added to Messrs. Scott's Contemporary Science Series early next month, entitled "The Child: a Study in the Evolution of Man," by Dr. Alexander F. Chamberlain, whose book attempts to give an exhaustive summary of recent investigations. The first volume of the Contemporary Science Series was Professors Geddes and Thompson's "Evolution of Sex," issued in 1889, and the publishers now announce that a fourth edition of this work, completely revised, is in preparation. The book has been brought up to date, the number of references increased, and sundry criticisms have been accepted, but the general thesis remains the same. A third edition is in preparation, too, of Mr. Havelock Ellis' volume on "The Criminal," in the same series, in which nearly every chapter has been rewritten. The next volume in the Scott library—to appear towards the end of the month—will be a new translation of "The Letters of the Younger Pliny," with an introductory essay by Mr. John B. Firth, late scholar of Queen's College, Oxford. It will be followed in October by "Selected Thoughts of Blaise Pascal," translated and edited by Gertrude Burford Rawlings. The selection has been taken from the French text of M. Michaut, who was the first to publish an exact text in the order of the original MS. A later volume in the Scott library will be "Scott's Essayists: From Stirling to Stevenson," edited, with an introduction, by Oliphant Smeaton.

The most important announcement in Messrs. Pearson's list is "The Great People Series," edited by Professor F. York Powell, who describes the series as "not so much a set of political, military, or social histories, as a sequence of readable studies on the tendencies and potencies of the chief peoples of the earth." Volume I. will be "The Spanish People," by Major Martin A. S. Hume. Another series which Messrs. Pearson are starting is "The Illustrated Scarlet Library," which will consist of an edition of standard works by popular authors beginning this month with "The Pilgrim's Progress," illustrated by H. M. Brock. "The Wide, Wide World," illustrated by F. Pegram, will follow next month, and "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in November. Other works in Messrs. Pearson's list not already announced by us, are "Wooings and Weddings in many Climes," by Louise Jordan Miln; "North American Indians of To-day," by George Bird Grinnell; and "Abyssinia," by Herbert Vivian. Their novels will include "The Woman of Death," by Guy Boothby; "The Plunder Ship," by Headon Hill; "Joan Brotherhood," by Bernard Capes, and "A Patched-up Affair," by Florence Warden.

Among their autumn publications Messrs. Jarrold have two novels coming from Maurus Jokai ("The Day of Wrath" and "A Christian but a Roman"), and a work by another Hungarian novelist, Kálmán Mikszáth, entitled "St. Peter's Umbrella." Mikszáth's book has been translated by W. B. Worswick, contains an introduction by R. Nisbet Bain, and will be published next week. Messrs. Jarrold also announce "Marya Rodziewicz's Distaff," translated from the Polish by Count Stanislaus C. de Soissons; a romance of old Virginia, by Hulbert Fuller, entitled "Vivian of Virginia"; "The Gray House of the Quarries," by Mary H. Norris; "Carpathia Knox," by Curtis Yorke; "The Man who Forgot," by John Mackie; and "A Woman's Burden," by Fergus Hume. Chief among their new gift-books will be "Christ in Sacred Art," by Joseph Lewis French, with reproductions from paintings by the great masters.

Messrs. Methuen will publish in a few days at 3s. 6d. a book entitled "The People of China," by J. W. Robertson-Scott, "to supply in a form as compact and as interesting as possible information which an intelligent newspaper reader is likely to want."

Mr. Gilbert Parker's string of stories of Pontiac, giving a picture of life in our French dominions, will be published by Mr. Heinemann on October 4th under the title of "The Lane that had no Turning."

A new translation of the two meditations which Savonarola wrote in prison after his first "examination"—one on the Miserere (51st Psalm), and the other on the 31st Psalm—is being published, together with the Latin text, by the Cambridge University Press. Dr. Perowne is responsible for the new translation. The Latin text is based on a manuscript containing the meditations in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge.

Mr. Arthur Rackham will contribute one hundred illustrations to Mrs. Edgar Lucas' new translation of Grimm's Fairy Tales, which Mr. Freemantle will publish in the autumn. It will contain new stories not generally included in the English editions. Mr. Freemantle has also in preparation a new translation by Mrs. A. M. Richards of Fouqué's "Sintram and his Companions," illustrated by Miss Anna Richards.

The Columbus Company announce a "History of Servia." Its author is Madame Elodie Mijatovich, wife of King Alexander of Servia's Minister at Constantinople, previously Minister to the Court of St. James'.

Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt's "History of the Venetian Republic," published forty years ago, is being re-issued by Messrs. A. and C. Black as an almost entirely new work, re-arranged and augmented, bringing down the narrative for the first time to the close of Venetian independence.

The scene of Mr. Bloundelle Burton's new romance "Servants of Sin" is laid in the period of the Regency of the Duc d'Orleans, and its setting is the terrible plague of Marseilles. The book is to be published by Messrs. Methuen on the 25th.

Nottinghamshire folk, and antiquarians generally, will welcome a book (to be published by subscription) by Mr. A. Stapleton, 15, Carlton-road, Nottingham, on the Gotham tales. "Nottinghamshire's ancient, famous, and only jest book, and the only English local collection of stories of simpletons." The title of the book is "All about the Merry Tales of Gotham."

Captain Philip Herbert Hove is about to publish with Mr. Elliot Stock his father's manuscript "History of Wexford," in three quarto vols., with illustrations. The first volume carries the History of Old and New Ross from the earliest times to the Rebellion of 1798.

The report of the expeditions organised by the British Astronomical Association to observe the total Solar Eclipse of May 28th, 1900, are contained in a volume which is being issued from the office of Knowledge, and edited by Mr. E. Walter Maunder.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Lord Salisbury's alleged indifference to the interests of literature will be considered by some of his critics to be established by the announcement that the general election is to take place in the middle of the autumn publishing season. That season cannot but suffer in consequence, though we may hope that it will not be crushed as completely as was the summer season of 1897 by the Diamond Jubilee. The serious aspect of the situation, from the publishers' point of view, is that the decision has been taken so late that it will be hard for them to modify their arrangements in view of it. On the other hand, they may be glad that the blow should fall quickly instead of hanging indefinitely over their heads; and, if it so happens that the election and the return of the warriors from South Africa take place in the same season, the coincidence of the two events will, at any rate, be something to the good.

The Monthly Review certainly surpasses all the other monthly reviews in the magnificence of its appearance. It is better printed, on better paper, than any of its rivals. The illustrations which accompany an article by Mr. Roger G. Fry on "Art before Giotto" are admirable. The clou of the number is undoubtedly the excerpt from the autobiography of the Amir of Afghanistan, shortly to be published by Mr. Murray. This is full of good things; and not the least interesting passage is that in which Abdur Rahman describes his attitude towards literature:—

> I do not go to sleep directly I lie down in bed, but the person who is specially appointed as my reader sits down beside my bed and reads to me from some book, as, for instance, histories of different countries and peoples; books on geography, biographies of great Kings and reformers, and political works. I listen to this reading until I go to sleep, when a story-teller takes his place, repeating his narratives until I awake in the morning. This is very soothing.

In the same magazine Mr. A. T. Quiller Couch writes of "T. E. B."—the poet of the Isle of Man. It will be news to many readers that "T. E. B." was once headmaster of the Crypt School, Gloucester, and that one of his pupils there was Mr. W. E. Henley, destined later to be one of "T. E. B.'s" most sympathetic editors. From Gloucester he went to take the modern side at Clifton; and there Mr. Couch and the editor of the Monthly Review were under him. Mr. Couch's reminiscence of his first interview with the Clifton master is interesting:—

> A candidate for a scholarship at Clifton—awkward, and abominably conscious of it, and sensitive—I had been billeted on Brown's hospitality without his knowledge. The mistake (I cannot tell who was responsible) could not be covered out of sight; it was past all aid of kindly dissimulation by the time Brown returned to find the unwelcome guest bathing in shame upon his door-step. Can I say more than that he took me into the family circle—by no means an expansive one, or accustomed, as some are, to open gleefully to intruders—and for the inside of a week treated me with a consideration so quiet and pleasant, so easy yet attentive, that his dearest friend or most distinguished visitor could not have demanded more? A boy notes these things and remembers.

Mr. Anthony Hope's new novel, "Tristrem of Blent," also begins its serial course in the first number.

There is no fatality in human knowledge, not even in that of the modern editor of an English Classic or of the contributor to the National Biographical Dictionary. A good object lesson in the general uncertainty of things is a little pamphlet just published by Mr. W. H. Bartlett, in which Mr. Willis, Judge of County Courts, prints in its original style (though not in facsimile) the first edition of Thomson's "Winter." The Judge prefixes an introduction which will make those who pin their faith on "well-known authorities" open their eyes. Thomson has been pretty thoroughly dealt with by scholars during the last few years. There is the life by Mr. Leslie Stephen. Mr. Logie Robertson and Mr. Tovey have made careful studies of the poet's life and works. Mr. Seccombe has written about him in the Dictionary of Biography. These are highly respectable names well representing our age of accurate literary research. Alas for the fallibility of man! One day there comes a learned and painstaking lawyer who happens to be, too, a scholar with a "job" on hand, but a real enthusiast, and quietly floats these excellent critics—with all the restless air of the single-minded seeker after truth—of all kinds of mis-statements and inaccuracies. One of these indeed, as Judge Willis shows, has produced a text of "The Seasons," which, though it is assuredly would delight the soul of the poet, contains a host of serious textual errors which, as the Judge boldly suggests, "would grieve him." We do not say that the large number of points put right by Mr. Willis—as to Thomson's publisher, the prices of his books, small details of his life, minor variants in his text—are of overwhelming importance; but that there should, in these days of exact scholarship, be so many of them, provides some food for thought.

* * * *

Mr. G. W. T. Omond's North American Review article on the "Art of Robert Louis Stevenson" demonstrates, what indeed was not unknown, that Stevenson achieved his success by means of taking pains. The fact is the more interesting because the writers of historical romance have often succeeded without taking pains, and because failure has generally been the lot of those of them who have been most laborious. Dumas never really knew his subjects; his pages abound with inaccuracies. But no historical novelist has ever been more successful; perhaps none has ever done better work. On the other hand, Flaubert studied Carthage as profoundly as Mommsen studied Rome, and he was a man of genius; but how many of us can lay our hands upon our hearts and say that we have read "Salammbo" and desire to read it again? Stevenson studied like Flaubert, yet saw his subjects with Dumas' romantic eye.

* * * *

Mr. Omond gives us some idea of the trouble he took about "Kidnapped":

> The historical portion of the plot was found in Volume XIX. of the "State Trials," where the trial of James Stewart and Alan Breck Stewart, for the murder of Colin Campbell of Glenure, occupies between two and three hundred closely printed columns. Having studied every line of the evidence with minute care, he read all round the subject, borrowing from the Advocates' Library (for a length of time which called forth expostulations, fortunately for the world quite unheeded, from the keeper and other people) every book or pamphlet from which he could glean anything to help him in producing a vivid picture of the state of Scotland during the years which followed the Forty-Five.

It is much to Stevenson's credit that he could pursue such searches and not be made dull by them. The use which he could make of any picturesque incident which he met in his documents is illustrated by Mr. Omond by many comparisons. The following parallel columns are particularly striking:—

"Kidnapped," p. 207.	"State Trials," XIX., p. 111.
But he was a man of more resources than I knew; searched the wood until he found a quill of a cushat dove, which he slipped into a pen; made himself a kind of ink with gunpowder from his horn and water from the running stream; and tearing a corner from his French military commission (which he carried in his pocket, like a talisman to keep him from the gallows) he sat down and wrote as follows.	Alan looked about among the trees, and finding a wood-pigeon's quill, made a pen of it, and having made ink of some powder he took out of a powder-horn that was in his pocket, he wrote a letter.

* * * *

One result of the settlement in South Africa will be a demand for schoolmasters in that country. This is one of the conclusions as to the future which Mr. C. D. Hope arrives at in the last of a series of articles on education which he has contributed to the University Correspondent. We only hope that the result which Mr. Hope anticipates will mitigate that grievance concerning salaries of which Mr. Rouse finds occasion to complain. It will hardly do so unless endowments are liberally provided; but there ought to be no difficulty on that score. Mr. Hope looks to the Home Government for help. We on our part, with the income-tax at its present figure, are more disposed to appeal to the local millionaire. A college in Pretoria would cost less to build than a mansion in Park-lane, and would bestow a worthier immortality upon its founder; and there are still plenty of people in South Africa who are richer than any of the pious founders and benefactors of our own colleges and grammar schools. In America the practice is to give such a scheme a start by announcing, without authority, that a particular millionaire has undertaken to see it through; but we cannot go beyond recommending the idea generally to those whom it concerns.

* * * *

We told the story last week of the rejection of "John Inglesant" by a great publishing house on the advice of Mr. James Payn. The story of the ultimate acceptance of the novel is also interesting, and is told in the Puritan by Mr. J. A. Hammerton. It was first printed for private circulation. Of an edition of a hundred, seventy-five were distributed by Mr. Shorthouse among his friends, and the remaining twenty-five were published at Birmingham, in July, 1880, at one guinea each:—

> It so happened that a friend of the author living at Oxford was amongst the seventy-five favoured with a copy, and this, after reading, he sent to Mrs. Humphry Ward, who as a keen judge of literature could not fail to be impressed with the marvellous power of the book, and she soon afterwards spoke of it to Mr. Macmillan, who in turn immediately recognized in it the highest literary qualities, and set about to obtain the author's consent to its publication. We have thus the unique spectacle of publisher and critics urging a new writer to allow his work to be presented to the reading public, and so it came about that "John Inglesant" was properly published in two octavo volumes in the spring of 1881.

* * * *

This generation is so fond of literary "series" that it is almost surprising that it should have been left for Mr. Lane, at this late time of day, to initiate a collection of "all that the great English poets have written about love." It is true that the work has been attempted on the tiny scale of the anthologist by Mr. William Watson, whose "Lyric Love," garnered eight years ago, "from honeyed slopes of England's Helicon," aimed at "the bringing together . . . of all the best English poetry having love as its personal inspiration or its objective theme." Mr. Lane's "Lover's Library" appears to be planned on a larger scale. One reason why it has not been attempted before may be based on the well-known proposition of Coleridge's. Coleridge avers that—

> All thoughts, all passions, all delights,
> Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
> All are but ministers of love,
> And feed his sacred flame.

On that showing Mr. Lane would be aiming at nothing less than a complete edition of the English poets. It is not likely that the task of Johnson, Chalmers, Anderson, and Bell will ever be tried again. The Corpus Poetarum Britannicorum has grown too vast for any publisher to attack in its entirety. As a matter of fact, though it is not very easy to assign the limitations by which Coleridge's net may be narrowed we all know well enough what is meant by a love poem, and an editor of discrimination could easily select the volumes of Shelley and Browning with which the series is to open. In some cases the work has already been done; thus Sir George Douglas has sorted out the "Love Poems of Robert Burns," and Dr. Garnett has given us a "Florilegium Amantis" from the works of Coventry Patmore. Whatever be the literary success of Mr. Lane's series, one may safely prophesy that it will be in great demand for wedding presents.

* * * *

There is no literary parallel, so far as we remember, to the case of the sculptor who fell in love with his own creation. Indeed, the arts of painting and sculpture have shown a power to provoke a romance to which neither the poet nor the novelist can lay claim. History affords not a few instances in which a man or a woman has fallen in love with some "counterfeit presentment," but hardly any in which the description of a writer has set hearts aflame and gallants sighing for its original. The readers of German newspapers lately thought that they had at last discovered an exception to this rule. An advertisement was for some time to be seen in the principal journals in which a nobleman of high rank and great wealth declared that he had fallen in love with the heroine of a certain popular novel, and would only marry a girl who could establish her resemblance to the novelist's creation. This aroused as much excitement in the larger half of the German Empire as greeted the ambassadors sent out by the King of Egypt to find a claimant for the slipper of Rhodope. Every marriageable girl with any lurking romance in her composition appears to have made haste to procure the book and see whether she had any pretensions to "fill the bill." Not a few came to the conclusion that they might have sat for the portrait of this engaging heroine, and the publishers of the novel were overwhelmed with letters requesting to be put in communication with the nobleman in question. Now—alas for romance!—it appears that the whole affair was what has been described at various ages of our language as a "bite," a "ban," a "do," or a "sell." There never was any such nobleman, and the advertisement was inserted by the publishers as a device to quicken the sale of their book. The consequence is that much feminine indignation has been lavished, not without reason, on the author who permitted, and the publishers who invented, so base a deception. We should not be at all surprised to hear that the next novel of the author in question had been boycotted by all the women of Germany, and such of their male relatives as they can wean from the German taste for sentimental stories.

* * * *

However questionable the taste of these German publishers may seem, it must be admitted that methods as dubious have before now been adopted in our own country. The classic instance, of course, is to be found in Defoe's audacious account of the apparition of Mrs. Veal. A bookseller who, in 1705, had printed a large edition of a translation of a very dull work by one Drelincourt, called "The Christian's Defence against the Fear of Death," found the stock hang upon his hands. With the fear of bankruptcy before his eyes, he applied for assistance to "unabashed Defoe." That ingenious gentleman devoted the extraordinary power of verisimilitude which was afterwards to give the world "Robinson Crusoe" to composing the account of how one Mrs. Veal appeared to a neighbour the day after her death. Among a host of the most natural details, he insinuated a recommendation of Drelincourt's book as "the best on that subject ever written." It needed a ghost from the grave to tell the public this, but the effect was immediate and wonderful. "'Drelincourt upon Death,' attested by one who could speak from experience," says Sir Walter Scott, "took an unequalled run. The copies had hung on the bookseller's hands as heavy as a pile of lead bullets. They now traversed the town in every direction, like the same balls discharged from a field-piece." In comparison with this trick, the German advertisement is hardly blameworthy; nor, indeed, can we cast a stone at its intention when we think of the self-advertisement to which some of our own most popular authors lend themselves every day.

The Outsider in Journalism.

We once had the pleasure of hearing a smart American journalist expound his views on the subject of smart editing. Among other things he insisted on the importance of securing the collaboration of people who were talked about—adding that their literary abilities and their knowledge of the subject of which they were to write were perfectly irrelevant considerations. "If," he said, "you hear that a man has fallen off a ladder and broken his leg in two places, send round right then and get his views on the Dreyfus case." Our friend was exaggerating, as the citizens of the United States occasionally do, but he had his eye on a tendency of modern journalism which found its counterpart in politics when it was seriously proposed that the Tichborne claimant should stand for Parliament. The matter has at last attracted the attention of our own Institute of Journalists. That body has voted a resolution deprecating the insertion in newspapers of articles by "persons of wealth and position," who, by writing for their amusement, take the bread out of the mouths of those who write for their living. For all the practical result their vote is likely to have the assembled persons might as well have deprecated the reprinting of the classics on the ground that there were "too many dead people in it" for literature to be as prosperous a trade as it ought to be. Both are corollaries of the same theorem—that journalism exists for the benefit of journalists, and that literature exists for the benefit of men of letters. This theorem is not only incapable of proof, but is also untrue, and therefore both corollaries fall to the ground together; and the reasons against admitting to journalism the contributions of "the outsider" can only be examined from other points of view. The protest is, we suppose, aimed primarily at the distinguished contributor—usually a lady of title—who is encouraged to say nothing in particular in some of the magazines, and whose contributions "crowd-out" those of other people. In so far as it is a matter for regret, the journalists who have just met in conference are themselves responsible for it. It is they who have cultivated the taste that demands it. It is they who have fostered the demand for personalia. The public has feasted on the portrait, the autograph, and photographs of the private boudoir of some notable lady who has been indiscreet enough to supply them. It reads with intense interest the remarkable fact that yesterday afternoon a journalist saw her in Bond-street. With what elated curiosity does the same public find this interesting personage positively speaking to them in more or less familiar language in their favourite magazine! What she writes about, or whether she says anything worth saying, matters nothing. It is all very foolish, and we quite understand that it causes some soreness among lady journalists, though we are not sure that the average lady journalist always writes better than the outsiders; but to protest is about as idle as to protest against the laws of nature. One of the legitimate purposes of newspapers and magazines is to gratify the public curiosity; and the public is undeniably more curious to read the opinions (on some subjects, at all events) of ladies of title than those of anonymous writers of greater literary gifts. Consequently the editor of a periodical of a certain sort can no more afford to select his contributors solely with reference to their talents and their pecuniary necessities than the proprietor of a wax-work show can afford to choose his models on such principles. Moreover, there are some subjects about which the illustrious outsider is really apt to know more than writers, however gifted, who have climbed the ladder of journalism from the lowest rung. In fact, these contributions may be accepted on their merits, and then—cadit quæstio. Even a member of the Institute of Journalists would not contend that any of Macaulay's essays ought to have been declined by the editor of the Edinburgh Review on the ground that their author held an office of profit under the Crown, or that the editor of the Nineteenth Century should have refused to allow Mr. Gladstone to review "Robert Elsmere," because some member of the Writers' Club was equally willing to "notice" it, and stood in greater need of the money. On the whole the community is, we fancy, a gainer by the new practice. After all there is some meaning in the old phrase, "a republic of letters," and in the arena of journalism, where everybody comes to listen, any citizen who has something to say has a right to be heard. Journalism is not so wholly single-minded and independent nor so wholly devoted to the highest graces of style that it can be trusted to become a close corporation from which outsiders are debarred. And surely the journalist whose mission it is to instruct and cultivate the public should welcome any means of encouraging those in whose intellectual welfare he is so much concerned to express themselves in print, and to show an intelligent interest in matters literary, political, and social. The opportunity outsiders have of speaking through the newspapers is all in favour of the growth of an enlightened public spirit. Nor is there any reason to believe that this competition of the outsiders really does professional journalists any injury. It certainly may not always raise the standard of literary excellence to which they are expected to conform; but it does increase the popularity and prosperity of periodicals. And in the long run, the prosperity of periodicals, makes for the prosperity of those who write for them for a living.

Personal Views.

THE THACKERAY MICROBE.

When will some enlightened bibliographer arise to sing the praises of the "second edition"? Corrections and improvements apart, it is here that we look for that important factor in the history of any great work—the author's reply to his earliest critics.

Some think the author should never intervene in defence of his own creation—doubtless a sound rule. But is there anything in Dickens much finer than the truculent and racy outburst prefixed to the second edition of "Oliver Twist"? Dickens, it is true, is more concerned with the cause of the poor and fatherless than with his own literary reputation, which he seems to have thought could take care of itself. That is not quite the case with the preface to the second edition of "The Kicklebury's on the Rhine," which I have just been reading.

In the well-known "Christmas Books" we have what the author considered a cheery bit of "farce" suited to the festive season. In the preface aforesaid we have what The Times reviewer thought of it, and what the author thought of The Times reviewer.

> In the Christmas Book under notice [says the critic, after reflecting on the Christmas Book in general as a rather conventional and commercial product] appears in propriâ personâ (under the thin disguise of Mr. Michael Angelo Titmarsh) the popular author, the contributor to Punch, the remorseless pursuer of unconscious vulgarity and feebleminedness, launched upon a tour of relaxation to the Rhine. But . . . from the moment his eye lights upon a luckless family group, the sight of his accustomed quarry—vulgarity, imbecility, and affectation—reanimates his relaxed sinews; and playfully fastening his satiric fangs upon the familiar prey, he dallies with it in mimic ferocity like a satiated mouser.

A turn too candid this, we may admit, to be altogether palatable even to a professional satirist.

> Though faintly and carelessly indicated, the characters are those with which the author loves to surround himself. A tufthunting county baronet's widow, an inane captain of Dragoons, a graceless young baronet, a lady with groundless pretensions to feeble health and poesy, an obsequious nonentity, her husband, and a flimsy and artificial young lady are the personages in whom we are expected to find amusement.

Besides these we have > a shadowy Serjeant-at-Law who escapes with a few puffs of flattery, which the author strives not to render ironical, and a mysterious countess, apparently introduced that we may learn by what delicate discriminations our adoration of rank should be regulated.

The sting of this last paragraph, it is clear, is by no means lost on the subject of the slashing review—the review which provokes the celebrated, but in fact rather laboured and uncomfortable, "Essay on Thunder and Small Beer." The whole criticism, truth to tell, is as justly applicable to all the other so-called "Christmas Books" (all but one which belongs to a totally different genre)—to the dreary sweepings from "Vanity Fair" collected in "Mrs. Perkins' Ball" with its well-known impersonations aristocrats and its well-known drunken Irishman who dances and kicks (!) the equally well-known heavy and quasi-poetic lady, to the dingy and faded panorama of "Our Street," or to the menagerie of infantine monstrosities entertained by Dr. Birch. "To those who love to lug themselves in a sense of superiority by amusement with the most worthless of their species, this book," we can re-echo The Times reviewer, "will form an agreeable treat." And the author, though doubtless pleased with the cheque which, as he tells us, he has just received from his publisher, is more than half aware of this. It is not only the utter dreariness of the subject-matter of the booklet and the bitterness of its treatment, but the fact that here as elsewhere there is that something uncomfortable so often noticed about the author's personal demeanour.

It is not, of course, the mere fact that he rather enjoys talking about himself. Montaigne and Howell, "my favourite bedside books," did that, as Mr. Roundabout reminds us.

> I hope [he confides to us, in the middle of that curious little threnody on "The Two Children in Black"], I hope I shall always like to hear men, in reason, talk about themselves. What subject does a man know better? If I stamp on a friend's corn his outcry is genuine—he confounds my clumsiness in the accents of truth. (Genuine enough, Mr. Roundabout, but is it always amusing? And how if the aggrieved party, not content with one genuine outburst, goes on mumbling execrations under his breath for the rest of our interview?) I have a story of my own, of a wrong done me by somebody, as far back as the year 1838; whenever I think of it . . . .

And off he goes at score again. Not with the story, my dear friends, don't imagine it. That would really have interested the reader, who rather likes being consulted on such little matters. The reader (bless him!) is never told what is the matter, but left with a shrewd and slightly irritable suspicion that if the whole ins and outs of the case were confided to him, he would probably find there was a good deal to be said on both sides.

> How comes it, asked the lady sitting next to Mr. R. at dinner, that there is a certain class of persons whom you always attack in your writings and savagely rush at, goad, poke, toss, kick, and trample on?

That lady (is her name to be found in any recent biography of the author, or was it by chance—Legion?) certainly voiced what advertisers call a "long-felt want."

In reply, Mr. Roundabout told her "the inevitable story," which he never tells us. He was egotistical, he admits. He was selfish, no doubt; but he was natural (he thinks), because he was telling the truth. He could not deny that the spirit of such conduct is un-Christian. How, he asks, can one forget at will? How forgive? . . . Ah! These be serious questions, scarcely indited altogether in jest. "There are wrongs and griefs that can't be mended." In fine, as the immortal Rebecca sums up the whole matter in one trenchant line—"Revenge may be wicked, but it's natural. I'm no angel."

No reader can follow Mr. Roundabout very far without noticing the sensibility to criticism and to social friction, oddly coupled with so much active hostility to his kind. The author cannot let him forget it. A learned German critic has assigned to the creator of "Becky Sharp" a want of that "gesundes und sicheres Gefühl," that "sound and certain attitude" towards Life, which is the "Kern" of all the worthiest production. Is that why he seems for ever fearing that people may treat his work as "small beer"? Yet we read in the Chronicle of that ilk (R.P., p. 219), how "some pronounce it sour; some say it is thin; some that it has woefully lost its flavour" (some dozen years after the brewing of that scalding witches' broth of "Vanity Fair"). Of course, this may be all mock modesty and humorous self-depreciation. But, it is odd how the thing keeps cropping up again and again. As under "Small Beer," so again under the head of "Ogres" (both texts, it will be admitted, suggestive of nothing but the most cheery and optimistic reflections), we catch the same unhappy accent of the author whining.

as it were, in a corner. "Now, dear, good, kind Mr. Roundabout, for Heaven's sake, what is the matter?" And what does it turn out to be? Of course, another review, something the critics say about him when—when he is not at his best. Well, we cannot always be at our best—"Neque semper arcum, &c."—and then . . . "The jokes, if attempted, are elaborate and dreary. The bitter temper breaks out. That sneering manner is adopted which you know and which exhibits itself especially where the writer is speaking about women. He sees no good in anybody . . . and treats things in general with a gloomy flippancy."

Mr. Roundabout, Sir, he does: which you never spoke a truer word, though the italics are our own.

Perhaps your career with all its success was in some obscure social sense a disappointment. Perhaps at a too early stage in it some one did give you bad wine (see Letts Diary, R.P., p. 281) which you never forgot. Perhaps you were, in weaker moments, a trifle malicious. But as to your general estimate of human nature, I think The Times reviewer really hit it off "to a T" in his somewhat rococo phrase—"Sardonic divings after the pearl of truth whose lustre is eclipsed by the display of the diseased oyster."

Who can be sweet-tempered, you may ask, in a world of ogres and gorillas, of swindling bankrupts and scheming vulgarians? And to your most truculent outbursts (the things both we and you must thoroughly enjoy), and to your most depressing caricatures, have you not appended "moralizations" almost worthy of an Oriental fabulist? So you have. But we skip them, my dear Mr. Titmarsh, we skip them as we skip the sentimental tags in one of Sheridan's dramas. The simple, honest truth of the matter is that on the subject of Death, Time, and the Eternities, you talk like a veritable Death's Head.

At a raree show, Tussaud Museum, or whatever it is to be called, like "Vanity Fair," we laugh till we are tired of laughing. In that eternally entertaining epic, that genuine "lanx satura" of social absurdity and iniquity, you cry havoc and give the fangs of satire a free field till there is nothing left to slaughter. We are carried away by the genuine passion and humour of the performance, by the glare of the footlights you are so fond of talking of, and the sparkle of the "tinsel," for which, by the way, real jewellery may sometimes be mistaken in that light. But when the curtain falls, and perhaps not till then, "surgit amari aliquid." By the side of such spontaneous ebullitions your copybook morality seems a very tame concession to the cravings of Christian humanity.

Your copybook precepts—well, they so little resemble your literary practice we might almost suspect them to be the work of "a later hand." And as to your regard for women as women, your sympathy (in odd corners and chapter-ends) for undeserved suffering and misfortune, few of us would have it at a gift. Why, for example (I have often longed to ask), does poor, dear Mr. John Sedley (whose hospitality we have so often enjoyed) become by the mere act of bankruptcy a degraded, grovelling, and tiresome beggar? Had honest bankrupts, in the days of the railway mania, no independence or self-respect?

And, to return to our text, can anything be more incredibly dreary, more drearily incredible, than the "characters with which the author loves to surround himself" in those strangely entitled "Christmas Books"? "Vulgarity, imbecility, affectation"—affectation, imbecility, vulgarity (shall we not rather say "Indigestion, jealousy, bad temper—Bad temper, jealousy, indigestion"?). Why, I no more believe in that "inane captain of Dragoons," that "tuft-hunting widow," the "graceless baronet," those hypochondriac and poetic old ladies, or the flimsy and artificial lovelorn that I do in those yet more dismal "flayed anatomies" of boyhood collected in "Dr. Birch's Menagerie." Cheerful figures these, Mr. Titmarsh, for childish contemplation at Christmas time! Lord! how lifelike, sprightly, and amusing is the wealthy banker's son, for example, "the cleverest, most accomplished boy in the school," who brings back about £30 in pocket money, and increases his board by usury, cheating, and the sale of drinks, till we leave him "moaning under well-deserved blows and whining for mercy"; the idiot scion of aristocracy, happily playing cat's-cradle at the age of twenty-three when not being wooed by the headmaster's daughter! Where, great Heaven, were all these ghastly nightmares bred? And do you fancy that our impressions of them are to be dissipated by a few "Keepsake" verses, as it were, of Christmas greeting, a few platitudes about Peace and Goodwill? No, Mr. Titmarsh, once for all, it will not do. Step aside into Fairyland if you please, and we will believe anything you like to tell us of Rosalba or Prince Giglio, but that goodwill, gentleness, or even candour presided at the creation of your social "Chamber of Horrors"—never, never!

G. H. POWELL.

THE SHAKESPEARE STAGE IN MUNICH.

Every summer an international public is attracted to Munich by the performances of Wagner, and especially of Mozart, for which the Court Theatre there has a reputation. But, good although these performances are, they are not better than can be heard in any larger German State or Municipal theatre all the year round; and, after all, what is to be said of German opera performances but that they are a little more faithful, a little more conscientious, if less brilliant than what we can hear during the opera season at home? We may regard them as better or worse according to our tastes or our prejudices, but opera is so thoroughly cosmopolitan a form of art that foreign performances of familiar works have little that is new to tell us.

Such was the somewhat jaded reflection with which we left the large "Court and National Theatre" in Munich one Saturday evening towards the close of August after listening to an excellent representation of Die Meistersinger. Scanning the playbill, our attention was caught by the announcement at the bottom of it, Sonntag: König Lear. Here was an opportunity for a variation upon Mozart and Wagner. A stall was duly procured next morning at a price that might have awakened a supercilious smile on the face of a London playgoer; at half-past 6 in the evening the performance was announced to begin.

The theatre was well filled; Sunday notwithstanding, there was an absence of showy attire, and everywhere one saw an eager, serious public which had evidently been attracted to the theatre expecting something more than merely an evening's amusement. But the theatre itself had undergone a change. The large orchestral well, from which on the previous evening had come the music of at least eighty players, had disappeared. The stage seemed to have undergone a prolongation overnight; it now extended in a large sweep far beyond the curtain, out, indeed, almost to the first row of stalls. Moreover, it had lost a great deal of its every-day character; the footlights seemed to have been removed—as a matter of fact, they were only hidden beneath the raised edge of the extended stage. Finally, in front of the new stage a flight of half a dozen steps led down into the auditorium. A flourish of trumpets announced the beginning of the play, and the large curtain parted. It disclosed a stage without wings of any kind; in their place hung heavy curtains which covered the exits and entrances of the players, while the background was formed by a massive-looking structure like the portal of some Romanesque church. In the middle of this structure was an opening as large as the proscenium of a small theatre, and on each side of the opening were two doors. Both the doors and the inner proscenium were closed with curtains similar to those which occupied the place of the wings.

When the play began, it was clear that it was not the King Lear to which we were accustomed at home. One missed the brilliant march and the long procession of courtiers and pages, culminating with Lear himself, his appearance greeted by the thundering applause of the house. Here, so far, there was no splendour, no music save a flourish of trumpets, and a house which did not dream of applauding until the act had reached its close. We turned to the text which we had taken the precaution to bring with us, and, sure enough, as far as the printed play was concerned, these German players were right and our theatres wrong. The play does not open with a Court scene. Kent, Gloucester, and Edmund came in, said what they had to say, clearly, distinctly, and with a pleasing absence of the elocutionary gestures and graces of the conventional actor; then the trumpet sounded again and the curtain in the middle parted, disclosing an inner stage raised three steps above the outer one. At the back of this smaller stage was the painted scene. The king, his daughters, Cornwall and Albany, entered from behind, accompanied by not more than a dozen attendants; there was obviously no time for musical processions here. Lear occupied a seat in the middle of the inner stage, the pages and attendants stood behind him, while the other principal personages occupied the larger front stage. And so the scene proceeded. When the king had finished with his daughters and the Court had retired, the curtain closed noiselessly over the inner stage and France and the three daughters were left in front. Two minutes later this scene also was at an end, and without a second's loss of time, the inner curtain was again drawn aside. The decorations of the smaller stage had been changed; we were in Gloucester's castle and Edmund came forward with his letter. At the next change the lights were momentarily lowered, while the scene at the back of the smaller stage was simply raised disclosing another representing Albany's palace. A minute and a half later, another change being necessary, it was effected as simply, noiselessly, and expeditiously as before. Surely the pinning up of the labels in Shakespeare's own day could not have been done with less loss of time. And so the play proceeded until the end of the act, when the large curtain of the theatre closed in. Here came a pause, but only of two minutes' duration; not until the end of the third act were we allowed ten minutes' breathing space. Thus, smoothly, unobtrusively, without tantalizing breaks and interruptions, without cuts—except for a few lines that might have offended modern taste—without a single displaced or misplaced scene, the drama moved on to its close. It had begun at half-past six, it was over a few minutes before ten.

Here was a new thrill, indeed, beside which, for English spectators, at least, even Bayreuth sank into insignificance. For the first time we felt we had had the privilege of witnessing upon the stage the real Shakespeare—no actor-managered Shakespeare, but Shakespeare pure and unadulterated—and that in a foreign tongue and played by actors who were not Englishmen.

It must not, however, be thought that this Munich "Shakespeare Stage" is a mere antiquarian experiment such as the interesting performances by the Elizabethan Society in London. By no means. It appeals to the ordinary theatre-going public in Munich and always brings full houses. If the mise en scène is not what one would call "gorgeous," there is, at least, nothing about it that suggests parsimony. The costumes on this occasion were of great artistic beauty, and the scenery—there were no less than twenty different scenes—came from one of the first ateliers in Europe, that of Burghart in Vienna. We have said so much about the stage that there is little room left to speak of the acting, yet no words of praise would be too strong for these Munich players. The drama had been rehearsed for before it was clear that it was no case here of Lear and Cordelia being "supported" by a "company." Every actor was equally good, and even small rôles were filled by players who in other pieces are accustomed to sustain principal rôles; the Goneril, for instance, was played by what, in German technical language, is known as the "first heroine" of the theatre, the Edmund of this performance has the reputation of being one of the best Hamlets in Germany. But to the English spectator the great charm was the Shakespearian spirit which pervaded the entire performance. There was not the slightest attempt at "starring," not the slightest break in the artistic harmony of the whole; one could not, even in the smallest rôles, detect a wrongly accentuated point or a gesture that was incompatible with scholarly interpretation.

The methods of presenting Shakespeare on the stage have of late been much discussed with us, but we are inclined to think that the Munich Court Theatre with its simplified Shakespearian stage has approached more closely to a satisfactory solution of the problem than any other theatre in the world. It is, of course, open to dispute whether it is worth putting the whole of Shakespeare conscientiously on the stage, but if it is worth doing it could not be done better than in Munich. That it has been a success here is proved by the fact that, for the last ten years, at least three-fourths of Shakespeare's plays, uncut and unadapted—not to speak of plays by Goethe, Schiller, Grillparzer, Calderon, and Molière—have been and still are regularly played upon this "neueingerichtete Bühne."

SAMUEL RICHARDSON.

One of Richardson's most fervent admirers congratulated him on having formed a style in which prolixity became a virtue. It would be hard to persuade the modern reader that this was a true judgment. An age which subsists so largely on telegrams cannot fail to have come to the conclusion that brevity is a main constituent of literary charm: we hear on all hands that Spenser would still be read if he had confined his story within such compass as was allotted to "Marmion" or "The Princess," and the popularity of Mr. Rudyard Kipling was due in the beginning as much to his singular conciseness of form as to his more essential virtues. Richardson, above all novelists, has become a by-word for the intolerable length of his books. Even the first part of "Pamela" is less known than its value as a human document would lead one to expect in these days of feminist study, and a reader of "Sir Charles Grandison" is a synonym for a survivor of "the giant race before the flood." Hilpa and Shalum might have beguiled their long-drawn-out age with such a book, but the modern reader, who has his work cut out in merely keeping abreast of his contemporaries, flees it like the plague. It is hard to realize that once, little more than a century ago, a man who both read and wrote so hard as Diderot actually regretted that Richardson's books were so short, therein anticipating Mr. Samuel Weller's discovery that the great aim of epistolary literature was to make the reader "vish there vos more." Even Diderot admitted, however, that all the world was not of his opinion, and suggested that "Clarissa Harlowe" and its companions should be abridged for the use of the profane. In the last generation something of the kind was attempted; but there is a fatal objection in the average mind to abridgments and selections; we all, rightly enough, like to do our own skipping, since exercise is so hard to get in town in winter! It has been suggested that a better plan than buying an abridgment of "Clarissa" is to begin at the original third volume. With "Pamela" the wise course is to begin at the beginning and lay the book aside after its heroine is definitely engaged: the best part of her post-matrimonial history is inseparably bound up with the adventures of her brother, as told by another hand. In the same way Sir George Trevelyan assures us that "if any one, after obtaining the outline of Lady Clementina's story from a more adventurous friend, will read 'Sir Charles Grandison,' skipping all letters from Italians, to Italians, and about Italians, he will find that he has got hold of a delightful and not unmanageable book."

The "adventurous friend" whose co-operation is here desiderated is not always at hand. What he can do for the fame of Richardson is well illustrated by an anecdote which Thackeray tells of Macaulay. "When I was in India," the historian once said to the novelist, "I passed one hot season in the hills. . . . I had 'Clarissa' with me; and, as soon as they began to read, the whole station was in a passion of excitement about Miss Harlowe, and her misfortunes, and her scoundrelly Lovelace. The Governor's wife seized the book; the secretary waited for it; the Chief Justice could not read it for tears." Unfortunately—or otherwise, as recollection of some one's longing for a "flash of silence" may incline a cynical few to say—we do not, most of us, know a Macaulay, or even any lesser person who has read "Sir Charles Grandison." The want is excellently supplied, however, by so able and pleasant a book as Miss Clara Linklater Thomson has written under the title of "Samuel Richardson: a Biographical and Critical Study" (Horace Marshall and Son, 6s.). Miss Thomson has thoughtfully devoted a chapter to each of Richardson's three novels, in which she not only criticizes the work but gives an outline of the plot. Clementina's story may be duly read here by such as would try Sir George Trevelyan's recipe for getting through "Grandison." That so sane a critic as Miss Thomson should adopt this plan, and that it is likely to command the gratitude of her best-informed readers, shows as clearly as anything could into what a state of decay Richardson's working reputation has fallen. We should be anything but grateful to a critic of Fielding who proposed to narrate the plot of "Tom Jones" by way of preparation for a discourse upon its merits; and though a laborious gentleman has actually summarized the whole of the Waverley Novels, we are happy to believe that no human being has as yet found any need of his book. But in the case of Richardson no one need be ashamed of finding a useful novelty in Miss Thomson's handy outlines.

Publishers are evidently of the same opinion, for among all the countless reprints of standard novelists whose works have gone out of copyright, Richardson has been severely left alone. The only complete reprint of his works since Ballantyne's Novelists' Library, which has a melancholy interest to us for its association with Scott's dream of attaining wealth as a publisher, was the Édition de luxe edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen in 1883. Perhaps Miss Thomson, having aroused so much fresh curiosity about Richardson as her admirable book deserves to do, will herself undertake the difficult but interesting task of presenting his work in such a dress as may give it a new lease of life among modern readers of fiction. This is a case, if ever there was one, in which an editor is justified in free abridgment. Nobody can deny that the fat little printer who wandered into the paths of romance while he was trying to produce a "Complete Letter Writer" for his employers has added two or three imperishable types to that portrait-gallery which includes Don Quixote and Sir Roger de Coverley, Parson Adams and Tabitha Bramble, Père Goriot and Dr. Primrose, Leather-stocking and Athos and Captain Dalgetty. The world which is peopled with these intensely human and friendly figures can hardly be conceived without Clarissa Harlowe and Lovelace; Sir Charles Grandison, prig as he is, has become a household word, and even the unattractive Pamela must be admitted for her very complete lifelikeness as the "well-behaved little waiting-maid of the eighteenth century." But by common consent the diffuse and long-winded volume in which these creations are now undergoing a condition of suspended animation are unreadable, or at least unread, and most of us take the womanly charms of Clarissa, the rakish elegance of Lovelace, and the courtly graces of Grandison on trust, while we are scarcely acquainted by hearsay with the lively temper of Anna Howe or the sensibility of Miss Byron. It would be a good work to trim up the old-world dress of these people into a shape in which they could be presented to the modern court of letters. Miss Thomson has given her readers a lively desire to know something of Richardson at first-hand; we hope she will persuade a publisher to let her satisfy the curiosity which she has aroused.

PILGRIMS TO DELPHI.

It must be that Delphi is set in the fairest scenery in the world! Let the superlative pass. The blue gulf below; the ribbon of sand round the rocky shore; the olive-yards of the valley; the "Shining Cliffs" above, at the foot of which, two thousand feet above sea-level, lies the ruin of the shrine; the deep and many-hued ravine, skirted by the Bœotian highway; and, crowning all, the soaring snow-clouds of Parnassus that feed Castalia, sources of all song since men have sung and while men shall sing! The setting is of Mother Earth's best handiwork, and ranks high among "the lovely things in Hellas" that Pindar knew. Nor is the natural fascination of the scene impaired by the tales that cling to it, tales of worship, splendour, and artists' triumphs, a whole history of human pride and havoc. Delphi will long be the difficult Mecca of all European pilgrims (faithful few though they be) whom the charms of Hellenism invite to Greece. A century ago Byron wrote of

> Delphi's long-deserted shrine
> Where, save that feeble fountain, all is still.

For a tract of centuries before his day the beautiful place "dwelt solitary"; it is an ancient part that calls us.

The steamer that bore us, only less slow than her sister which carried us away, worked at early dawn through the canal that cuts the Corinthian Isthmus. She put in between Helikon and the slopes of Parnassus, which hid the summit, to Aspra Spitta—Anticyra of Hellebore fame. A Greek head for every famous name that hits the traveller's ear would make a long string to tell. Skirting a few of the numberless headlands that jag the northern shore of the gulf, we were brought to Itéa, of which more anon. Thence, while the sun, westering, laid blue shadows on the northern cliffs, we rode up the valley and, turning eastwards to the Pleistos ravine, began the climb. Incidents of delay sharpened our zeal. Here, a villainous dusky veteran (alas! pen de roi des montagnes) trampled down with an ill-clad, rascally crew, whose chattels clattered over a hungry camel and an even less favoured mule. A little higher, in Krisa village, where our advent created some commotion, we were "tasted" in resinati by M. le Capitaine des gens d'armes, a jovial fellow who, with a handful of men, was set to protect the French road leading to the excavations. At last, passing new Kastri (a village bodily removed), we rounded a corner in the cliffs and lo! Delphi, her temple and treasuries, the Gorge of Castalia itself. The spring, fed from the far snows above, issues here in a decent fountain. Clambering over it into the gorge we could hear it pouring, unseen, through the tunnel—a hidden fall; and, again, below the fountain, the stream bores beneath the road till it shoots down, down, down into the main ravine, to lose itself at last in the glitter of the blue gulf. Such is Castalia, the fountain of the Muses.

Shelved, by different stages, under the cliffs at the side, the Temple lies; above it, bijou theatre, race-course, and fortifications. At once the ruined masonry, now so skilfully rescued from long concealment, awakens a tumult of associations for him who loves the things of Greece. True, you see nothing of the first shrine that dear old Ovid-reader, Pausanias, tells us of; a hut built of laurel timbers from the vale of Tempé; nothing, either, of its fantastic successor built (whimsical legend) from the wax and wings of bees. There's a great deal that is gone; but you do walk up the winding marble path, where, in the glorious old days, there walked the messengers of grateful States and Princes, bearing noble gifts to Apollo, lord of the sun's far-shooting rays. You see the sites of diminutive treasuries, wherein these gifts were stored, each giver having a proper "safe-deposit," the god's sacred precinct enclosing all. The floors, the walls, the decoration, all is marble; here a vigorous, archaic frieze (prototype of that peerless band of horsemen, maidens, priests, and magistrates from Athens, which we hold here in London); there, some broken but exquisite piece of carving, more delicate than even the loveliest pattern on the Erechtheion of Athens itself. Above the treasuries is the Athenian Terrace, the roof of which was once borne by slender pillars that still remain. Above the back-wall of this, compact with vast polygonal stones and covered with myriad lines of the neatest inscription, is the Temple itself. Even the story of Pausanias, written long after Nero had "carried away from Apollo 500 brazen statues, some of gods, some of men," describes a wealth of artistic treasures whereof the débris that now one sees is indeed sad mockery. Never a bronze seemed to be left, out of the trophies offered after the defeat of the Persians, until—oh! happy day—there appeared the Sicilian charioteer, handsome indeed in his strength and neatness, as even the new cast of him in our Bloomsbury Museum will show you. Among the "finds" (which soon we shall know more of when the French savants publish them) are images of both Apollo (patron of all human energies, "music" and "gymnastic" alike) and of Dionysos, god of ecstasy and vitality, of the hope of immortality. It is at St. Petersburg (where not a few of the precious relics of Greek art have found a home) that there is a painted vase on which these same two deities are shown; and they are shown as meeting by the "omphalos," that very navel-stone of the earth, sung of by Sophocles and many poets, as the spot where the two eagles of Zeus met again, one sped either way round the earth's girdle. At Delphi itself one now sees, together with Apollo and Dionysos, this cone of sculptured stone, symbol of those aspirations which the place enshrined. It stands on the front of the Temple's platform; and near it a rift opens in the pavement upon a murky chamber beneath. Oracles, oracles! Here it was that cunning priests, as skilful then as at any time in the confounding of politics with religion, worked their tricks. Whether dazed by the fumes of incense or possibly a victim of hypnotism, some peasant woman (as we guess), Apollo's Pythia, here sat by the tripod to utter those metrical conundrums for which men sent from afar. The oracles of Delphi commanded the respect of all Greek States and had their influence beyond the seas. Uttered here in this very shrine, they ranked among the few symbols of the national unity of the Hellenes.

The head-man of the village was our host, and we slept like Britons even on his hard but cleanly floor. His house was a new one, little deserving the witty libel of a former visitor who, after a broken night, wrote:—

> Gather poppies, gather smilax,
> Bind a wreath for faithful phylax;
> Poppies, for he gave us sleep—
> Smilax from his Delphian steep.
> Say his wine we could not quaff,
> Praise his salad and pilaf;
> Whisper, he would better please,
> Were his beds quite free from ——!

Confident in the unpunctuality of the boat, which was due four miles away on the shore at 9 a.m., we left Delphi at 10; and that boat came for us just after midnight. But what scenes that day gave us! Wandering by the margin of the gulf, we could gaze over the blue ruffled waters and watch the sun light up the snows of the Arcadian hills in the Peloponnese; or, by the marshes, we found amusement in the ceaseless brekke koax, voice of the thousand frogs. After sundown, a light skiff put out, poised on the prow of which, behind a blazing torch, a youth deftly speared the fish in the shallows as they swam instinctively to their alluring doom. Later, we strolled to the church, where for many hours (it was Good Friday eve) the women had knelt in prayer and weeping round a flower-decked bier; this, at midnight, with an effigy laid upon it, was borne off among mysterious drums and tapers which flickered feebly under the moon; two miles away, up the mountain side, a gentle ritual of entombment was enacted. And with this rite, to our minds neither ancient nor modern, our pilgrimage to Delphi ended.

THE DRAMA.

"JULIUS CÆSAR"—"COLONEL CROMWELL."

Whatever may be said for and against Mr. Tree's passion for elaborate mise-en-scène, none can reasonably be affronted by it in the case of Julius Cæsar. If ever tragedy was written in what Matthew Arnold was perhaps over fond of calling "the grand style," that tragedy is this great forensic play of Shakespeare's, and no style can be too grand for its material presentation on the stage. Grandeur rather than meticulous archæology is the one thing needed, and that need is generously met at Her Majesty's. It has been hinted that this Rome is rather Alma Tademan than Cæsarian. Soit. Very few of the audience have any precise ideas on the topography and architectural detail of Cæsarian Rome; a vague impression of massive and splendid dignity is what they want, and Mr. Tree sees that they get it. The stage management of the crowd in the forum scene is admirable; it is the crowd not Antony that is the protagonist in that scene, and the crowd is presented as what Shakespeare undoubtedly chose to consider it—a helpless, foolish, dangerous monster, at once grotesque and terrible. The more life-like the crowd, the more its potency is insisted on, the greater the dramatic effect of Antony's uphill struggle against it and final triumph over it. There are moments when Antony quails before it, when his gaze wanders like that of some hunted thing from face to face, as though reading his fate there. You begin to feel that it is all up with him. Then he makes a point. The bait "takes." His confidence comes back to him, he plays with the dreadful monster, brings it to heel, and smiles with delight at his own virtuosity in crowd-taming. There, perhaps is Mr. Tree's one weak point. He is somewhat too obviously a virtuoso, seeming to wait every few moments for "thunders of applause." In the text it is Brutus who says, "I pause for a reply." On the stage of Her Majesty's it is, in fact, Antony, who does the pausing. But that is, at any rate, a consistent and defensible view of the part. Mr. Tree is an artificial actor and inevitably makes the most of the artifice in Antony. It is in Antony's sincere moments that one likes Mr. Tree least. His grief over the dead Cæsar in the Capitol scene hardly, to my sense, rang true. On the whole, however, this is probably his best Shakespearian part.

Mr. Lewis Waller's Brutus, too, is very good in its robust and occasionally tonitruant fashion. It is not, to be sure, preeminently an intellectual Brutus. Mr. Waller's cast of countenance is not exactly pensive. When he turns to his book in the tent scene he fails to persuade you that he is by temperament a reader. But his tenderness with Portia and with Cassius after the quarrel, his gentleness with Lucius, every action of his that comes from the heart rather than the head, carries complete conviction. That is to say, it is a good emotional Brutus. Mr. Robert Taber's Cassius and Mr. Murray Carson's Cæsar are both interesting performances and both conspicuous for the elocutionary merit which Shakespearian revivals, of course, always require but by no means always display. In Portia Miss Lena Ashwell gives rather a "modern" view of a Roman matron, and Mrs. Tree's Calpurnia is mainly remarkable for a flamboyant coiffure. At Philippi there is an interpolated tableau; otherwise one notes hardly any point of difference between this revival and that of 1898. It is, to my thinking, by far the most creditable thing Mr. Tree has yet achieved at his present theatre.

Some newspapers, I see, have found in Colonel Cromwell, a four-act play by Messrs. Arthur Paterson and Charles Cartwright, produced at the Globe, renewed evidence that we are in for a spell of "historical drama." Earlier proof of this, it seems, was forthcoming in the two recent Nell Gwyn plays. I should, for my part, find it easier to agree with them if I were persuaded that "history" means a dictionary of proper names. The Globe Cromwell is, in fact, Fairy Godmother to young lovers in distress, and Deus ex machina, by turns. As the distressed lovers and their series of distresses belong entirely to the world of the theatre, they leave me, I fear, unmoved. Mr. Cartwright's Cromwell—whom no one is likely to compare with Mr. Gardiner's Cromwell—is fairly impressive in a somewhat jerky and sibilant, and wholly "stagy," way. Mr. Paterson's drama, being neither good nor bad, but, as the French say, quelconque, fails on the whole to impress. And its ancillary comic personages are not, I fear, quite so comic as their author designed them to be.

BONNIE PRINCE CHARLIE.

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD. By ANDREW LANG. (Goupil and Co., £3 3s.)

Mr. Andrew Lang's subsidiary studies in the history of Jacobitism, countless allusions in many charming papers of his, as well as "Pickle the Spy" and "The Companions of Pickle," have naturally excited the keenest desire to see how he would deal with the great central figure of sentiment and tragedy, bonnie Prince Charlie himself. It may at once be said that the interest which has been aroused will in no way be disappointed. In all Mr. Lang's voluminous works it would be difficult to single out one in which sympathy and scholarship are more happily combined. Certainly it is by far the best biography of the "Young Pretender" that has ever appeared, and it is likely to remain for very many years the standard work on the whole period of the '45.

It is a book which never loses interest for a moment. Mr. Lang has the art of making the most minute detail attractive, yet certainly he never sacrifices the central idea; and through all the tales of heroism, romance, pathos, squalor the central thought, as of a great Greek tragedy, dominates the whole. The author of this brilliant book is no trivial sentimentalist, but he appreciates all the attraction of the "White Rose." No one could tell better of Prince Charlie's noble qualities than he, or dwell more enthusiastically on his noble deeds; but he does not extenuate the sordid ending. The book is a real tragedy, drawn by a master hand. Such a book, so important historically, and so attractive to a wide public, demands a somewhat extended notice. And first of the sources. Mr. Andrew Lang knows them completely, and probably he has been able to quote all that exist except one. It is a welcome change of recent years that at last manuscripts of great historical value are becoming accessible to serious students. How many important historical biographies of the last fifty years have become worthless for the want of this courtesy on the part of the owners of MSS? Happily such reticence to make public valuable documents as was common when Macaulay wrote is rare now; and probably there are very few MSS. relating to the Stuarts which are not, or may not be, well known now to investigators. Two conspicuous exceptions there are—the Strafford papers belonging to the Earl of Fitzwilliam, and the highly interesting correspondence between John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, and Adam de Cardonell, which is in the possession of Mr. Edward Rhys Wingfield, of Barrington. It is to be hoped that both these valuable collections may soon become accessible. The second of them would probably have furnished Mr. Andrew Lang with some valuable illustrations as to the earlier Jacobite intrigues. The Stuart papers at Windsor are the main basis of Mr. Lang's present work. They were, of course, known to Sir Walter Scott and to Lord Mahon; but they have never been fully utilized till now. Next in importance are the State papers in the Record Office, the Mémoires of the Marquis d'Eguilles, and the papers of the Duke of Atholl. Other sources are chiefly printed; and how well Mr. Lang knows these we have already learned.

What is the general tone of the book, as regards its chief subject? Let Mr. Lang speak for himself.

> That the results of a close inquiry into the History of Prince Charles [he says] are, on the whole, so melancholy, I regret as much as any one who may complain of my "disloyalty." But the broad outlines were always well known; further inquiry does but add confirmation. Meanwhile the personal characters of James III. and the Cardinal Duke of York have nothing to lose and much to gain by minute inspection. My attempts at criticism of character are not apt to please all parties. I am accustomed to be censured as a Jacobite and as a Whig!

The general result of the book certainly is to emphasize the unhappy condition into which the Prince fell in his later years, and the complete reversal of the conspicuous virtues of his early life to which his habits of intoxication eventually led; to make prominent the discreditable intrigues, treachery, greediness, of many of the later Jacobites; to show the hopelessness of the later attempts and the network of spies that surrounded their leaders. It is a pitiful tale towards the end; we turn away, like Matthew Arnold from the entourage of Shelley and the Godwins, exclaiming "What a set!" But, perhaps, the true heroism and loyalty of the noblest Highlanders, of Cluny and Lochiel, and of many more, shines all the brighter for the darkness in which it is set. And as certainly no one will rise from a perusal of this volume without a genuine admiration for the splendid courage and romantic generosity of Prince Charlie's earlier days. All the early part of Mr. Lang's book is doubly charming. Not only is it written with inevitable grace and bonhomie, but the people with whom it deals have all a certain fascination. Never has the "Old Pretender" (whom Lord Mahon judged so unfavourably) had justice done to him before. We learn how serious, how conscientious, often how wise, he was. Clementina Sobieska, too, becomes quite a heroine of pathos; and nothing can exceed the charm of the two boys, Charles and Henry. One of Charles' delightful letters is produced in facsimile. It was written when he was eight years old. Thus it runs:—

> Dear Papa,—I thank you mightily for your kind letter. I shall strive to obey you in all things. I will be very Dutifull to Mamma, and not jump too near her. I shall be much obliged to the Cardinal for his animals. I long to see you soon and in good health. I am, dear Papa, your most Dutifull and affectionate Son, Charles P.

All the record of the childhood and boyhood of the two last Stuarts is delightful—so simple and so natural. When the serious interest begins Mr. Lang rises with it to a masculine eloquence. The story of the '45 has never been more heroically told. We feel that there is nothing omitted, that all the evidence at every critical point has been most carefully weighed, and that the soundest judgment has criticized character and examined motives. We have no space for detailed account of the story as it now appears. All we need say is that Prince Charlie appears as gallant, and probably as wise, as the most enthusiastic of his subjects have thought him. Much is said for going on after Derby, everything for not retreating after Falkirk. Lord George Murray, on the whole, wins a favourable verdict; and we feel sure that Mr. Lang has most fully considered all the evidence.

We are tempted to linger over the story of the wanderings. There is much that we should like to note about Clementina Walkinshaw, and Louise of Stolberg, and Charlotte of Albany. But these things every one must read for himself, for certainly the book is one to be bought and read many times. Mr. Lang's contemptuous description of Alfieri touches, we think, just the right note. He sees the facts far more clearly than did Vernon Lee in her "Countess of Albany."

There are some points we should like to see altered when the book comes to be reprinted without its present gorgeous setting. We should wish, for instance, that it did not end so abruptly. Certainly there might have been, in a page or two, a few words to sum up the history of Henry IX., of Miss Walkinshaw, and of the "Duchess of Albany." In the account of the mysterious years that followed 1745 something might have been said of Jacobitism at Oxford. Of course Mr. Lang speaks of Dr. King; but he might tell us what truth there is, if any, in the legends of Saint Mary Hall, and whether the Oxford Jacobites, somewhat fusty and fuddled, did homage to the Prince of Wales, or the King, in those years when his movements are so hard to trace. The tale, too, of the sermon in S. John's College Chapel was worth telling again, with its "James Third and Eighth" and the happy words that follow that text—"But the tongue can no man tame." There were the riots, too, in 1715, on the Prince of Wales' birthday. But Mr. Lang has been sternly set against all side issues. Some day he must combine them all in a book which shall tell us all the long history of the Jacobites from first to last.

It is late in the day to speak of the charm of Mr. Lang's style. It is at his best in this book, though some parts would have been the better for a more careful revision; the same phrase is at times repeated too frequently, and we get a little tired of the frequent use of the epithet "darkling." Occasionally a little further explanation would be desirable. Not every one will know whether "the Rev. Aulay Macaulay, minister of Harris, and great grandfather of Lord Macaulay, who came hunting for Charles and the reward" (p.193), was the same as "Lord Macaulay's grandfather, a preacher in South Uist, and a keen hunter of his rightful Prince" (p.191). Chevalier Johnstone is said to have hidden "under a haycock on what is now the site of the Anglican Cathedral in Edinburgh," but surely Mr. Lang has not been so long away from Scotland as to be unaware that there is no Anglican Cathedral in the capital, though the Scots Episcopalians have their own Bishop's seat. Perhaps it is rash to enter the lists with Mr. Lang on the question of a lady's beauty; but we confess that the pictures he reproduces—and the eminently characteristic one which remains a happy relic of Jacobitism, in the President's lodgings of S. John's College at Oxford—do not seem to us to support his description of Flora Macdonald as "fair and beautiful." These are small matters; but in a book so charming as this we cannot help noticing the slightest point for criticism or disagreement. Certainly there is nothing to mar the harmony of the whole picture. We see Charles not only in his bright boyhood and his heroic youth, but in his kindly humorous middle age, when he collected curios, read Fielding and Richardson, helped to support Jean Jacques Rousseau, "damning the Marshal's (Keith's) old boots, which were always full of projects"; and we turn aside our eyes from those tragic days when he wrote "my heart is broke enough, without that you should finish it," and when he lingered on, the victim of senile passion and intemperance. Perhaps the moral of it all is that which Mr. Lang quite unostentatiously draws:—

> Charles' religion, by stress of circumstances, "was still to seek," as was said in 1715; while, unfortified by religion, he had no strong sense, as his father had, of duty. In all this we see the germs of his brief success, his audacity being boundless, and his charm, when he pleased, irresistible; while the elements of the final failure and misery, selfishness and self-indulgence, are no less conspicuous.

A word must be given to what would in any other book be the chief attraction. Never have Messrs. Goupil collected a more interesting series of portraits, medals, curios for illustrations. The portraits of Charles Edward and of his brother Henry are, to our mind, alone worth the purchase-money of the book. The reproductions are really faultless; and the result is a book of quite unique interest and value.

THE ANTARCTIC.

THROUGH THE FIRST ANTARCTIC NIGHT. By FREDERICK A. COOK, M.D. (Heinemann, 20s.)

There have been, roughly speaking, three periods of Antarctic Exploration separated by intervals of about sixty years; the period of Cook, the period of Ross and Dumont d'Urville, and the period in which we are now living. The handsome volume before us, liberally illustrated but parsimoniously mapped, gives a striking and graphic account of the voyage of the Belgica, which inaugurated the new epoch. The book, in fact, strikes us as a work of greater merit than the expedition itself, which seems, if we correctly understand Dr. Cook, to have been led in a rather a muddle-headed manner. The captain, at any rate, is represented as having generally "suggested" instead of commanding, and the question of letting the ship get frozen up for the winter appears first to have been a matter of acrimonious debate, and then to have been left to be settled by the chapter of accidents. Ultimately the Belgica did get caught in the pack ice and was imprisoned for a year in circumstances which caused its company the maximum of inconvenience and afforded them the minimum of opportunity for exploration.

Such geographical discoveries as were made belong to the early days of the voyage. The ship came down from Punta Arenas to the South Shetland Islands, crossed the stormy waters of Bransfield Strait, and "came in sight of the outer fringe of a new land, the Palmer Archipelago." Here was discovered "a new highway which in size compares favourably with Magellan Strait," and "about five hundred miles of a land which had never before been seen by human eyes" was charted. Issuing from the strait, the Belgica entered the South Pacific, and "strove to follow the mainland southward," but was prevented by the ice. "After penetrating ninety miles we found ourselves firmly beset. Unable to extricate the ship, we drifted with the ice to and fro, but generally west, for thirteen long months." During this period scientific observations in zoology, magnetism, oceanography, &c., were made, but the results, though regarded as valuable, are not given in detail by Dr. Cook. His book is interesting as, to use his own words, "a contribution of new human experience in a new inhuman world of ice." He does not idealize that experience. There is nothing of the forsan et hæc olim meminisse juvabit about his narrative. He was thoroughly uncomfortable and he does not hide the fact.

As a rule there is a certain air of jollity in the stories of those who have wintered in the regions of ice and darkness. With black night oppressing them they have brought out a society paper, organized private theatricals and tableaux vivants, played chess and draughts, shot polar bears, and they give us to understand that they have found these recreations infinitely diverting. It is otherwise with Dr. Cook and his companions. Even Ovid in his exile on the shores of the inhospitable Euxine was not so sorry for himself as they were. To begin with, sea-sickness seems to have troubled them whenever the ship wobbled, and when sea-sickness left them, home-sickness took its place. They gloated over the portraits of actresses in their little stock of illustrated papers, and bewailed the possibility that these beautiful beings had passed out of their lives for ever. They grew anæmic, and long before the night is over Dr. Cook writes thus:—

> Our faces are drawn, and there is an absence of jest and cheer and hope in our make-up which, in itself, is one of the saddest incidents in our existence. There is no one willing to openly confess the force of the night upon himself, but the novelty of life has been worn out and the cold, dark outside world is incapable of introducing anything new. The moonlight comes and goes alike, during the hours of midday as at midnight. The stars glisten over the gloomy snows. We miss the usual poetry and adventure of home winter nights. We miss the flushed maidens, the jingling bells, the spirited horses, the inns, the crackling blaze of the country fire.

One does not readily picture explorers of the old school writing in this pessimistic strain, though they must have suffered much the same discomforts with the grave addition of scurvy. But Dr. Cook thinks that this is how people always feel in the polar regions, and he represents that travellers who speak cheerfully of their experiences are tampering with the truth. On Dr. Nansen's report, for example, he comments sardonically:—

> With a few boastful remarks he passes over the physical effects of the Arctic night, and concludes to his own elation that they felt none of the usual complaints; but since it is reported that one of the best men returned mentally deranged, of which Nansen leaves us in ignorance, we may infer that other things have also slipped his memory.

This, of course, is possible. It is also possible that the crew of the Fram were picked with more discretion than the crew of the Belgica; for Arctic nights do not, any more than high alti tudes, affect every temperament in the same way. Probably, however, the difference of tone between the two narratives arises from the fact that Dr. Nansen is primarily an explorer and Dr. Cook primarily a man of letters. He leaves one with the impression that he has piled on the agony for the sake of literary effect; and the literary effect is certainly produced. One does not often encounter such sustained gloom even in a pessimistic French novel; and the gloom is the deeper because the author draws freely on his medical knowledge to supply realistic touches. But, graphic as the picture is, we are not satisfied of its accuracy. It is a literary picture drawn by a sensitively self-conscious man who lets his pen and his imagination run away with him, and credits his companions with the emotions which he considers dramatically appropriate to their position. They themselves, being less self-conscious, less prone to analysis, and more bent upon the humble task of putting through the job which they had undertaken, would doubtless tell the story differently.

SAVONAROLA.

We announced last week the forthcoming publication of a translation of the meditations of Savonarola, which will stimulate interest in the Florentine reformer whose personality many English readers know chiefly through the pages of "Romola." He has just been made the subject of a drama by Mr. W. J. Dawson, which we shall notice directly. Meanwhile, it is, perhaps, not inappropriate, on Savonarola's birthday, to give some account of the most recent biography of him that has appeared in England.

Its title is FRA GIROLAMO SAVONAROLA, and it is described as a biographical study, based on contemporary documents, by Herbert Lucas (Sands, 7s. 6d. n.). Its author is "of the Society of Jesus." This is unfortunate, as the subject of the book was a Dominican friar; and all the world knows that no love was or is lost between the rival orders. Then, again, as some one has acutely said, Jesuits are not historians; they are controversialists with a strong spice of the rhetorician. And the reason is not far to seek. They are bound by their rule to refrain from judging their superiors; nay, they are bound to judge that what is done by their superiors is the right thing. Hence, in a subject like that of Savonarola, where the real point at issue is the conduct of the most infamous of Popes, Alexander VI., a Jesuit writer is bound to take the side of the Pope, although his own commonsense leads him the other way. Mr. Lucas, then, sets out with a thesis in his mind—Savonarola was wrong because he disobeyed Alexander. Passive obedience is the great virtue in a Jesuit's eye—perinde ac cadaver. But we are not all Jesuits; and those who object to annihilate their understandings at the will of any human authority will not accept Mr. Lucas's verdict.

We have said that the real point at issue is the conduct of Alexander. Because Roman Catholics hold that the Pope is in spirituals the divinely-appointed head of the Church, they are not, we believe, bound to approve of all he may do in temporals. To say that no one has a right to judge the conduct of a superior in matters which fall within the knowledge of every one is a claim that is ridiculous on the face of it; to hold that personal immorality does not render one unfit for high spiritual office is a theory which, nowadays, most people reject. And to hold that it does not concern each and every one in a body to see that their leaders live worthily of their calling is a doctrine no one but a Jesuit can hold. Savonarola saw, and saw clearly, that the headship of his Church, which was to him the holiest of offices, was in the hands of a man notorious for his vices, who had gained the papacy by open simony, and who was using his power to crush and destroy the work that was being done in Florence for the regeneration of that corrupt city. The friar saw, too, the temporal claims of the Pope set beyond the things of God. He saw the ban of excommunication launched against him to secure merely political ends. He was even told that if he would pay a cardinal's debt to the tune of 5,000 crowns he should receive absolution. Alexander, who only wanted to be left alone, tried to bribe him with a cardinal's hat. The high-minded evangelical friar would not sell his conscience. He lifted up his voice in prophesy which came true, and foretold the punishments which the iniquity of those sitting in high places merited. With Alexander it became at last a matter of life and death; for the friar had begun to attack the validity of the Pope's election, and was about to call on Europe to depose him. Either Savonarola or Alexander must go; and as the Pope was the more powerful and unscrupulous, the Dominican fell. Savonarola was the last of the Prophets; and he shared the fate of his predecessors. But with a difference. Stoning was out of fashion. Alexander burnt him; a more expeditious and satisfactory way of getting out of the difficulty.

The reader of this book will note many passages in which the writer forces himself to avoid the conclusion his natural sense suggests. He is obliged to allow so much to Savonarola that he feels he must make it up by a liberal amount of praise to everybody else concerned. Though he does not openly say so, we gather that he thinks all his characters meant well—which is edifying, but not critical. There is a trace of the Jesuit director evident in the suggestion that Savonarola was the victim of "subtle pride." As a recent writer has said, this same "subtle pride" has ever been a sort of "diabolus ex machina" in the ascetic school favoured by the Society. On the score of Savonarola's disobedience to the papal command, which is the strong point against him in Mr. Lucas' book, we can only say there are occasions when disobedience becomes a virtue and obedience a yielding of the things of God to man. There seems no doubt, pace Mr. Lucas, that Savonarola never was excommunicated in fact. He never was absolved from it, and received all the rites of his Church before his death, together with—oh, the irony of it!—the blessing of his murderer.

But Mr. Lucas, in his pious endeavour to wipe off some of the score run up by the Dominicans in the controversy De Auxiliis and to uphold the Jesuit doctrine of passive obedience, has forgotten that, by upholding Alexander, he has trampled upon the other Popes and saints of his Church who praise and count the friar almost as one of the saints. Of course, if he prefers Alexander to other more respectable members of his communion, well and good; but they, at least the Popes, are also superiors; and a good Jesuit cannot go against them. The seventeenth-century scholar, Magliabecchi, runs Savonarola's opponents into three classes. They are these: "O di gente scelerata, O di genti appassionata, O di gente male informata." We do not for a moment wish to imply that Mr. Lucas belongs to either the first or the third class.

Putting aside, however, the fundamentally wrong principle upon which Mr. Lucas has approached his subject, we must recognize his difficult position and the skill with which he has tried to give satisfaction all round. The bibliographical list is only exceeded in excellence by the very full and complete index. The portentous number of footnotes might alarm a timid reader. We may assure such a reader that two-thirds of them can be skipped with an easy conscience.

Mr. Dawson's SAVONAROLA, A DRAMA (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.) is, the author tells us, "intended as an acting play"; but it hardly fulfils the conditions, being altogether too episodical, and having an entirely inadequate female interest, no part, save that of the protagonist, of which any actor could conceivably make anything, and nothing that a stage manager would regard as a "situation." Viewed as a play for the study its merits rest upon certain lyrics and passages of blank verse which are scattered about in the prose. These are good, but, with rare exceptions, not quite good enough; though the following would go well to music:—

What is love indeed but this,
Wine of life and body's bread?
Red-ripe lips were made to kiss,
Man and maid were meant to wed.
Foolish one, love while you may:
If you don't, hear what we say,
You'll regret it when you're dead.
Ha! Ha! Ha!

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Barrie.

J. M. Barrie and his Books, by J. A. Hamerton (Horace Marshall, 5s.), is mainly interesting because it strings together the principal autobiographical passages in Mr. J. M. Barrie's works. The quotations are laced with criticism which is well enough in its way, though we could have done without it. There is a bibliography which collectors of "Barriana" will find useful, and there are anecdotes. It was at Nottingham that Mr. Hamerton, as editor of the Nottingham Express and Journal, made Mr. Barrie's acquaintance; and as Nottingham is the Silchester of "When a Man's Single," and the Nottingham Journal is the Daily Mirror of that romance, the opportunities for interesting reminiscence are obvious. But Mr. Hamerton has not much to tell us except that, while the description on the whole is faithful, Mr. Licquorish, the editor, is "an entirely fictitious character," and that the original of "Penny, the foreman compositor," who has risen in life and keeps a hotel, is almost the only representative of the Press in Nottingham by whom Mr. Barrie is remembered. Perhaps the best of the stories is that which relates what happened when the Fortnightly Review published Mr. Barrie's article "Pro Bono Publico"—an imaginary circular of an imaginary "Society for Providing Materials for Volumes of Reminiscence."

> Soon after the appearance of this amusing contribution a German gentleman wrote to the office of the Fortnightly, saying that he had been engaged for some time on a volume of reminiscences of German authors, but was short of material, and would be very glad, indeed, to place an order with the society to supply as much as would complete his book.

That story deserves to be true. Perhaps there would be more parallels to it if Germans were more in the habit of reading English humorists.

The War.

More books about the war! But there is really very little to be said about them. The Siege of Mafeking, by J. Angus Hamilton (Methuen, 6s.), is about up to the average in point of merit, but exceeds the average in point of length. The characteristic of the author's prose style is that he generally writes "be" where most of us would write "is" or "are:" "All colonels imagine that they be gallant," &c.—an irritating affectation. The account of Eloff's attempt to storm the town is rather well done; but the book as a whole, is tedious. Lord De La Warr's Some Reminiscences of the War in South Africa (Hurst and Blackett, 1s.) is at any rate short and written in a plain and straightforward, if not very literary, manner. The author was first with Lord Methuen's unfortunate column, and afterwards served with Colonel Bethune. He represented the Globe, and, on their first appearance, his letters aroused interest through their outspoken candour. So many people have been candid since that this is no longer a distinction. There is no attempt, however, to locate the responsibility for the blunder of Spion Kop:—

> Call it what you like, it is a sad and deplorable business; there is no explanation; no one was more surprised at our action than the Boers themselves; indeed, their officers openly expressed their surprise to our doctors.

Book Sales.

Mr. W. Roberts, in his hand list of Catalogues of English Book Sales, reprinted from Notes and Queries, makes an effort to bridge a gulf which has long been the despair of bibliographers. Most previous efforts in this direction have been rather fragmentary. Both Horne and Dibdin selected only such catalogues as served to illustrate the texts of their books, while Sotheby's list, ranging from 1774 to 1830, is necessarily restricted to the books sold in his own auction rooms. Mr. Roberts' list deals with important sales in all parts of the country. He is careful, however, to explain that the catalogues enumerated are only those in his own possession, and an interesting list they make, stretching from the middle of last century up to 1885, and including some eight hundred entries. It is a piece of good work well done, as was to be expected from so able an authority as Mr. Roberts, though we could have wished that he had seen his way to annotating the list more fully. The necessity for the compilation of such lists as this is a subject on which we have previously had occasion to comment. Of their importance and value there can be no doubt, and, until they become general, the materials for the compilation of the long-desired bibliography of English literature must be regarded as incomplete. That there is an enormous amount of ground to cover in this direction is evident. For instance, Mr. Roberts' list contains less than half-a-dozen of King's catalogues, yet King was selling books for many years, and he dispersed some of the finest libraries of his time. According to Dibdin, King sold by auction during the 12 months ending November, 1807, fourteen important libraries, containing between them nearly sixty thousand books. Not one of these is included in Mr. Roberts' list. How many at present unknown Pynsons, Machlinias, or even Caxtons were there included in that large number?

Big Game.

It seems to be the privilege of sportsmen to find publishers and readers for books so absolutely devoid of literary merit that they would never be accepted from any other class of the community. The fact that they have killed things is held to entitle them to write as baldly as a general composing a despatch on the battle-field: and no one expects them to do much more than enumerate their victims, and relate in detail the where, the when, and the how of their achievements. From the literary point of view Wild Sports of Burma and Assam, by Colonel Pollok and W. S. Thom (Hurst and Blackett, 16s. n.), is neither better nor worse than the average book of the same sort. But it will probably be well received, for there is a prodigious amount of killing in it, besides some maps with the sporting areas marked in red. Among the game dealt with are included tigers, leopards, panthers, buffaloes, wild hogs, jackals, elephants, rhinoceros, and deer of several varieties; and the work may be exceedingly useful to those who wish to follow in the author's steps.

From the Anglo-Saxon.

"If you've once found the way you've achieved the great stroke," quotes F.W.L.B., in his preface to The Battle of Maldon and other Renderings from the Anglo-Saxon (Parker, 3s. 6d. n.), and with regard to the title-poem of his book at any rate, we can congratulate him on having found it. The Old English Epic, composed almost in the heat of Brihtnoth's great battle in 991, lacks, as Professor Sweet remarks, the high technical finish of some of the earlier Anglo-Saxon poems, but in rough dramatic power and the rage of battle it excels, and much of this has been successfully caught. The alliteration which emphasized the stress is suggested as far as possible. (Tennyson rather tends to over-alliterations in such lines as "Bracelet-bestower and Baron of Barons," in his "Brunanburgh.") A comparison with the original of the following lines shows them to be quite literal enough, and they are certainly spirited:—

> Then the Earl, in his pride, in his fatal pride,
> Gave the enemy leave to approach the shore;
> Byrthelm's brave son called over the water,
> Called to the foe while his soldiers did listen;
> "For you room is made! Instantly come,
> Foemen to the fight! Alone God knows
> Which of twain the field of slaughter shall rule!"
> The slaughter-wolves came; they recked not of the sea,
> The Viking horde! West over Panta,
> Over the clear water, they lifted their shields,
> Brought them alas! to the longed-for land.

In those original poems, however, in which the author attempts to apply the stress principle to modern verse, we fail to see anything but a collection of jerky apostrophes. Vide "The Weisshorn."

Versatile Verses.

Each of the six divisions into which Mr. C. K. Pooler groups the various pieces in his little book of TRANSLATIONS AND OTHER VERSES (Longmans, 3s.) provides excellent reading. The translations themselves lead off with a version of Tibullus, I. i., 41-78, and to eight lines representing it we subjoin the originals of the last four, difficulties in which have certainly been very happily met :—

> When surly winds are loud, how sweet to rest
> And fold my darling to my longing breast,
> When cold rains threaten in the wintry sky,
> To steal to dreamland mid their lullaby!
> This be my lot, and wealth ungrudged of me
> Be his who braves the rain-vexed ruffian sea;
> Ah, what were emerald or gold if weighed
> Against the tear of a forsaken maid.
> (Hoc mihi contingat: sit dives iure furorem
> Qui maris et tristes ferre potest pluvias.
> O quantum est auri potius pereatque smaragdi,
> Quam fleat ob nostras ulla puella vias.)

Other passages from Tibullus follow, all of which are good, and after a version or two from Martial and Avianus and a passage from the tenth satire of Juvenal—accurate enough but not especially remarkable—we come to one or two pieces less wholly classical. Of these the versions from Latin verses by the Elizabethans Greene and Buchanan are pleasant reading, while a translation from Landor's Minora Varia (lxxvii. Ad Puellam in Hispaniam) adds to the pleasure afforded by that delicate little composition. Last comes an octosyllabic paraphrase of Catullus' bridal song.

From the "Other Verses" which follow next here is a pretty roundel :—

> Call me, Dear, if a spider crawl,
> Call it a beetle or mouse appear,
> Only thee will I heed though all
> Call me, Dear.
> Beetle and spider and mouse I fear,
> Crawler and creeper alike appal,
> Yet if these or their kind be near,
> Sun may lighten or shadow fall,
> Late as early, my heart will hear;
> Call me but often, and when you call,
> Call me—"dear."

Many of them, however, go much further than this, excelling in the suggestiveness, so essential to the success of short poems of the imagination.

The "Idylls of Ulster" are sympathetic and spirited, and their enjoyment is increased by a rather necessary glossary, but with the "Burlesques" the note entirely changes. "O imitatores, servum pecus!" writes Mr. Pooler in the midst of a blank page to give us the clue, and we do not need one long. Fershtah is outfershtarized, Tommy Atkins sings a new barrack room ballad, and we fancy we recognize the source of this from "The Praise of Worms":—

> They turn at our tread—and we sicken,
> They touch—and fulfil us of squirms,
> But the soul of the fisher they quicken,
> And the pearl of his oyster is Worms.
> He christens them blackhead and brandling,
> He bears them about him as bait,
> He handles the horror, in handling
> Transfigured, elate.

To go back for a minute to "the Poete that beautifyeth Tommy Atkins," here is an extract from an essay "Of Poesie" which also is of the burlesque:—

> That the Poete be a man of Bloud, I allow well. At the leaste, he shall have seen it shed or smelled to it. For see hee shall lively pourtraye the Reeke of Carnage. Let him use Swearing meerely. Not as doe some upon Occasion and for Dispatch; lest, when hee cometh to Indite, his Hand should be out of use. For Arguments of State, they bee not amisse; nor the Qualitie of Great Personnes bee obscured, as that a Queene be styled "The Widdowe at such-a-place." But the meane Argument shall bee of Men Tribunitions and Turbulent, Assassins, Swashbucklers, and them that goe upon the Shoute. And the Words consonant and coming home to Mens Business and Bosomes. Namely,—

But Mr. Pooler's "Essaie" is running away with us, and "These," as he says, "bee Toyes."

New Books from Paris.

To the publishers of the Mercure de France we owe the French version of the notorious little book which contains that piquant and beautiful picture of the Empress of Austria drawn by her professor of Greek, Doctor Christomanos. M. Maurice Barrès contributes an introduction and M. Fernand Khnopff a portrait. Recently M. Jacques Bainville published a psychologic study of her half-mad cousin Louis II. of Bavaria (Perrin et Cie.). Doctor Christomanos had no such ambition. He is a poet, and a romantic poet, imprisoned by the Circe charm of the Empress, and he communicates to us something of the aroma of the potion which the enchantress offered him. M. Barrès frankly calls these "Ideas and Sensations" le plus étonnant poème nihiliste qu'on ait jamais vécu dans nos climats.

French literary circles always welcome an addition to the long list of monographs in M. Jusserand's series of "The Great French Writers" (Hachette). From the Victor Cousin of M. Jules Simon down to the Flaubert and the Bossuet of MM. Faguet and Rebelliau, M. Jusserand has passed from success to success over a list now of nearly fifty volumes. Each fresh monograph seems superior to its predecessor; and this illusion is well maintained now by the appearance of M. Emile Boutroux's PASCAL. Professor Boutroux of the Sorbonne sees Pascal as he was, wresting him from the hands of the polemical writers who have taken him as a "case" to serve their own ends; and after Sainte Beuve and M. Havet he has found so much to say that his picture of Pascal really seems, perhaps, to be the only possible one. M. Boutroux's Pascal appears as un génie très riche, avide d'unité et d'excellence, dont toutes les puissances, sans s'affaiblir, se sont rangées sous la foi, sous l'amour de Dieu. The biography is worthy of the author of "Etudes d'Histoire de la Philosophie."

The British School at Athens.

There are three sections in this year's ANNUAL OF THE BRITISH SCHOOL AT ATHENS (Session 1899-9, 7s. 6d.): Excavations in Melos, Excavations in Naucratis, and Some Doubtful Points of Thessalian Topography. In Melos the unexpected has happened, and, while looking for other things, the diggers chanced on the "Mycenæan" palace of the fourth settlement, of a different plan and in a different position from others. A well lined with earthen cylinders was found in the courtyard; and an ivory ring with a ritual scene carved in profile. The find of pottery was as large as last year's, but consisted chiefly of the same types; and there is further evidence for imported pottery. There the Melian work stops for the present, though incomplete, since Crete is thought to offer greater opportunities. Naucratis yielded a number of consecrated vase-fragments, and the base of a limestone statuette signed by a new name, Sicon of Cyprus. The discoveries were made in a new precinct, but what deity this was of there was nothing to prove, the dedications being to several. Mr. Hogarth, however, gives reasons for thinking this may be the Hellenion of Herodotus. The date of Naucratite pottery is discussed by Mr. Edgar. One curious find is part of a figure on a red-figure vase, which holds a roll on which is inscribed the first words of a hymn. Mr. Gutch examines the terra-cottas in great detail. The Annual is not so varied in its contents, perhaps not so interesting, as former ones; but excavations have their luck. We regret to see that the annual subscriptions are £50 less than they were last year. Scholars could not find a worthier object; and we confidently expect the campaign in Crete to yield remarkable results worth any man's money.

It seems a little curious that it should have taken two men to write THE STORY OF ALFRED THE GREAT, by Walter Hawkins and Edward Thornton Smith (Horace Marshall, 2s. 6d.), seeing that the book is so short that it only takes one man about half-an-hour to read it. Composed in simple language, and avoiding learned discussion of moot points, it is only addressed to the young and ignorant; and it ought to interest them if any book of the kind can. The approaching millenary celebrations will no doubt help it.

THE ECONOMICS OF MODERN COOKERY, by M. M. Mallock (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), is a second edition of a "A Younger Son's Cookery Book." Besides very good recipes of all kinds, there is an interesting chapter on the first principles of cooking, and at the end of the book there are some useful hints for housekeeping, catering, &c. It is not meant for poor households, but for those who keep three or four servants; though it is to be feared that the mistresses of that number of servants will not trouble to read it. The fine art of cooking does not, as a rule, interest our countrywomen very much. As the author says:—"In the knowledge which would enable them to control the management of their own kitchens, Englishwomen of the upper classes are, as a rule, deficient."

EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

English Literature.

Mr. A. J. Wyatt's TUTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE (Clive, 2s. 6d.) is a workmanlike and lucid account of English literary history from Anglo-Saxon times to the age of Wordsworth. It goes strictly on the principle of omitting the minor names, a controversial proceeding—we should have liked, for instance, to have had Smollett mentioned beside Fielding—but undoubtedly the right one, and on the whole the representatives are well chosen. The chief merit of the book is the breadth and intelligence of its view, and the real success with which sound principles of criticism are brought out and exemplified.

Messrs. Blackwood are doing a real service to English literature by publishing their series of "English Classics," some numbers of which lie before us. Mr. J. H. Lobban, the general editor, is responsible for GOLDSMITH'S SELECT POEMS (1s. 6d.); Mr. D. N. Smith edits MACAULAY'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (2s. 6d.); the others are Cowper, THE TASK AND MINOR POEMS, by Elizabeth Lee (2s. 6d.), Milton, PARADISE LOST, I.-IV., by Legie Robertson (2s. 6d.), Scott's LADY OF THE LAKE (1s. 6d.), and Johnson's LIVES OF MILTON AND ADDISON (2s. 6d.). The introduction to the last, by Mr. J. Wight Duff, strikes us as particularly good. In print and get-up we can conceive of nothing better than these books. Each has one or more process portraits, introductions, appendices, and notes. One general criticism we must make of a fault which may easily be remedied. The notes to particular portions are sometimes hard to find, because the pieces are not numbered, and the notes have not head-references to each page. The introductions are biographical, bibliographical, and critical. Mr. Smith in a careful essay discusses the characteristics of Macaulay's mind and style, and well brings out the peculiar fixity of his opinions. Some improvements might be made in his notes now and then; thus, Petrarch is mentioned without a word of Laura, and the "Blues of the Roman Circus" is explained only by references to Martial and Juvenal, while quotations are necessary. The addition of illustrative extracts from Johnson's verse was a good idea. The Goldsmith is a delightful book; if he touched nothing he did not adorn, both Mr. Lobban and his publisher have adorned Goldsmith. We hope the Cowper may find many readers; it appears to contain the best and most characteristic of his work. There is a short introduction and simple explanatory notes. Mr. Robertson's introduction and notes are fuller, as befits his subject; but we do not like the book of the inset examples in coarse type. Most of these books contain pieces of literature which are not often, if ever, read in schools; and teachers will without doubt be grateful.

THE WARWICK SHAKESPEARE is not so nice to look at nor so well printed as some we have lately reviewed, but the KING JOHN now before us (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) is a good piece of work, the notes and glossary simple and well suited to school work. We think it a pity, however, to tell the story of each scene in the notes; that should be the boy's task to make out. The dramatic points may fairly be insisted on, but more is unwise from the teacher's point of view. The metrical appendix is good; but again we ask, Why does no editor ever state what distinguishes verse from prose? The appendix on pronunciation is too elaborate, but will be useful for reference. The same may be said of the introduction, which a schoolmaster would need to use with judgment; the critical part, however, is good and will prove useful.

We have received HENRY V. (1s.) in Messrs. Longman's "Swan Shakespeare." The introduction contains some good Essays on Elizabethan Language and Shakespearian Grammar.

TWELFTH NIGHT and KING RICHARD II. are now added to the elegant Chiswick Shakespeare (Dent, 1s. 6d. each).

Dryden's ESSAY OF DRAMATIC POESY, written "to vindicate the honour of our English writers from the censure of those who unjustly prefer the French before them"—a somewhat singular purpose for a writer who plagiarized from Molière to a vow—is edited, with notes, by Mr. D. Nichol Smith (Blackie, 2s.). Students will be able to get from it a good idea of the English dramatic literature of the period.

Messrs. Black continue their edition of Scott. The TALISMAN is edited with an introduction, notes, and index, by W. Melven (1s. 6d.), QUENTIN DURWARD by H. W. Ord, the LADY OF THE LAKE by R. G. McKinlay (1s. n.), and the LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL by W. M. Mackenzie. Mr. Mackenzie also edits MARMION (Black, 2s. 6d.), with an introduction, biographical, historical, and a little criticism. The notes are satisfactory, and the print fairly good. The introductions to the two novels deal with the history of the times and any identification of the characters which may be possible. They extend to a few pages only, but contain all that is necessary. The notes explain difficult words and allusions historical or other. We understand that the text is somewhat abridged, and only the most useful or interesting parts of the author's notes and introductions have been retained. The indices certainly add to the usefulness of these books, which are quite well done. The plan of the poems is similar, but they have an additional page or two on the metre, and no index. A few pictures illustrate the books, the frontispiece being some scene described in the text, or Sir Walter himself in his study.

OLD MORTALITY in the Pitt Press Series (2s. 6d.) is like the other Scott volumes in this series, a capital example of what one likes to see in a school book. Mr. Nicklin's editing is very carefully done, and his notes are just sufficient to enable a boy or girl to read the book intelligently, with an occasional appeal to the critical faculty. We can warmly recommend, so far, this school edition of Scott.

French Grammars and Vocabularies.

THE TECHNICAL SCHOOL FRENCH GRAMMAR, by Dr. W. Krisch (Murray, 2s. 6d.), is, as the title implies, designed for use in technical schools. It would certainly be more useful than the conventional grammar to intelligent students who want to get the "hang" of the language in a hurry, though, of course, the result is only attained by leaving out a good many things that it is just as well to know. The exercises are well composed so as to introduce just those words which the student at a technical school is most likely to require to know. The book may be recommended—with the qualification that it is not for small children, but for those who begin to learn French at a later age.

COURS DE GRAMMAIRE FRANÇAISE ÉLÉMENTAIRE, by W. G. Hartog (Black, 1s.), though written in French, is intended for use in English schools. It is a new experiment in the teaching of languages, and we are not sanguine that it will prove successful. The student who stands in need of the elementary instruction which the book conveys will surely be incapable of reading it.

One would think there were plenty of FRENCH GRAMMARS in existence, but Mr. G. Eugène Fasnacht gives us another (Macmillan, 1s. 6d). We admit, however, that this is a capital book, clearly written, and printed so as to help the mind through the eye. But why have Messrs. Macmillan such a prejudice against decent margins? On some of these pages the print is almost shaved. There are no exercises.

French Words and Phrases, by J. G. Anderson and F. Storr (Rice, 1s.), is a classified collection of French vocabularies. It will help many students to fill up gaps in their knowledge; but it is not without inaccuracies. For example Œufs sur le plat is not quite the same thing as fried eggs; jupes and jupons are not interchangeable words any more than skirt and petticoat; the French for counterpane is not courre pieds but courte-pointe; the proper word for house coal is not houille but charbon; it is not fair to tell boys that le salon is the same thing as the Royal Academy, or le centre gauche as Liberal Unionists; and manger tout son soûl is a vulgarism that should not have been admitted. These points raised, however, the book may still be recommended.

Mr. Victor Spiers' First French Book for Children (Simpkin, Marshall, 2s. 6d.) is intended for the very young, as there are pictures of admirals, generals, boats, bridges, shepherdesses, &c., to illustrate the vocabularies; but we do not believe that any child of an age to be attracted by the pictures will be able to make head or tail of the transcription phonétique. The book should be useful, however, by reason of the hints which it throws out to teachers.

Science.

The three little volumes that make up Messrs. Gregory and Simons' Elementary Physics and Chemistry (Macmillan, 1s. 6d. each volume) treat their subject as introduced into the Code of the Board of Education in 1898, being intended for the use of the upper standards of public elementary schools. Their aim is not so much to impart information as to encourage a scientific habit of thought, and certainly the authors have done their best to foster every spark of intelligent appreciation that may arise in the pupil concerning the facts and processes dealt with. Everything is stated in the simplest possible terms and is mostly repeated several times over from different points of view, while the experimental work, to which very properly much importance is attached, only requires such apparatus and materials as must be available to almost every boy who is willing to take a little trouble.

The second part of Dr. Otto Schmeil's Text Book of Zoology (Black, 3s. 6d.), deals with birds, reptiles, and fishes. It gives descriptions, illustrated with pictures, of typical examples of the various families and orders, and suggests explanations of some of the peculiarities of structure exhibited by each. But it does not seem altogether to deserve the appellation "text book," and would more properly be regarded as an interesting reading book for lower classes, written with rather more scientific method than is usual in such productions.

A Short History of French Literature, by L. E. Kastner and H. G. Atkins (Blackie, 4s. 6d.), is intended to fill the gap that exists between the numerous primers of French literature and the larger works of Saintsbury and Dowden. It fills it reasonably well, though here and there one notes an omission or even an error. An account of Balzac, for instance, is hardly complete without a reference to the "Inconnue," nor is an account of Benjamin Constant complete without a mention of his "Journal Intime." And it is incorrect to say that the heroine of Benjamin Constant's "Adolphe" was "Madame de Stael." It is Madame de Charrière, of Neuchatel, who is there pourtrayed. On the whole, however, the book is a good one, and it is kept well up to date, omitting neither Verhaeren, nor Maeterlinck, nor Rostand. The authors have done wisely in dealing with writers of the first rank at length instead of filling their pages with lists of names of minor importance.

How to Learn Foreign Languages, by William Pulman (Heywood, 6d. n.), sets forth the merits of the Berlitz and Gouin systems of teaching, which propose to reproduce, so far as possible, in the class room the conditions in which a child learns its own language in the nursery. Our own opinion is that these methods of learning languages are not well suited to the case of students who wish to become scholars, and our opinion is confirmed by Mr. Pulman's representation that the old theory that a knowledge of Latin is a help to learning French was only put forward to conceal the incapacity of French masters. Those, however, who are interested to know what these methods of learning languages are like will find them lucidly explained in Mr. Pulman's book.

Le Songe d'Or gives its title to a collection of short stories by Charles Nodier, Rodolphe Töpffer, Prosper Mérimée, Théophile Gautier, and Gérard de Nerval, edited as a reader by Ernest Weekley (Blackie, 1s. 6d.). The notes are printed in the French language—a new departure we believe; and there are in appendices some exercises for retranslation. The editor's work is satisfactorily done.

Siepmann's "German Series" (Macmillan) we have had occasion to notice before. We have before us Ebner's Herr Walthers von der Vogelweide, edited by E. G. North, in the Elementary Series (2s.), and Kurz's Die Humanisten, by A. Vögelin, in the Advanced (2s. 6d.). The paper is bad in both books, and the print of "Die Humanisten" might be clearer with advantage. In both, a hideous obscure German type is used in the notes, and the same in the vocabulary of the Elementary book, which is serious. Apart from this, we can praise both. They are interesting, and a welcome novelty amid the crambe repetita usually served up in schools. The notes are brief and to the point, and the editing satisfactory. The books have the usual appendices; words and phrases for class use, sentences, and connected pieces for translation; "Die Humanisten" also has a few pages on the formation of words, which should prove useful.

The World is the title of a new school geography by Lionel W. Lyde (Black, 2s. 6d. n.). It is particularly strong in the matter of commercial geography, and adopts an interesting comparative method of bringing geographical truths home to youthful minds. Thus we read that Rouen is the Manchester of France, and Havre its Liverpool, that Odessa is a city the size of Leeds, and Genoa the size of Bristol. The idea seems a good one, though the plan would not enable students to satisfy all examiners; and interesting portions of the globe which have no commercial importance seem to us to be treated with unnecessary contempt.

Mr. G. E. Green's Short History of the British Empire for the Use of Junior Forms (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.) is not quite the book that the title had led us to expect. It is really a history of England, with a few notes on the growth of the empire interspersed and appended. There are about 230 pages, and we do not get to "the beginnings of British Empire" till page 161.

The German Empire, by Julius Langhans (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.), is a German reader designed on a somewhat new plan for the use of the higher forms of public schools and the candidates for Army examinations. It consists of passages from standard authors relating a series of striking episodes in German history with the idea of combining historical and linguistic teaching. The notes are mainly on the history, and very seldom on the language; and there are chronological and genealogical tables for purposes of reference. A useful compilation.

New Testament Greek: a course for beginners, by Geo. Rodwell, B.A. (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), is intended for those who, as Dr. Lock says in an introductory note, "come late to the study of Greek and value it mainly as a means of closer access to the exact meaning" of the New Testament. The book is based on a study of good authorities, such as Winer and Blass, and is likely to be of real use to beginners. Its methods are well adapted for the purposes of progressive and stimulating teaching.

FICTION.

Sir Walter Besant.

In his latest novel, The Fourth Generation (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), Sir Walter Besant comes back to the present day; but we need not, it may be hoped, anticipate that this very skilfully told tale of 1899 will bar the way to more of those pictures of old-fashioned London for which few writers are so well equipped as Sir Walter, and which, perhaps, no living novelist can paint so well. The story of Leonard Campaigne touches the old problem of heredity; but it faces that problem in the spirit of the practical man of the world. Sir Walter gives us a crime; and he gives us its consequences even to the fourth generation. But he agrees with the prophet Ezekiel that the children's teeth are not set on edge as a punishment for their father's feast of sour grapes. The one is "post" not "propter"; the other—a consequence, not a retribution. The crime changes the conditions of life for the sons and the grandsons, but it does not deprive them of their right to alter these conditions or to develop their own characters. The consequences, indeed, to Leonard Campaigne were not very terrible; rather the contrary. They changed him from a prig to a man of a good heart and good sense, and they gave him a wife. The change in his character came about by the sudden discovery that his family history instead of presenting the unblemished record upon which he prided himself was a catalogue of disgraces and disasters. Mother Hubbard found not even a single bone in her cupboard. Leonard Campaigne found it crowded with skeletons. It was an original idea, which adds great picturesqueness to the story, to keep on the scene the original criminal, the head of the house of Campaigne, who, after murdering his friend and brother-in-law, lived as a recluse on the family estate for seventy years without speaking even to his servants. The consequences of his crime, and the fortunes of his descendants as they touch the life of Leonard, are, as we have said, described and followed with all the skill of a master in the art of story-telling, up to the moment when the stain is wiped out, and the momentum, as it were, of the crime exhausted, by the marriage of the descendant of the murderer to the descendant of his victim. Two points strike us as falling short of strict verisimilitude—the absence of any suspicion at the trial fastening the mysterious murder on the old squire, and the career of Leonard's uncle, who has the reputation of being an eminent counsel, and is really engaged in the lucrative business of supplying public speakers with their thunder at so much a speech. To suppose that he could have done this without, as we are told, having ever opened a law book, and without being found out by Lincoln's Inn, puts a severe strain on our credulity. But it will not interfere with the enjoyment to be derived from the book, which, with its dexterously ordered plot and its varied and interesting characters, is fully worthy of its writer.

Mr. Henry James.

The twelve studies collected by Mr. James under the generic title of THE SOFT SIDE (Methuen, 6s.) will probably make new converts to his cult. Each story possesses to a high degree the sensitiveness and detachment which one generally finds in his works. "The Great Good Place" seems to us to present Mr. James at his best. It is a fine allegory of the meeting between death and a man, an overworked and perhaps hypersensitive literary man. George Dane is beset by a thousand of such trials as might come to a generous literary genius. His interview with his perfect servant before breakfast one morning gives us his mental state with the peculiar vividness of suggestion. It happens that he has asked a stranger, a young, unknown writer, to breakfast. As he takes his hand within his own a sense of new consciousness environs him. He passes to a wonderfully described land of beauty and peace. There is a suggestion about it of some "great abode of an order, some mild Monte Cassino, some Grande Chartreuse more accessible." In this land Dane meets, among the peaceful figures who pass about him, a brother, and their conversation is the most delightful of intercourse. One of the charms of the place is that the unnecessary things are not there. "One by one he touched, as it were, all the things it was such rapture to be without." Gradually there is a sense of perfect accomplishment and happiness is complete. It is a delicate fancy and one eminently suited to Mr. James' genius. Among the sketches is one of an American girl, "Miss Gunton of Poughkeepsie," with whom a Roman Prince is in love. The varied points of view of the European and the American are handled with remarkable ability. But perhaps the most wonderful "fine shades" are to be found in the story of three old maiden ladies and their mother. This is entitled "Europe," and tells with an elusive delicacy that almost bewilders the reader of the tragedy which each is made to suffer by reason first of submission to the mother's will and then by the revolt against it. The secret of such a book is contained in one of Mr. James' own phrases, "It rests like all good things on experience."

The Regency.

". . . . Then hast laid upon us with thy left hand, life, and said: Live," quotes Mr. John le Breton in the forefront of Mrs'ess Joy (Macqueen, 6s.), and, although this is not a great book, he has certainly managed to convey the idea that Joy did live and love, and his pictures of the days of the Regent are far more convincing than is usually the case with a semi-historical romance. But if Mr. le Breton does not give us a great book the present one serves again to show that as a writer of fiction he is at least competent and agreeable. Farmer Eden—a well-drawn and original figure of the British yeoman of the time of the last George—his sisters, his daughter, his illegitimate daughter Joy, and his nephew Richard are all interesting persons, and their fortunes, although not happy, will be found to entertain.

Correspondence.

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—So long as the attempt to replace "of" and other prepositions by the inflectional s was confined to the enterprise of journalism, one could afford to smile at such affectations as "Italy's King," "Peking's entry," "Mafeking's ape," and the like. But when a writer of Mr. Andrew Lang's calibre appears to sanction, as he does in a recent article, "The Novel's Evolution," is it not time to protest, and to ask how far this usage, which has nothing to recommend it but its doubtful archaism, is to be allowed to spread? What would be thought of a man who, at the dinner table, or in the smoking-room, or, for that matter, in the House of Commons, could bring himself to speak of "Peking's entry"? Yet "the Novel's evolution" is little better, and in some respects is even worse, as it may be worth while to show. In the first place, only a limited class of English nouns in modern usage enjoys the privilege of personification, and personification alone as a rule justifies inflection. Now, although we should most of us hesitate in cold blood to speak of Peking as she, we might in a moment of exaltation conceivably do so. But surely, in discoursing of the novel, his or her evolution would neither be English as she is spoke nor as she is writ. A second objection to "The Novel's Evolution" is that the inflection expresses the objective relation, which in modern English is almost invariably expressed by means of the preposition of, to the great gain of the language as regards perspicuity; while such a barbarism as "Peking's entry" has from this point of view still less justification, as the relation which it is intended to express is not exactly objective, and requires the preposition into rather than of.

There may, of course, be an affectation of precision as well as of preciosity, and it would be absurd to contend that such time-honoured phrases as "a stone's throw," or "the Queen's reception"—meaning the reception of and not by the Queen—are no longer current coin. But it may safely be asserted that they no longer issue from the mint, or—to drop the metaphor—that the tendency of the language has long been to limit rather than to extend the power of our only case, and, except in such idiomatic survivals as are familiar to the ear and cause no ambiguity, to use it solely to express the possessive, or the subjective, relation.

A third objection to this unnecessary intrusion of the inflectional s is that it tends to aggravate the sibilation, which is already excessive in the language, and gave point to Charles V.'s characterization of English as the language of geese. Who, on this ground alone, would not prefer "the evolution of the novel" to "the novel's evolution," "the Paris Exhibition" to "Paris's Exhibition," and "the Mafeking ape" to "Mafeking's ape"? But a short object-lesson will probably be more convincing than any amount of discussion. Let us therefore see what would be the effect of a little judicious forcing of the pernicious germ which seems already to have effected an entrance into the language. Not long hence we might have Mr. Lang's article opening thus:—"That an English Literature's learned professor in New York's University should write a book on 'The English Novel's Evolution' would have astonished the world a century ago." A little lower down we might come to—"Professor Stoddard is no evolutional method's bigot in the mind's things. He even writes 'We cannot say that 1740's novels legitimately developed into 1780's novels, that 1780's novels logically developed into 1820's novels,' and so on." A little lower down still—"Novels' all sorts' elements had always been lying about loose." And the paragraph might well conclude as now—"To that have we come." It is sincerely to be hoped that Mr. Andrew Lang was merely quoting the phrase which he found ready to hand in the title of the book he was reviewing, and that he by no means committed himself to approval of this usage, which has, we believe, been largely adopted by American writers, and has already spread from their side of the Atlantic to our own. Yours faithfully,

E. D. LITTLE.

"SIN-EATING."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Mr. Ernest Rhys' most interesting and gracefully-told story "The Whistling Maid" there is a ballad which is introduced in these words: "Her voice was wild and sweet as she sang an old ballad of Kai and Gwenhwyfar (the Welsh Launcelot and Guinevere), sometimes called 'The Song of the Seven Candles.'"

From this ballad I quote the following verses, omitting the interspersed refrain, except where it forms an integral part of the song:

Tell cruel Kai, Gwenhwyfar's pride,
Like a queen's, waxed as she died.

. . . .

Now from her wake let Kai begone
To the Hunt King in Caledon.
But first before he leave (she said
To the damsels, to the damsels)
Offer him the salt and bread
(To her damsels said the Queen).
If he will eat my sins for me
Kai's soul is lost, and mine goes free.

I do not know the original ballad—if, as is implied, what Mr. Rhys gives is a translation. But I am almost certain that in no Welsh ballad dating before the seventeenth century could the belief referred to in the last couplet have found expression.

Down to about a century before the Reformation the documents known since as the False (or Forged) Decretals formed an unquestioned part of the authorized teaching of Western Christendom. Among those documents there is an epistle attributed to Pope Alexander I., in which the expression "They eat up the sin of my people" (Hosea iv., 8) is interpreted praying for the people. This was pointed out in the lifetime of John Aubrey by Dr. Comber in his "Roman Forgeries"—a work which, from what we know of Aubrey's tastes in reading, that worthy is almost certain to have been acquainted with. (Another work bearing the same name, which Comber refers to in laudatory terms, may also have noticed this interpretation, but I have not seen it.) Anyhow the expression seems to have tickled the fancy of John Aubrey, as it has since his time that of Joseph Downes, Miss Fiona Macleod, and other story-tellers; for he does not hesitate to call the paupers who haunted funeral gatherings for the sake of a dole "sinne-eaters." But it should be noticed that, as Aubrey himself informed Bagford, "Old Sires" was the name they were known by. Curiously enough, while "Sin-eater" is a term entirely unknown in Wales, Hen Syr, the exact equivalent of "Old Sire" has survived down to the present century as a name given to clerical schoolmasters, and curates unattached—that is, to persons hanging on more or less loosely to the clerical profession.

Down to the time of the Commonwealth, it is quite certain that belief in purgatory, and therefore in the efficacy of prayers for the dead, was not uncommon in the Principality. Indeed, Wales is joined to "Ireland and certain parts of England" as a field for the University Mission set on foot by Matthew Poole and others a few years before the Restoration.

The phrase used—according to Bagford's version of Aubrey's description—by the "Old Sire" that he was ready to "pawn his own soul" on behalf of that of the defunct has been instanced by folk-lorists as a heathenish idea not countenanced by the Church. That is not so. It is in the mouth of a Dominican friar that Erasmus puts the very same phrase in his well-known picture of a rich knight's death-bed.

I am inclined to believe that it is on the authority of Mr. Sidney Hartland, and not of any mediæval Welsh chronicler, Mr. Ernest Rhys was relying when he composed the couplet which I am referring to. But the author of the "Legend of Perseus" is a very blind guide to the usages and beliefs of the Western Church. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. P. OWEN.

EDUCATION AND FAMILY HISTORY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In this great day of education, with the present century shortly drawing to its close, permit me, as one who has had some experience in the study of human pedigree, to call attention in your columns to what appears to me a subject sadly lost sight of in the past, and which, I trust, will claim at least some position in the code of education in the future. I refer to the study of family history and pedigree, with due consideration and analysis of their influences and bearings.

This surely should not be a mere personal or private matter. It is a subject of the highest and widest order, of the utmost importance to the nation and to the world at large; but the utter indifference and ignorance of the subject are really surprising. A large amount of time and attention are given to the investigation of beings and objects of centuries ago, and the utmost care and scrutiny bestowed upon tracing the history and pedigree of the dog, horse, or cow, whilst the human animal, upon which so much depends, is entirely forgotten. Even in the all-important subject of marriage it is a matter of pounds rather than of pedigree, the latter being almost completely ignored, save so far, perhaps, as outward appearances and position are concerned. Knowledge is power, and the proper study of mankind is man, and this study should begin at home; the study is invaluable, showing as it does the why and the wherefore of certain effects, what to stimulate and what to avoid, and if reduced to a science endless physical and mental mistakes might be avoided. Man is a bundle of habits, and these are traced down from one generation to another, and no knowledge is of such vital importance to the human race as the careful analysis and understanding of the laws of pedigree.

Lunacy is proved to be largely increasing, and no wonder, when such ignorance prevails: the very keystone to its prevention and treatment is to be found in this study and in this study alone. The very gist of success depends upon detection of the real cause. What is born in the bone need not come out in the flesh. I know as a fact that members of certain families have been plunged generation after generation into helpless lunacy—every case of which might have been absolutely avoided had their first indications of eccentricity been attributed to their true causes, and by skilful manipulation diverted in their courses and nipped in the bud. The weak points have been clearly brought to light, when, alas! it has been too late, upon simple investigation of early pedigree and history, but from lack of knowledge of the true causes the axe has never been laid to the root of the evil. I repeat that the most mysterious mental and physical complications which have puzzled alike person, philosopher, and physician have been made as clear as the sun at noonday when viewed by the penetrating Röntgen rays of family history. I maintain that this study, duly considered, may become one of the mightiest levers for the development and improvement of the human race.

It is never too late to mend, and, if we have to remain largely in the dark from lack of adequate statistics in the past, we may at least help future generations by making the subject of heredity a standard study in our various colleges and training institutions for teachers, thus handing down for the guidance of our progeny some intelligent basis for the delineation of their family history with its particular characteristics and proclivities. Faithfully yours,

T. THATCHER.

MULTIPLE REVIEWING.

TO THE EDITOR

Sir,—May I, whilst thanking you heartily for the insertion of my letter, point out that my failure to properly appreciate the fact that your anecdote referred to "old unhappy days" was shared by others. The paragraphist caught it up as he catches up all scandal, and wrote as though it applied to the world of to-day. His gloss obscured (as is the way of a gloss) your text. Believing such a thing to be impossible nowadays, a belief which I am glad to see is shared by you, I could not but protest.

With all the strength I possess I would express my agreement with your view of Multiple Reviewing. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred I hold the practice to be utterly indefensible. Faithfully yours,

ALFRED NUTT.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A distinctive feature of Messrs. Chapman and Hall's new edition of Dickens' works (to be called the "Authentic Edition") will be the coloured frontispieces to each volume—reproductions for the most part of the most popular of the designs for the original issue; the rest of the illustrations are to be reproduced "by a new process." In the prospectus we are also reminded that the prototype of the immortal Mr. Pickwick was a friend of Mr. [Edward] Chapman's, who resided at Richmond, and that Seymour's portrait of him was made from Mr. Chapman's description. We are further told that Seymour's first sketch of the famous founder of the Pickwick Club was that of "a long, thin man." It is, however, not generally known that, in making him short and "comfortable," the artist was only reverting to an earlier conception and a favourite type, as will be seen in that scarce production entitled "The Heiress," illustrated by Seymour six years previously, and in "Maxims and Hints for an Angler" (1833), where we may find a character portrayed in marvellous similitude to Mr. Pickwick, both as regards physique and benignity of expression. The name of Mr. Chapman's friend (whom Seymour had never set eyes upon, apparently) was John Foster, a gentleman of the old school, who persisted in wearing drab tights and black gaiters, a costume then out of date.

Two further items must be added to our list of Shakespearian announcements for the autumn season. Both come from New York, and are to be published by Messrs. Macmillan. One is a new life of the poet, with portraits and views. The author is Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, whose aim has been to tell the story of Shakespeare's life in the same spirit in which the biographies of contemporaries are written. The other item is a chapter on "Shakespeare as a Comic Dramatist," by Professor Dowden, in the first volume of a series of "Representative English Comedies," to be completed in five volumes under the editorship of Professor Gayley, of the University of California. Professor Gayley has written an introduction to the volume and has also edited "Robert Greene" and "Henry Porter." Among the other dramatists represented in the first volume are "John Heywood," edited by A. W. Pollard; "Nicholas Udall," edited by Professor Ewald Flugel; "Gammer Gurton's Needle," edited by Henry Bradley; "John Lyly," edited by Professor G. P. Baker; "George Peele," edited by Professor F. B. Gummere; and "Green's Place in Comedy," by Professor G. E. Woodberry.

The centenary of the birth of Hans Christian Andersen is to be celebrated by the issue of a new edition of his fairy tales in the original, and translations in English, German, French, and Norwegian. It is said that the Danish Government is supervising the undertaking. Hans Tegner, the Danish artist, illustrates it. The book will, we believe, have an introduction by Mr. Gosse and will be published by Mr. Heinemann.

Perhaps the most remarkable thing about the English programme of Messrs. Macmillan is the fact that the édition de luxe of the writings of Walter Pater, in eight volumes (uniform with Tennyson, Lamb, and Kipling), which will not be completed before April next, is already out of print. Yet orders were only taken for complete sets. The "Collected Poems of T. E. Brown," which Messrs. Macmillan have had in hand some time, will appear early next month, fitting in appropriately with the Letters of Brown which Messrs. Constable are publishing. The first week in October will also see the publication of Mr. Morley's "Life of Oliver Cromwell" in two forms, one as a library edition and the other illustrated with authenticated portraits in public and private galleries, and with reproductions of contemporaneous prints in the British Museum and the University of Oxford. A week or so later will come Mr. Leonard Huxley's life of his father, Thomas Huxley, in two volumes. This is a study, not so much of Huxley's contributions to science, nor of his philosophic views, as of the man himself, of his character and the circumstances in which his various works were completed. A "Life of Charles V.," by Edward Armstrong, and an abridged edition of the life of Archbishop Benson, by his son, are also announced. Early in November the same publishers will issue one of the most elaborately illustrated volumes of the year—"Eighteenth Century Colour Prints: An Essay on certain Stipple Engravers and their work in Colour," by Mrs. Julia Frankau. A feature of the book will be fifty-two pictures, representing the work of as many different engravers as possible, and printed in colour from copper plates. A contribution to Æsthetics will be "The Origins of Art: A Psychological and Sociological Enquiry," by Dr. Yrjo Hirn, of the University of Helsingfors. Dr. Hirn's idea is to show how art has been connected with the most primitive functions of human life, and he differs from other authorities in not selecting any one of these as of paramount importance. A book is announced on "Early Christian Art and Archæology," by Walter Lowrie, D.D., sometime Fellow of the American School of Classical Studies in Rome (written for the general reader as well as for the student); and the first volume of a "Dictionary of Architecture and Building," to which over eighty American and European writers will contribute, under the editorship of Russell Sturgis. A similar work in preparation is a "Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology," in three volumes, edited by J. Mark Baldwin Stuart, Professor of Psychology at Princeton University. Mr. James Bryce has written an introduction to M. Ostrogorski's "Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties," which has been translated from the French by Frederick Clarke, formerly Taylorian Scholar at Oxford—a work which attempts to give a systematic history of party organization both in England and the United States.

In theology Messrs. Macmillan announce "The First Epistle of St. Peter (Greek Text)," by Principal Howard Masterman; "The Christian Prophets and the Prophetic Apocalypse," by Dr. Edward Selwyn; "Christ the Truth," being the Angus Lectures for 1900, by the Rev. W. Medley; "St. Paul and Contemporary Thought," by H. St. John Thackeray; a new edition of "The Works of Bishop Butler," edited by Dr. J. H. Bernard, with a general introduction by the Bishop of London (The English Theological Library); and a new edition of Francis Proctor's "New History of the Book of Common Prayer," revised and rewritten by Walter Howard Frere, M.A. Under "Travel and Adventure" are included a new edition of the late Miss Mary Kingsley's "West African Studies," with additional chapters; "The Romance of Spain," by Charles W. Wood; and "Soldiering in Canada: Recollections and Experiences," by Lt.-Colonel George T. Denison, late commanding the Governor-General's Body Guard. The next volume of the Highways and Byways Series will appear towards the end of next month, and will deal with East Anglia, the author being Mr. William Dutt, and the artist Mr. Joseph Pennell. In a new work entitled "Rulers of the South: Sicily, Calabria, and Malta," Mr. F. Marion Crawford has dealt with the three kingdoms named in the same way that he dealt with Rome in "Ave Roma Immortalis." "Rulers of the South" will be in two volumes, with photogravures and illustrations in the text by Henry Brokman. "E. V. B." is represented by an illustrated book entitled "Sylvana's Letters to an Unknown Friend." Macmillan's leave also many American books, of which we shall give further mention next week.

History, geography, and travel are well to the fore in Mr. Heinemann's new list. The first volume of the English edition of Professor Helmolt's "Universal History of Mankind," which has the advantage of an editorial introduction by Professor James Bryce, will appear towards the end of the year. Subsequent volumes will follow at quarterly intervals. The translation of Professor Seignobos' "Political History of Contemporary Europe" will be in two volumes. The author takes the year 1814 as the beginning of the century, looking upon the Napoleonic period as an overlapping of the effects of the revolution of the last century. He carries the history down to within the last few years. Among political phenomena common to European communities he pays special attention to the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church and the revolutionary Socialists. "The Regions of the World—1900," the new series descriptive of the physical environment of the nations, edited by H. J. Mackinder, was announced by us some time ago. Mr. Mackinder has also written a volume on "The First Ascent of Mount Kenya," a narrative of the expedition which he led last year to the summit of the great snow mountain immediately under the Equator. "The Awakening of the East: Siberia—China—Japan," by Pierre Leroy-Beaulieu, translated by Richard Davey, and edited, with an introduction, by Henry Norman; "The Life of William Cotton Oswell," the African traveller of whom Judge Hughes said that "without his help Livingstone could never have crossed the Kalahari Desert," written by his son, W. E. Oswell, are other books of travel included in this publisher's autumn list. Mr. Heinemann's most important art publication will be the life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, by Sir Walter Armstrong, a companion volume to the life of Gainsborough by the same author. Other volumes will be "Classic Art: An Introduction to the Italian Renaissance," by Herr Wölfflin; "Roman Art: Some of its Principles and their Application to Early Christian Painting," by Professor Franz Wickhoff, translated and edited by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong; and "Pompeii; The City, its Life and Art—an Artistic Survey of Archæological Achievements," by Pierre Gusman, translated by Florence Simmonds and M. Jourdain, with an introduction by Max Collignon. "Characters from Romance," a portfolio of sixteen pastels by William Nicholson (who, by the way, has been awarded the gold medal at the Paris Exhibition for his series of Portraits of Celebrities), we have already referred to; also to the monumental edition of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales. Another illustrated volume in the list is Mr. Henry James' "A Little Tour in France," a record of his wanderings in Touraine, suggested by the fact that Englishmen and Americans are too apt to look upon a visit to Paris "as a process that gives them a sufficient knowledge of the pleasant land and its inhabitants." Among other volumes is another Dooley book, by Mr. Peter Dunne—"Mr. Dooley's Philosophy," this time—and Mr. Whibley's study of dandyism, entitled "The Pageantry of Life." Among new editions is another re-issue of Mr. Whistler's "Gentle Art of Making Enemies," which has been out of print for some years.

In the department of literature Mr. Heinemann announces "Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature," in six volumes, translated from the Danish of Dr. George Brandes by Diana White; "Studies in Style," by W. H. Helm; M. Bréal's "Semantics," edited by Professor Postgate; and the following volumes in the series of short histories of the Literatures of the World:—"Chinese Literature," by Professor H. A. Giles; "Modern Scandinavian Literature," by Dr. George Brandes; "Hungarian Literature," by Dr. Zoltan Beöthy, Professor of Hungarian Literature at the University of Budapest; "American Literature," by Professor W. P. Trent; "Latin Literature," by Dr. A. W. Verrall; "Provençal Literature," by Dr. H. Oelsner; and "Hebrew Literature," by Professor Philippe Berger, of the Institute of France.

Mr. William Canton, who is editing "The True Annals of Fairyland" for Messrs. Dent, has also collected and edited a volume of "Children's Sayings," which will be published by Messrs. Isbister—uniform with the little volume of "Lighter Moments," by Bishop Hervey, issued last autumn. The new list of Messrs. Isbister includes: "The Religious Spirit of Our Poets," by Bishop Boyd Carpenter; "The Miracles of Jesus: Marks of the Way of Life," by the Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang; a life of "William Conyngham Plunket, Fourth Baron Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin," by Mr. Frederick Douglas How; a pocket edition of "Tennyson: his Art and Relation to Modern Life," by Stopford A. Brooke, in two volumes (uniform with the pocket edition of Dean Plumptre's "Dante"); and a volume by the Rev. John M. Bacon on his experiments as a balloonist, entitled "By Land and Sky."

In connexion with the celebration last year of the tercentenary of its consecutive minutes the Lodge of Edinburgh (Mary's Chapel) No. 1 is bringing out a new and limited edition of its history. The work, of which D. Murray Lyon, the Scottish Great Lodge Secretary, is author, will be published by the Gresham Publishing Company. This lodge is said to be the oldest existing Freemasons' Lodge in the world. Its position in Scotland dates from the official Masonic Statutes of December 28th, 1599, in which we read:—"It is thocht needfull and expedient be my Lord Warden Generall that Edr. salbe in all tyme cuming as of befoir the first and principall Ludge in Scotland, and yet Kilwynning be the second Ludge as of befoir is notourlie manefest in our awld antient writts and that Stirling salbe the third Ludge conforme to the awld privileges thairof. William Schaw, Maistir of Wark, Wairden of ye Maisons."

Fiction.—Besides the volumes in the uniform editions of the novels of Matilde Serao and Gabriele D'Annunzio, Mr. Heinemann announces about twenty new books, including "The Lane that had no Turning," by Gilbert Parker (to appear on October 4); "The Mantle of Elijah," by I. Zangwill; "The Hosts of the Lord," by Flora Annie Steel; "Jack Raymond," by Mrs. Voynich; "Ronald Kestrel," by A. J. Dawson; "The Queen versus Billy," by Lloyd Osbourne; "The Eagle's Heart," by Hamlin Garland; "The Inheritors," by Joseph Conrad and Ford Maddox Hueffer; "Thirteen Stories," by R. B. Cunninghame Graham; "The Lady of Dreams," by Ura Lucy Silberrad; and "The Hidden Model," by Frances Forbes Robertson. Later on we are promised new novels by Hall Caine, Miss Robins, Kassandra Vivaria, Sarah Grand, E. F. Benson, and many others.

We gave a list of Macmillan's forthcoming novels some weeks ago, but several additions are now made, including "Who Goes There?"; The Story of a Spy in the Civil War," by B. K. Benson; "Pharaoh's Daughter, and Other Stories," by Wm. Waldorf Astor; "Number One and Number Two," by Frances M. Peard, and "Dr. North and his Friends," by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. The title of Mr. Winston Churchill's new book—the second of the series of novels to which "Richard Carvel" belongs—is "The Crisis"; that of Mr. Egerton Castle's volume, which is to appear very shortly, is "Marsatfield the Observer, and the Dance of Death: Studies of Character and Action." The "Leather Stocking Novels" (five vols.) of J. Fenimore Cooper are also to be republished by Macmillan, with a general introduction by Mowbray Morris, and illustrations by C. E. and H. M. Brock. Finally, but without exhausting the list, we note that "More Letters of Edward FitzGerald," edited by W. Aldis Wright, will be added to the Eversley Series.

Next month Messrs. Isbister will issue two novels, "The Half-Hearted," by John Buchan, and "The Heiress of the Forest," a romance of Old Anjou, by Eleanor C. Price.

Next week Messrs. W. and R. Chambers will issue an illustrated volume of "Venture and Valour" stories, to which Mr. G. A. Henty, Dr. A. Conan Doyle, Mr. G. M. Fenn, Mr. W. W. Jacobs, Mr. Tom Gallon, Dr. Gordon Stables, and other writers have contributed. "Charge! or Briton and Boer," by George Manville Fenn, and two books by L. T. Meade, entitled "Seven Maids" and "Miss Nonentity," will also be published by Messrs. Chambers next month.

Mr. J. Charles Wall, whose work on "The Tombs of the Kings of England" is well known, is engaged on a volume on "Alfred the Great and his Abbeys." It will be fully illustrated and will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Mr. Alexis Krausse's "The Story of the Chinese Crisis" will be published next week by Messrs. Cassell and Company.

The incidents preceding the Boxer rising are given in considerable detail.

The Fortnightly Review promises some new features, especially a résumé of current literature, and an account of the chief dramatic production in England and on the Continent, on alternate months. There is also to be a series of articles on the contemporary leaders of thought.

The poet and academician, Sully Prudhomme, is to publish this winter a work entitled "Testament d'un Poète," in which he discusses verse forms and laws of prosody, and gives us his ideas of the nature of beauty and the sources of inspiration.

The new book by Elizabeth of the "German Garden" and "A Solitary Summer" (the Countess of Arnim) is to be called "The April Baby's Book of Tunes," and published by Messrs. Macmillan. She tells how the mother of three little girls, named April, May, and June respectively, lived with them among the forests of Germany, and taught them the old English nursery rhymes to keep them out of mischief. She gives her own tunes and the children's comments on the words, as well as an account of the games which arose out of them. The book, as already announced in Literature, is illustrated by Miss Kate Greenaway.

Mr. Brimley Johnson will publish for the Christmas season a nonsense picture-book, by a new artist-writer—"Greybeards at Play: Literature and Art for Old Gentlemen, Ballads, and Sketches," by Gilbert Chesterton.

A good many literary societies and other institutions have profited by Messrs. Newnes's offer to lend lectures with lantern-slides to illustrate them, the cost of the carriage only being charged. The new lectures available are, we notice, "A Day and Night in Newspaperland," "England's Beautiful Homes," "Gems of Religious Art," "Popular Artists and Their Work," "Famous Authors and How They Write Their Books," "Some Popular Hymn Writers."

Mr. G. C. Dobbs, M.A., has joined Mr. S. T. Freemantle as partner, and the firm will be continued under the style of Freemantle and Co.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

With our next number we shall publish a Supplement containing a complete list of the Publishers' autumn announcements. The names of the books will be arranged, as in our list of last year, according to subjects, the books issued by each publishing house being placed under each heading according to the alphabetical order of their publishers. The same issue will contain a "Personal View" by the Countess of Jersey, on "The Literature of Society, Past and Present."

* * * *

Interest is naturally felt in the appearance of the names of two popular novelists—Dr. Conan Doyle and Mr. Gilbert Parker (Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins has withdrawn)—in the list of Parliamentary candidates. The novelists who have sat in the House of Commons in the past—Disraeli and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton for example—have been rather politicians who have written novels than novelists who have gone in for politics. The candidates whose fame really rested on their novels—candidates like Thackeray and Trollope—have, almost without exception, been defeated. Absit omen!

* * * *

Indeed, if as we are nowadays told the novel is to be the form in which ideas of all kinds are to find expression, this new departure in politics looks like a natural outcome of the tendency. At any rate there is no possible reason why novelists should not make valuable members of Parliament. They have often shown that they have a real grip of practical problems with which Parliament has to deal. Dickens pleaded eloquently, in "Bleak House," for the simplification of procedure in the Court of Chancery. Charles Reade understood the necessity of reforming prisons and private lunatic asylums, and also assisted usefully in the work generally associated with the name of Samuel Plimsoll. It was justly remarked the other day by Sir Walter Besant that some of the wisest utterances on the South African situation at the time of the raid came from the pen of the author of "The Man who Corrupted Hadleyburg." Sir Walter himself saw sooner than anyone else the need and the possibilities of a People's Palace in the East End. Mr. Gilbert Parker, as we had occasion to mention only the other day, has rendered valuable service in helping to bring the Canadian Copyright difficulty within sight of settlement. If he is elected, he may render service hardly less valuable by pointing out to Her Majesty's advisers that general elections in the middle of the publishing season are opposed to the best interests of the country.

* * * *

Another novelist in the field is Mr. Mullett Ellis, who is standing for the Strand Division. It will be remembered that not many months ago the firm of W. H. Smith and Son declined to expose for sale on their bookstalls a novel which Mr. Mullett Ellis had written, and that Mr. Mullett Ellis confided his grievance to the Press. He now hopes to give expression to his feelings by representing the Strand Division. The Nemesis which he invokes would indeed be worthy of melodrama were Mr. Mullett Ellis to oust the Hon. W. F. D. Smith from a constituency within which (to quote his address) "the true heart of the nation is pulsing."

* * * *

The latest addition to the long list of periodicals is the Northern Counties Magazine, which is apparently intended to occupy a position analogous to that of the Home Counties Magazine, though the contents of the first number indicate that the editor desires to satisfy the literary as well as the antiquarian interests of his hyperborean supporters. A history of "Elswick"—"to be continued"—is the most distinctly local contribution; though Mr. E. V. Lucas, who writes a literary letter, devotes the whole of his space to "cracking up" two Northern writers—Mr. Sutcliffe and Mr. Alfred Ollivant. Sir William Eden writes on "Aspects of Modern Art." It is refreshing to find that he still ranks Mr. Whistler among the four living painters whose names will live for ever—Degas, Monet, and Watts are the others. The number also contains a story by the Mr. Sutcliffe whom Mr. Lucas praises, and a poem by Mr. Swinburne, who reminds us that Collingwood was a Northumbrian hero:—

> Our Collingwood, though Nelson be not ours,
> By him shall stand
> Immortal, till those waifs of old-world hours,
> Forgotten, leave uncrowned with bays and flowers,
> Northumberland.

* * * *

We heartily congratulate Mr. C. M. Neale on the first instalment of his labours on compiling an "Honours Register of the University of Cambridge," which is published at the price of ten shillings, by Mr. James Hitchcock, of Streatham. It is compiled with great care and accuracy. Like the well-known Oxford book, it will be of greatest value as a book of handy reference, and will, also like that work, afford to honourmen a continuous source of entertainment in the study of the achievements of their acquaintances. Mr. Neale has improved on the Oxford book in this respect by adding in many cases a note as to the after career of his honourmen.

* * * *

From Mr. Neale's interesting preface we learn that there have been two previous essays in the same direction, published in 1808 and 1836 respectively. The latter has an amusing preface on the vast superiority of Cambridge over Oxford. "The accusation," says the writer, "of Cambridge men having too much mathematical learning appears to me like the accusation of a savage to a civilized man, who says to him 'You have too great a quantity of clothing about you.'" Mr. Neale reminds us that even in 1761 mathematics were not neglected at Oxford, as shown by Sir George Trevelyan in his record of Charles James Fox's studies at that University. As a Cambridge man, he may perhaps be pardoned for further extracting from Sir George Trevelyan's book the following delightful note :—

> A letter from Dr. Newcombe to his one industrious pupil indicates that the curriculum at Hertford College was not exceptionally severe. It appears, that when Charles Fox was away at Paris or in London, the scientific studies of the other young Whigs remained in abeyance. "As to trigonometry," says the Doctor, "it is a matter of entire indifference to the other geometricians of the college whether they proceed to the other branches of mathematics immediately, or wait a term or two longer. You need not, therefore, interrupt your amusements by severe studies, for it is wholly unnecessary to take a step onwards without you, and therefore we shall stop until we have the pleasure of your company."

* * * *

We are afraid it is doubtful whether the appointment of Dr. Magnus Maclean to deliver a series of thirty lectures in the University of Glasgow on Celtic literature will pave the way for a Celtic Chair or even a permanent lectureship. It is possible, but certainly not probable. The experience of the committee of the Gaelic Society a few years ago in their attempt to establish such a Chair hardly justifies such a hope. But doubtless much will depend on Dr. Maclean himself. Celtic scholarship has suffered much from unintelligent enthusiasm, and a lecturer who has been trained in science may do much to establish it on a firm foundation.

* * * *

The proposal to establish a lectureship of Scottish History and Literature in the same University has, so far, received little support. The subject was again discussed at the annual meeting of the executive of the Burns Federation held in Kilmarnock the other day. The primary question is of ways and means, and it seems scarcely likely that the Burns Federation will here be of much service. To found a lectureship at least £5,000 is required. One gentleman was of opinion that every one of the federated Burns clubs would subscribe. But others thought differently—and said so. It is true that the Kilmarnock Club has offered £25, and the Bridgeton (Glasgow) Club £50 towards the proposed scheme ; but it is useless to expect many other clubs to do likewise. The fact is that so long as the scheme is in the hands, primarily, of the Burns Federation there is little likelihood of much progress being made with it. Rightly or wrongly, it is not taken seriously.

* * * *

As we announced more than twelve months since we are to have from Mr. Elliot Stock a facsimile reproduction of the Germ, the journal of the young Pre-Raphaelites. We are informed that Mr. W. M. Rossetti has written therefor an "extended history" of the little magazine and its production. An "extended history" sounds somewhat excessive. Without undervaluing, as Mr. W. E. Henley has recently done, the importance of the Pre-Raphaelite movement, it is certain that the literature of comment and reminiscence called forth by it is already at least adequate to its importance. And after all the Germ was not a very momentous event in the movement. Dante Rossetti wrote sensibly in after years of the absurdity of prolonging the fuss about the boyish pranks of the brotherhood. None the less there is an interest in these immature journals of coteries of youthful genius ; and many of us, for old sake's sake, will be glad to possess ourselves of Mr. Stock's facsimile.

* * * *

We reprint Mr. Alfred Austin's poem, "The Mercy of the Mighty," from The Times of Sept. 21th :—

I.

No, not that they were weak, and we are strong,
Nor to avenge imaginary slight
To England's virgin majesty and might,
And make her long-armed Sceptre yet more long.
From field and forge She mustered virile throng.
And sped her war-shares through the waters white,
But to uphold repudiated Right,
And bring to end insufferable wrong :
That, on remotest shore where her renown
Wakes sluggish souls to strenuous discontent,
On her fair Flag should be nor stain nor rent,
No man to no man kneel nor grovel down,
But, all men wearing Freedom's kingly crown,
Hope still might dawn for darkest Continent.

II.

So to the Lord of the embattled host,
Not unto us, praise and thanksgiving be,
Who made this Isle vicegerent of the Sea,
And spread its empery from coast to coast ;
Empire whose sole and not unworthy boast
Is to proclaim the fettered must be free,
And, firm as Fate enforcing that decree,
Is least avenging when victorious most.
Therefore let now raid and rebellion cease,
And Might's twin, Mercy, heal the wounds of war,
Solace the hurt, and cicatrize the scar ;
Let race with race commingle and increase,
And Concord's portal henceforth stand ajar,
Guarded by Justice, Liberty, and Peace !

ALFRED AUSTIN.

* * * *

Stories of the mistakes of school children are continually cropping up in the magazines ; but we welcome those contributed by Mr. E. M. Griffiths to Longmans'. The writer classifies the blunders, and some of the most amusing are those due to errors in spelling :—

"All alkalies have a soupy feeling."
"Maidstone is the centre of the pop trade."
"I came sore and conquered."
"Unwhacked along Clitumnus"
"Grazes the milk-white steer."
"The night rat came rolling up ragged and brown."
"His brain was teething with grand ideas in all directions."
"If the earth did not revolt, we should always have equal nights and days."
"Stored in some trouser-house of mighty kings."
"The lungs are organs of excoriation."

* * * *

Mr. D. C. Boulger has a complaint against Messrs. Gibbings which he has sent to The Times. They have produced a new edition of his "A Short History of China," written for W. H. Allen and Co., and published in 1893. Mr. Boulger sold his rights, and has no control over the persons who purchased the remainder stock and the moulds. He alleges that Messrs. Gibbings have added a chapter, bringing "the history down to August," by some writer who does not give his name, and that this anonymity is intended to give a purchaser the idea that the whole of the book is by the writer whose name alone appears on the title page.

Now, this book was recently in our hands; and though the name of Mr. Boulger appeared alone upon the title page, a publisher's note made it absolutely clear that the supplementary chapter—not a long one by any means—was by another hand. The moral of the story, so far as it has one, is that, if authors wish to control the management of their literary property, they should not part with their copyrights. A freeholder selling a mansion cannot complain, even if he is proud of his reputation as a teetotaler, if the purchaser turns it into an hotel. A purchaser of the author's rights in "A History of China" might, if he liked, have used it as an advertisement for a pill or a hair-restorer. That Messrs. Gibbings should have engaged some one else to bring the history up to date, when Mr. Boulger refused to do so, does not strike us as unreasonable. The one essential condition was that they should not represent as the work of Mr. Boulger what was really the work of some one else. Had they done that it would have been open to Mr. Boulger to seek damages for injury to his reputation. In spite of Mr. Boulger's letter, however, they do not appear to us to have done anything of the kind.

* * * *

Mr. John Wanamaker is a store-keeper in Philadelphia. He is also a millionaire, and his present object in life is to stamp out the small bookseller. Judging from his own statements, we fancy he will cause some difficulty to the American Publishers, Association, whose proceedings with regard to the department stores we recently spoke of. "More books," he proudly states, "are retailed over the counters at Wanamaker's than in any other house between the oceans. . . . Books are handled at Wanamaker's just as any other merchandise is handled—bought for the least that taking biggest lots and knowing how makes possible, sold as near bed-rock as may be." Mr. Wanamaker's literary style is not quite on a level with his literary ambitions. So interested is Wanamaker in the world of books that he publishes a monthly book-news. On one page the Lippincotts advertise a volume, post paid, for $1.50, but further on Wanamaker will send it for $1.10 plus postage, bringing it to $1.24.

* * * *

There was, not long ago, some discussion in the columns of Literature as to whether Browning's poetry was widely read. A Calcutta paper gives an anecdote which proves that, whether extensive or not, the poet's influence on his admirers is singularly potent. A young lady was engaged to a British officer. On finding out that he was not acquainted with Browning's writings she broke off the match. Six months later he presented himself and asked to be examined on the poet's works. She found that he had read all of "The Ring and the Book," knew the plot of "Paracelsus," and could recite the greater part of "Sordello." The last feat must surely have established his position as a fully-qualified "Browningite." Thus equipped he was again received into favour and the engagement renewed. To crown all, at the marriage six weeks later Browning himself gave away the bride.

* * * *

English editions multiply of the German text of the "Buch der Lieder," about which we write in another column. The late Dr. Buchheim and the "Golden Treasury" led the way some time ago; only the other day Messrs. Methuen issued a pretty little edition; and now we have it as a "Temple Classic." It is the very book for this series; never could form and matter be better matched. It is a pity that there is no equally unexceptionable example of Heine's equally fascinating prose to accompany it. But wicked as Heine was, it would be still more wicked to expurgate him. Perhaps Buch Le Grand, the Book of Ideas, might do, with an anthology of passages from the rest of the Reisebilder, or the Gods in Exile, or the Elementargeister.

* * * *

Dr. Hay Fleming is preparing a new edition of Patrick Walker's "Biographia Presbyteriana," which will be published in two volumes by Messrs. Constable. The book has a value of its own. It has the additional interest of being one of the acknowledged sources of Louis Stevenson's style. Stevenson himself proclaimed the parentage in a letter included in Mr. Colvin's edition of the Correspondence; and before the publication of this letter the filiation had been noted by Mr. Crockett in an inscription in a copy of the "Biographia Presbyteriana," which he gave to a well-known writer in the British Weekly. "A Man of Kent" quotes the inscription in the course of some remarks on the forthcoming new edition of Patrick Walker's work. It runs as follows: "I used it—i.e., the 'Biographia Presbyteriana'—largely for fact and style in 'The Raiders' and 'The Killing Time,' hence the critics said I imitated the style of another thief, R. L. S. The footprints are very plain throughout the volumes." Stevensonians need not be offended with Mr. Crockett for the word "thief." R. L. S. himself used it to describe the legitimate process of literary indebtedness of two such beloved masters as Thackeray and Dumas père.

* * * *

Björnstjerne Björnson is recovering from the illness which caused much anxiety to his friends, and as soon as he can travel he will go to Rome for the winter.

* * * *

Every student of English literature will hope that the announcement of a collected edition of Ruskin is correct, though the Ruskin Union meeting ignored the fact. Hitherto the mere bookman has been somewhat neglected by the publisher of Ruskin's work. To use the cant phrase of Carlyle, we have been invited to consider in him "the hero," and the hero as anything but a man of letters. Hence the heterogeneous aspect of his books. The man who could afford to buy "Modern Painters" or "The Stones of Venice," even in a reprint, would be highly indignant if asked to subscribe—in any sense—to the doctrines preached in "Unto this Last." On the other hand, the people who worshipped Ruskin as a teacher of ethics cared nothing about him as a teacher of art, and perhaps knew as little of Turner as any of the Early Victorian art critics against whom "an Oxford Graduate" first took up his parable. Thus the need for a complete uniform edition of Ruskin was neither felt nor satisfied, though of late there has been a tendency to bring his books into a single format and binding.

* * * *

Nowadays, however, the case is altered. Ruskin the art critic and Ruskin the social reformer have both suffered an eclipse, if not a sea-change. We have got beyond the rather elementary canons of "Modern Painters," and those who would still speak with Ruskin of Mr. Whistler throwing a pot of paint in the face of the public must admit that the pot of paint has effectually coloured their view of art. In the same way the world is much more tolerant towards a "new political economy," and the doctrine which shocked the public forty years ago, so that Thackeray had to bar the doors of his magazine against it, might now find access to Blackwood itself without causing the least thrill of excitement. Ruskin's influence in art criticism and social philosophy has given place to the newer lights which it kindled. What we value him for is not so much his matter as his manner. We are not sure that he is a good model for the young; but no library which does not contain his complete works can profess to represent Victorian prose with any decency.

* * * *

We hope to see a complete edition of Ruskin in which the wants of the literary student are primarily considered. To that end it must neither be too expensive nor too voluminous. Ruskin himself, with the somewhat Philistine taste in literary matters from which he never freed himself, held that a book could only be made beautiful by having large margins, big heavy type, thick paper, and the other devices by which booksellers profess to give "value for money." There is no trace, so far as we know, that he cared about artistic printing, or had any particular concern for the typography of his books, beyond employing the rather infantile device of red-lettering. Also, he despised the cry for cheap books. "No book, I believe," he said, "is ever worth half so much to its reader as one that has been coveted for a year at a bookstall, and bought out of saved half-pence, and perhaps a day or two's fasting." If Ruskin had ever had to buy books in this way himself, he might have been more tolerant of those who had not a "kind papa" to buy them all the books they wanted, in creamy vellum or crushed Levant. We hope that the designers of the new edition will abandon the tradition that a book must be unnecessarily bulky and dear in order to be worthy of an apostle of beauty.

* * * *

Mr. W. E. Henley announced the other day that "Boxiana" had led him to the conclusion that Pierce Egan was a man with some knowledge of slang, but a total incapacity for seeing anything. In that case it can only be said that Egan had a powerful imagination, for two of his works have become classics, though of that sort which are better known by hearsay than at first hand. "Life in London," of which a reprint is shortly to be issued, really owes its fame more to Thackeray than to its author. A "Roundabout Paper" is devoted to this friend of Thackeray's youth. He had to admit that the book was not so brilliant on reperusal as he had always believed it to be. We all know books of which we can say the same, and perhaps they are the wisest who strenuously refuse to read again in mature life the books of which they were fondest in their childhood, lest a similar disenchantment should blur some of their brightest memories. Nowadays "Life in London" is a scarce book, being most in demand among collectors of Cruikshank's pictures, and seldom falls into the hands of a boy. Older readers will admit that both pictures and text have lost the charm which Thackeray found in them. Jerry Hawthorn, Corinthian Tom, and Bob Logic, the Oxonian, are rather melancholy companions, and the book is chiefly notable for its antiquarian value. Has any one, by the way, ever answered Thackeray's question as to the whereabouts of the "Corinthian path" on which Tom and Jerry strutted before dinner and its "rich wines"?

* * * *

This passage is by no means the only reference which Thackeray makes to the book. Lord Kew, in "The Newcomes," brings the book to beguile the convalescence of his little cousin. In an article published in 1840, about the time of this episode, Thackeray tells us that he went to the British Museum and five circulating libraries in quest of Egan's book, without being able to find it at any one of them. The British Museum has provided itself since then, we imagine. But the student of English society must not trust too implicitly to Egan's picture of Georgian life. "When the future student of our manners," said Thackeray, "comes to look over the pictures and the writing of these queer volumes, what will he think of our society, customs, and language in the consulship of Plancus?" But do we even now believe everything that is in fiction to be true to life? The verdict which Mr. Henley passed on "Boxiana" must be extended to "Life in London," which is rather a wild phantasmagoria than a real attempt to represent the manners and customs of our great-grandfathers. Nevertheless, all London, knowing this as well as possible, once read it with delight. It will be curious to see if we can do the same.

Election Addresses.

The electioneering addresses which have filled the columns of the newspapers during the last few days provide some food for thought from the literary point of view. They all conform to a type—a type crushing to individuality, to the sparkle of wit, to higher graces of style—but a type which truly mirrors on the one hand the average literary capacity of the Anglo-Saxon politician, and on the other the average literary taste and political temper of the Anglo-Saxon voter. How much more entertaining it would be if our Parliamentary candidates felt themselves able to indulge in the vivacious and epigrammatic personalities of our Republican neighbours! What scope for the finer nuances of rhetoric would be supplied if they could only supply a public craving for sensation with such racy comparisons as that quoted by Mr. Bodley from an actual French electoral address:—

> One of us is an honest man; but which? X leads a luxurious life among princes of finance, though he is absolutely without resources, though his newspaper brings him in nothing, and his relations have to support him; while I live modestly in the provinces where I have won an exceptional position at the Bar. X confesses he has not paid his debts, while I have paid the debts of others. His furniture is still unpaid for, yet he has shooting and horses. I deprive myself of these luxuries, but I owe nothing to my tradesmen.

This certainly sails rather near the wind of libel; if indeed it is not exposed to the full force of the gale. It is due no doubt chiefly to the absence of any sound system of party government. But personal recrimination offers an attractive field for the verbal fireworks dear to the French politician; and the opportunity offered by an election address it is hard for him to resist. The argumentum ad hominem is not entirely unknown in English politics; but it is less offensively used than it was. It is conspicuously and refreshingly absent from the most important of the manifestoes now put before the electors. Yet the public to whom they are addressed is said to be a public interested only in trivialities; with an insatiable craving for personalia; and devoid of the power of attending to any serious subject unless it is served up in the form of a brief and tasty titbit. That is certainly not the view our politicians take of their public. Their addresses, instead of being terse appeals confined to generalities, are often exhaustive pamphlets dealing with every aspect of the situation. This certainly gives as little cause for regret as does their refusal to indulge in the personal amenities of the French. Here there is a rigid line drawn between public and private life, and to overstep it is to offend public taste. Politics is a game for the politician, and his natural instinct is to play the game fairly. But it is an equally natural instinct to take this game, as Englishmen take all games, seriously. "They talked seriously only about horses," says a young American lady, in a recent novel, after her first experience of English society. "Ah!" is the reply, "you hadn't fallen in with the yachting crowd." Hence the candidate of to-day attacks both the questions of the day and his opponents with the utmost gravity and earnestness. No tricks of style, no allusive conceits, no lapses into unexpected humour are expected to mar the effect of his weighty, solid, and business-like utterances. The election addresses reflect on the whole the Parliamentary oratory of the day. The English House of Commons is in a greater degree than any similar assembly lacking in patience with speakers who do not speak to the point; and in the present day there is undoubtedly some decadence both in fine oratory and in wit. The result is a certain uniform level in political utterances. An able man who is long versed in public affairs acquires, be his culture what it may, a workmanlike style, lucid, fluent, and matter of fact. This becomes the recognized language of statesmanship, and in the face of the English dislike of idiosyncrasy or eccentricity, it is conformed to, save in exceptional instances, by those who possess far superior literary gifts. There are traces of individuality in one or two of the addresses now before us. In the polished and elaborate diction of the short address issued by Mr. Balfour, we catch some savour of the author of "Foundations of Belief." Lord Salisbury and Sir William Harcourt never fail to remind us that they were once journalists of the highest order; Lord Rosebery's mastery of phrase shows itself alike in his political letters and his books; Mr. John Morley's addresses are, as a rule, masterly examples of literary skill. Mr. Birrell cannot disguise the fact that he is Mr. Birrell, and his manifesto may be taken as one revolt against the stilted periods into which these productions so often lapse. But on the whole there is a singular absence of "expression" in the artistic sense. We do not in England look for, or obtain, a feast of literary entertainment. But even the literary connoisseur may perhaps feel that this price is not a high one to pay for a spirit of courtesy and a recognition of the seriousness and gravity of the issues discussed.

THE WILLOW.

The love-lorn willow grieves and grieves,
And through its fragile anguish flows
The ancient weeping sound of those
That love bereaves, that death bereaves.

Amid the still of windless eves
It bends to earth with weight of woes—
Of who achieves, and who for-goes,—
Of who deceives, and undeceives.

O drooping soul that grieves and grieves!
Until a wind of heaven blows,
And lifts the outer dusk, and shows
The under-moonlight of the leaves!

Personal Views.

ON THE MATTERHORN.

Owing to my having read very little Alpine literature, I have seen but few attempts to analyse the mental experiences of the novice who, for the first time, ascends any of the higher peaks. And having read nothing upon the subject I was naturally curious, while I was at Zermatt this last summer, as to what these experiences were. I may own frankly that the desire to find out had a great deal to do with my trying mountaineering. A writer, and especially a writer of fiction, has, I think, one plain duty always before him. He ought to know and cannot refuse to learn, even at the cost of toil and trouble, all the ways of the human mind. And experience at second-hand can never be relied on. The average man is afraid of saying he was afraid. And the average climber is one who has long passed the interesting stage when he first faced the unknown. I was obviously a novice, and a green one, when I tried the Matterhorn. That I was such a novice is the only thing which makes me think my experience at all interesting from the psychological point of view. And to my mind that point of view is also the literary one.

On looking back, I certainly believe I was very much afraid of the mountains in general, and of the Matterhorn in particular. It is difficult, however, to say where fear begins and mere natural nervousness leaves off. Fear, after all, is often the note of warning sounded by a man's organism in the face of the unknown. It is hardly strange it should be felt upon the mountains. But if I was afraid of the mountains (and I thought that I was), I was certainly curious. During my first week at Zermatt I had done a good second-class peak, but had been told that the difference between the first and second class was prodigious. This naturally excited curiosity. And I began to feel that my curiosity could only be satisfied by climbing the Matterhorn. For one thing that mountain has a great name; for another it looks inaccessible. And it had only been done once this year. If I did it I should be the first Englishman on the summit for the season. And the guides were doubtful whether it would "go."

But after all, was it not said by folks who climbed to the Schwartzsee that the mountain was really easy? Were not the slabs above the Shoulder roped? Did not processions go up it in the middle of the season? And yet it was now only the first of July and there was a good deal of new snow on the mountain. And why were the guides just a little doubtful? Perhaps they were doubtful of me; and yet Joseph Pollinger had taken me up three smaller peaks. I decided that I had hired him to do the thinking. But I could not make him do it all.

The day I had spent upon the Wellenkuppe had been a time of imagination, and I had seen the beauty of things. But from the Matterhorn I can eliminate the element of beauty. I saw very little beauty in it or from it. I had other things to do than to think of the sublime. But I could think of the ridiculous, and at one o'clock in the morning when we started from the hut with a lantern I said the whole proceeding was folly. I was a fool to be there. And down below me, far below me, glimmered the crevassed slopes of the Furgg Glacier. I grew callous and absorbed, and I shrugged my shoulders as the dawn came up. I did not care to turn my eyes to look upon the red rose glory of the lighted Dom and Tischhorn. Let them glow!

At the upper ice-filled hut we rested. The vastness of the mountain began to affect me. I saw by now that the Wellenkuppe was a little thing. The three thousand extra feet made all the difference. This was obviously beyond me, and I could never get to the summit. It was ridiculous of the Pollingers to think I could. I told them so quite crossly as we went on. Probably they had made a mistake; they would no doubt find it out on the Shoulder. It seemed rather hard that I should have to get there when it was so easy to turn back at once. But I said nothing more and climbed. My heart did its work well, and my head did not ache. This was a surprise to me as I had looked for some sort of malaise above twelve thousand feet. As it did not come I stared at the big world about me. I viewed it all with a kind of angry and alarmed surprise. Where was I being taken to? I began to see they were taking me out of the realm of the usual. I was rapidly ascending into the unknown, and I did not like it in the least. If we fell from the arête we might not stop going for four thousand feet. Down below, a thin blue line was a berghschrund that was capable of swallowing an army corps. That patch of bluish patina was a tumbled mass of séracs. The sloping glacier looked flat.

Then the guides said we were going slowly. I knew they meant that for me, of course, and I felt very angry with them. They consoled me by saying that we should soon be at the Shoulder, and that it would not take long to reach the summit. I did not believe them and I said I should never do it. But when we got to the Shoulder I was glad. I knew many turned back at that point. We sat down to rest. The guides talked their own German, not one word of which I could understand, so turned from them and looked at the vast upper wedge of the Matterhorn. It glowed red in the morning sun; it was red hot, vast, ponderous, and yet the lower mountain held it up as lightly as an ashen shaft holds up a bronze spear-head. It was so wonderfully shaped that it did not look big. But it did look diabolic. There was some infernal wizardry of cloud-making going on about that spear-head. The wind blew to us across the Zmutt valley. Nevertheless, the wind above the Roof, as they call it, was blowing in every direction, and the live wisps of newborn cloud went in and out like the shuttles of a loom. I came to the conclusion that this was a particularly devilish, uncanny sort of show, and stared at it open-eyed. But I was comforted by the thought that the Pollingers were rapidly coming to the belief that this was not the sort of day to go any higher. I was quite angry when they declared we could do it easily. For I knew better, or my disturbed mind thought I did. This was the absolutely unknown to me, and their experience was nothing to my alarmed instincts. I was sure that my ancestors had lived on plains. Now I was dragging them into dangers that they knew nothing of. Nevertheless, I told the guides to go on. I spoke with a kind of eager interest and desperation. For indeed it was most appallingly interesting. We came to the slabs where the ropes made the Matterhorn so easy, as I had been told. I wished that some of those who believed this were with me.

But with the fixed ropes to lay hold of I climbed fast. I relinquished such holds upon solidity with reluctance. That yonder was the top, said my men, but for fully half a minute I declined to go any further. For it was quite obvious to me that I should never get down again. But again I shrugged my shoulders and went on. I might just as well do the whole thing. And sensation followed sensation. My mind was like a slow plate taking one photograph on top of the other. It was like wax, something now stamped out the last minute's impression. I heard my guides telling me that we must get to the summit because the people in Zermatt would be looking through telescopes. I did not care how many people looked through telescopes. So far as I was concerned the moon-men might be doing the same. I was one of three balancing fools on a rope.

And then we came to the heavy snow on the little five-fold curving arête that is the summit. Within a stone's throw of the top, I declared again that I was quite high enough to satisfy me, but with a little more persuasion I went across the last three-foot ridge of snow, reached the top and sat down.

The folks at Zermatt were staring, no doubt, but I had nothing to do with them. Let them look if they wished to. For it was impossible to get to the top, and I was there. It was far more impossible to get down, and we were going to try. That was interesting. I had never been so interested before. For though I hoped we should succeed I did not think it likely. So I took in what I could, while I could, and stared at the visible anatomy of the Mischabel and the patina stained floor of the white world with intense, yet aloof, interest. After a mere five minutes' rest we started on our ridiculous errand. But though I was as sure in my mind that we should not get down as I had been that we should not get up, there was an instant reversal of feeling. My instincts had been trying to prevent my ascending; they were eagerly bent on descending. I did not mind going down each difficult place, for I was going back into the known. Every step took me nearer the usual. I was going home to humanity. These mountains were cold company; they were indifferent. I was close up against cold original causes, which did not come to me mitigated and warmed by human contact or the breath of a city. I had had enough of them.

There are gaps in my memory; strange lacunæ. I remember the Roof, the slabs, the big snow patch above the Shoulder. Much that comes between I know nothing of. But the snow-patch is burnt into my mind, for though it was but a hundred mètres across it took us half-an-hour's slow care to get down it. Without the stakes set in it and the reserve rope it would have been almost impossible. It only gradually dawned on me that this care was needed to prevent the whole snow-field from coming away with us. I breathed again on rock. But the little couloirs that we had crossed coming up were now dangerous. I threw a handful of snow into several, and the snow that lay there quietly whispered, moved, rustled, hissed like snakes, and went away. But I could hardly realize that there was danger here or there. There was, of course, danger to come, yonder, round the corner of some rock. But the guides were very careful and a little anxious. It dawned on me, as I watched them with a set mind, that this was rather a bad day for the Matterhorn.

The distances now seemed appalling. After hours of work I looked round and saw the wedge stand up just over me. It made me irritable. When, in the name of Heaven, were we coming to the upper hut? When we did at last get there I began to feel that by happy chance we might really reach Zermatt again after all.

Once more I had vowed a thousand times that I would never climb again. But I know I shall, though I hardly know why. It is not that the fatigue is so good for the body that can endure it. Nor is it the mere sight of the wonders of nature. The very thing that is terrifying is the attraction, for the unknown calls us always.

But if there is a great pleasure, and a terrible pleasure, in coming into (and out of) the unknown, it is intensified by the fact that one is learning what is in one's self. It is a curious fact that writers seem to have done a great deal of climbing. Many of the first explorers among the higher Alps may not unjustly be classed among men of letters, and some of them, no doubt, went on a double errand. They learnt something of the unknown in two ways.

MORLEY ROBERTS.

Foreign Letter.

POLAND.—I.

Since the translation and dramatization of Sienkiewicz's "Quo Vadis" the interest in Polish contemporary literature, which has for some time manifested itself on the Continent and in America, is spreading in England. It is true that none of the Polish writers or poets of the present day will ever attain the European reputation enjoyed by Mickiewicz, Kraminski, and Slowackie. A change has come over the Polish spirit, which inevitably finds its expression in the works of the intellectual representatives of the nation. In the early part of the century the loss of political liberty was the starting point of a new era in literature—intensely nationalist in expression and tendency, new in form, and rich in variety. The ardent aspirations of the people, its hopes, its most intimate sufferings burst forth in the highest strains of lyric poetry; but since the wounds, which at that time seemed incurable, have been gradually healing, since the political destiny of Poland seems irretrievably settled, its literature has taken a wider range, and it is especially in fiction, criticism, and history that the Polish writers of the present day excel.

The most distinguished representative of this literary movement is unquestionably Henry Sienkiewicz, whose works have been translated and popularized in America by Mr. Curtin. His "Quo Vadis," although the best known of his works in England, is not the most important. "With Fire and Sword," "The Deluge," and "Pan Michael," an historical romance of the seventeenth century, which, in a kind of trilogy, recounts the heroic struggles of Poland against Russia and Sweden, had made him famous in Slavonic countries long before he had been heard of amongst us. The first of these three romances, which appeared as "feuilleton" in the Slowo, of which Sienkiewicz was at one time editor, passed through thirty editions in a comparatively short time. His talent lies in the vivid representation of the past. He is a word painter in the highest sense, and his vivid pictures contain much beauty, sometimes pathetic and sometimes tragic. "Without Dogma" is a novel of modern Poland, a kind of satire against scepticism and cosmopolitism. In his own country his "Children of the Soil" is regarded as his masterpiece.

Among the other Polish novelists, the merit of whose writings has been recognized on the Continent, but who are as yet little known in England, Elisa Orzesko and Gabrielle Zapolska, Zygmunt Milkowski and Aleksander Glowacki, deserve more than a passing notice.

Since the death of Turgenev, no other writer of Slavonic origin has enjoyed such general popularity as Madame Eliza Orzesko. None has described the present life and condition of the nation with greater truth, probity, and completeness. Her literary productions are the reflex of life in all its aspects—the various phases of society, the currents of modern thought, the many problems which demand solution. Her "Meir Ezofowicz" is, perhaps, the most impartial study of the Jewish character which has ever been written. One of her most important literary achievements is a novel in three volumes "On the Banks of the Niemen." It is a page of contemporaneous history, an exposition of a once heroic people in its struggle against the forces at work for the destruction of its patriotic instincts. She excels particularly in that kind of fiction called in Polish powieśc (popular tales). One of the most artistically worked-out of these tales is an idyl, the title of which would be best translated by "The Broken Chord." A translation of her powerful novel "Meir Ezofowicz" appeared in America in 1898, and another version of it last year in England. Mr. Curtin has just translated her latest novel "Argonauci," which, no doubt, will help to make Madame Orzesko also better known here.

The talent of Gabrielle Zapolska is entirely different from that of Madame Orzesko. Full of passion, her enthusiastic optimism and her revolt against the iniquities she sees around her often lead her into the exaggeration and brutal descriptions of the naturalistic school. Her books, therefore, do not appeal to readers who dislike revelations from the dark side of life. Yet her conceptions are always original and interesting, and her "Malaska" and "Kaska" have gained for her a well-merited reputation.

Zygmunt Milkowski, better known under the pseudonym of Jez, began his literary career in the brilliant epoch of Kraszewski and Rzewuski, and he has continued their high æsthetic aspirations. He is best known as the author of "The Uskoks," a work which has already gained a place among the classics. His name is a household word in Poland. Although he has written several domestic novels, his forte lies in historical romance, the kind of fiction always in great favour with the Slavonic public. Among the productions of this class we mention "The Knights of Olbracht," "The Bride of Haram Pacha," "The Sacrifice," "Two Hundred Years Ago," &c. These works show an intimate acquaintance with the history and manners of the period which he depicts.

A no less prominent place in the estimation of his countrymen is occupied by Aleksander Głowacki, who, following the fashion of the Polish writers of to-day, hides his identity under the nom de plume of Boleslas Prus. In his novels, which all deal with present conditions, he shows himself a thinker of no mean order. His "Placowka," a study of the mental life of the people, is considered his masterpiece, but "Lalka" also contains much striking delineation of character.

Fiction being in Poland, as everywhere else at present, the favourite literature of the great reading public, many other novelists of real merit devote their talents to this class of writing, for which a place is reserved in nearly all the dailies and reviews. Considering the poverty and the peculiar situation of the country, the periodical Press is exceedingly up-to-date and well informed. Warsaw is still the intellectual capital, the literary and artistic centre of a divided nation. Everything of interest published in any part of Europe is at once translated, analysed, and commented upon. Some of the serious reviews, such as the Athenæum, hold the same rank in Poland as La Revue des Deux Mondes in France. One of the best among the weekly publications is the Review of the Week, which was established about thirty years ago by Mr. Wislicki, and which has greatly contributed to the evolution of æsthetic and social ideas in Poland. Literary criticism is conducted in most of the periodicals by men of great erudition and acumen, such as Spasowicz, who has written an excellent "History of Polish Literature"; Chmielowski, the eminent biographer of Mieckiewicz; Waliszewski, so well known by his fine literary studies; Kaszewski, who has given the best translation in Polish of the principal Greek dramas, and many others.

The political and economic vicissitudes through which Poland has passed make it a rich field for the historian and biographer. Much use is made of the new methods of historical research, which have reconstructed the tragic and glorious characters and events of the past of Poland. We need only call to mind the names of Szujski, Bobrzynski, Kalinka, and the celebrated authoress who, under the pseudonym of Lucas Pierre Leliwa, has published a series of historical monographs, the finest of which is the "History of King John Sobieski."

THE SUBJECT CATALOGUE OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The printed catalogue of books in the library of the British Museum is nearing completion. The word should be taken in a relative sense, since the annual accessions of printed matter amount to over 100,000 books and 250,000 newspapers. Still, the catalogue, commenced in 1880, with additional lists giving recent acquisitions, will be finished before the end of the year. The gigantic nature of the undertaking will at once become clear to the general reader when he considers that the catalogue itself consists of over 800 volumes. The MS. catalogue numbered between 2,000 and 3,000 volumes (in which additions, printed on slips of paper, were pasted in), so that a considerable saving has been effected.

The work, which has taken twenty years and cost about £40,000, has been done entirely by the staff of the British Museum, which includes experts in every possible language (including Welsh) and subject under the sun. It is accessible to the public at large as well as to the frequenters of the reading-room. It is published in 386 parts and 100 supplements, the price of the whole being £91. Those who are unable or unwilling to secure the whole of the work, but are interested in certain subjects, will have an opportunity of gratifying their taste by the purchase of a monograph on their favourite topic. To give two instances. The British Museum is especially rich in contemporary pamphlets on the French Revolution. Its collection numbers 19,000, and it may be mentioned, by the way, as an exhibition of literary amenity, that the authorities of the British Museum have presented the "Bibliothèque Nationale" with 30,000 duplicates in their possession. A separate catalogue of the pamphlets is in existence, but a volume containing a separate bibliography of the literature of the French Revolutionary period will eventually be prepared and see the light. Another interesting monograph is in contemplation—viz., of old printed books, arranged, not under the authors' names, which are of comparatively little importance, but of those of the famous printers by whom they were produced. The publication of these and other monographs will, it need not be said, prove of extreme convenience and value.

The present catalogue in the Museum, whatever its demerits, is a unique achievement. They may manage many things across the Channel better than we do, but they certainly do not know how to arrange a library. The unfortunate visitor to the "Bibliothèque Nationale" in Paris is presented with a ticket on which he writes down the name of any book he is anxious to consult; and it is ten to one that he will not get it. In Vienna and Berlin, since 1870, there are excellent libraries, but their catalogues are very imperfect. The best library on the Continent is probably that of Munich, which contains about 1,000,000 volumes. But its rooms are deserted, and one feels almost inclined to apologize to the librarian for intruding upon his learned leisure. The Author-Catalogue of the British Museum, on the other hand—its earliest form dates from 1787—is full and complete. Its arrangement, carried out, on the whole, in accordance with the ninety-one rules laid down in 1839, is simple and easily understood. Given the author's name you will find under the heading a list of his principal works, whilst an appendix in the case of personages of special eminence, or cross references, will generally give you some information with regard to books written on the subject of your inquiry.

The difficulty arises when you are ignorant of the author's name or desire to gain knowledge of a subject with which you are unfamiliar. How are you to get enlightened? Where are you to look for the sources of information? The Author-Catalogue gives you help to a certain extent. There are the biographical cross references to which we have referred above. In some other cases the entries are arranged under their subjects. Thus, looking up the heading "Bible," you will find a list of the several books of the Old and New Testaments with commentaries thereon. Under "London" are given the various institutions and societies connected with the metropolis. But, except in special cases, the Author-Catalogue confines itself to the names of authors and makes no reference to subjects or things. A most valuable supplement to the catalogue is the subject index of modern works ranging from 1880 to 1895 compiled by Mr. Fortescue, the present Keeper of printed books. A further instalment, carrying on the list until the beginning of 1900, is now in hand. Mr. Fortescue's work, the burden of which fell entirely on his own shoulders, combines in its arrangement the grouping according to classes and subject indexes. It is an admirable production so far as it goes, but it is necessarily very incomplete. To mention only one desideratum—a list of novels and plays would be found extremely useful.

Now that the "Author-Catalogue" is practically completed, it is quite possible that the industry to which we owe the "Fortescue Catalogue" will be employed in elaborating a scheme for a "Subject Catalogue" on a large scale. The staff is available, and, under the direction of its highly competent chief is ready, nay, anxious, to embark on the undertaking. The new catalogue, complementary to the old one, would probably be on the lines of the present Fortescue Catalogue. It will comprise both classed catalogues and subject indexes. The system of classification presents considerable difficulties, apart from the ludicrous mistakes made by cataloguers, such as putting Edgworth's "Essay on Irish Bulls" under the heading of Zoology, or "The Mill on the Floss" under Machinery. It presupposes that the student has a certain amount of knowledge which he probably has not got, and a hard-and-fast line between classes which in many instances science refuses to draw. On the other hand, indexing tends to an enormous, and sometimes needless, multiplication of the number of entries. The use of both systems seems, therefore, desirable. The Subject-Catalogue, according to calculations made, would most likely take about half the size of the Author-Catalogue. The idea would be to bring it out gradually in sections, such as Art, separate headings for different countries, &c., and not to wait till the completion of the work, which, as a matter of course, would take several years. (The number "ten," with other details which have been given in the Press, is quite imaginary.) The proposal has until now not been brought before the Trustees in their official capacity, but there is little doubt that they will give their sanction, when asked for it. Meanwhile, let us hope that the idea, which as yet is only a dream, may before long become a delightful reality.

CHESTERFIELD'S LETTERS.

There is, of course, nothing new to be said of "Chesterfield's Letters to his Son," but there is a little fresh information respecting that son, and there is a parallel to be drawn between the letters and a second series, which, published in 1891, scarcely attracted due attention. For Chesterfield made two great educational experiments. In 1732 he became the father, by a French governess in Holland, Mademoiselle du Bocquet, of a child, who was allowed the paternal name of Philip Stanhope, while in 1755 he became the godfather of another Philip, son of a cousin, Charles Arthur Stanhope, a Nottinghamshire squire of slender means; and, perhaps already perceiving that his first experiment was a failure, he virtually adopted this second Philip, who, on the extinction of the main line, succeeded to the earldom and estates. Convinced that "education more than nature is the cause of the great difference which we see in the characters of men," Chesterfield took infinite pains with both his wards. If in thirty years he addressed 122 letters to the first, he wrote in nine years 236 to the second, besides nearly a hundred letters to the boy's father. Curiously enough, although for nine years the two correspondences were contemporaneous, there is not a hint to either Philip of the existence of a homonym, yet the epistolary lessons in mythology, history, geography, and literature are on precisely the same plan, and the social instruction shows uniformity not only of ideas but frequently of words. Chesterfield had set his mind on producing accomplished courtiers and statesmen, distinguished in Parliament and shining in Courts. Yet in both respects the two Stanhopes proved egregious failures. Horace Walpole says of the elder, "Two quartos of licking could not mould him, for cub he remained to his death." And Fanny Burney says of the younger in 1790, "He had as little good breeding as any man I ever met." The elder sat in Parliament from 1751 to 1765, but his maiden speech was a failure, and though his father consoled and encouraged him, he made no second attempt. Chesterfield obtained for him minor diplomatic posts in Germany, and his capacity was evidently unequal to anything higher. The second Philip held some subordinate positions in the Government, and he steered clear of fashionable vices; but he became exactly what Chesterfield had deprecated, "an English bumpkin country gentleman, the most unlicked creature in the world, unless sometimes [licked] by his own hounds." Farming and hunting were his delight. These failures of the influence of environment, Taine's milieu, may have been due to atavism. The elder Philip on attaining manhood, and the younger on inheriting fortune and title at eighteen, seem to have given vent to their innate boorishness and indolence.

Chesterfield did not live to see the frustration of his hopes of his second experiment, and there is reason to think that he was ignorant of the full extent of such frustration in the first. He had the mortification, indeed, when his son died of dropsy at Avignon in 1768, of discovering that he had for at least three years been secretly married to a young woman without fortune. But this duplicity was not all. Notarial documents recently examined by M. Gustave Bayle, of the Calvet Museum at Avignon, leave little doubt that he had secretly embraced Catholicism. The facts are these. The widow, on returning to England with her two little boys, evidently brought with her two certificates of her husband's burial at Vaucluse. In these a Cyrus Carteret, "originaire anglais," figures as having "par attachement pour lui et la satisfaction de Madame sa veuve" attended the funeral. Now this Cyrus Carteret was in April, 1769, executor of James Murray, Earl of Dumbarton, and is described in the will as Honorary Canon of Lille. The inference is that Stanhope had died and was buried as a Catholic, and that the omission of Carteret's status was a device of the widow in order to conceal the truth from Chesterfield, who shared the cold, formal Anglicanism of his time, and certainly regarded that religion as an essential quality of an English gentleman. He was not, indeed, intolerant—albeit he had told Philip at nine years of age "the Pope is an old cheat who calls himself the Vicar of Jesus Christ"—but it would have been a mortification to him to learn that his son had not only deceived him but had cut himself off from political preferment.

Chesterfield has scarcely had justice either from contemporaries or from posterity. He made, indeed, a mercenary marriage with George I.'s natural daughter, yet the lady seems to have been satisfied with her lot. He had the lax morality of his age and class; but because a daughter-in-law, disappointed with his will, sold for £1,500 letters never designed for publication, he has been treated as a deliberate corruptor of youth. Yet young men require no book to be incited to profligacy, and even if the Letters ever had any demoralizing effect they have long ceased to be anything more than a sociological document. Dr. Johnson has pilloried him in an unquotable epigram; Horace

Walpole has described the Letters as "the whole duty of man adapted to the meanest capacity"; even his kinsman-editor, the late Earl Stanhope, speaks of them as "repugnant to good morals"; and Mr. Lecky talks of his "low moral principle, his hard, keen, and worldly nature." Sainte-Beuve, however, bound to be more lenient to so warm an admirer of the French, styles Chesterfield the French Rochefoucauld, and finds in every page some felicitous remark. And it is but fair to remember that he was a scholar, a patron of distressed authors, a statesman, an orator, a wit, an acute observer, and a reformer of the calendar, of which last capacity we should be reminded by the impending omission of leap year. He predicted not only the French Revolution, but the fall of the Pope's temporal power, and no other noble of his time would have justified the execution of Charles I., or spoken of Cromwell as "a very brave and a very able man, who carried the honour of England to the highest pitch of glory." It is impossible to withhold respect from a man who, in a letter designed for his godson's perusal after his death, could say:—

> These exhortations are not the severe and discouraging dictates of an old parent, but the friendly and practicable advice of a sincere friend, who remembers that he has been young himself, and knows the indulgence that is due to youth and inexperience. Yes; I have been young, and a great deal too young. Idle dissipation and innumerable indiscretions, which I am now heartily ashamed and repent of, characterized my youth: but, if my advice can make you wiser and better than I was at your age, I hope it may be some little atonement. God bless you!

HEINE, THE SONG WRITER.

Heine's personality has to some extent overshadowed his work. Hence it happens that in the mass of literature that has grown up around him, there is comparatively little real criticism. With a few notable exceptions that will occur to every one, the printed matter about Heine shows what we may call an extraordinary and unpardonable partiality. Even so great a writer as Treitschke, the historian, was guilty of it, and he used to excuse his hatred of Heine and all his works with the phrase, "I can't be impartial when I speak of Jews and Englishmen."

Thus it will be well to lay aside for once our notions, preconceived or otherwise, of Heine, the man, and consider Heine, the poet. We are told every day that Englishmen do not read German, and yet an English firm (Messrs. Dent) has deemed it worth while to bring out Heine's "Buch der Lieder" in the original. The volume is prettily got up and of convenient size. We need not now discuss the wisdom or unwisdom of introductions, but we do venture to observe that if ever an introduction by a competent hand would have been in its right place, it would have been so here, taking into account the average Englishman's supposed or real ignorance of the masterpieces of German poetry.

Heine's songs belong to his lyrical and best period, which closes with the publication of the "Reisebilder" in 1826. The earliest songs are those included in the group entitled "Youthful Sorrows" (Junge Leiden) (1817-1821). Heine's critics have not perhaps sufficiently recognized how at the very start of his literary career—Heine was between eighteen and twenty-three years of age—he struck the note that was always to characterize his work: the mingling of grief and scorn, of pathos and cynicism. The whips and scorns of time had little to do with his outlook on life; such a mood was more or less inborn, intensified undoubtedly by the influences peculiar to his youth. In these songs the poet expresses his love and hate, his joy and pain. True, former poets had done the same, but none of them with so novel a conjunction of deep sadness and bitter irony. The verses to a singer (Caroline Stern of the Düsseldorf Opera) serve to illustrate his peculiar genius. They are song, music, legend, dream, the dream life of romance, with the touch of irony in the conclusion that wakes us to the gross realities of life. The poet listens to an old ballad perfectly rendered by a beautiful woman; he is wafted away to dreamland and lives in the dim past with brave Sir Roland until—> he sank, foredone, forlorn—

> And straight with him my vision dies.
> . . . . .
> The legend now is all told out,
> The people clap their hands and shout
> Bravo! bravo! all round about;
> The singer curtseys to the ground.

Here is an admirable example of that study in contrasts which forms the basis of most of Heine's work.

The roughest classification of Burns' songs would demonstrate their range over the whole gamut of human emotion. If we attempted to do the same with the songs of Heine, we should find, possibly, that his range was narrower, but that the defect is balanced by a more intense emotion, a more personal scorn. And in dealing with Heine's songs we should remember to take note of a prose work of his that is closely related to them. In the volume of the "Reisebilder" occurs a section, seldom read, entitled "Ideen: Das Buch Le Grand (1826)"; it was written at the same period as the songs, and forms a sort of prose accompaniment to many of them. The description of Napoleon in the eighth chapter of Buch Le Grand may be taken as a running commentary on "Die Grenadiere" of the "Junge Leiden." Here is a passage:—

> It was in the avenue of the Court garden at Düsseldorf. The Emperor rode straight down the avenue with his cortège. The trembling trees bowed towards him as he advanced, the rays of the sun peered through the green leaves with an awed curiosity, and in the blue sky above a golden star was visible. The Emperor wore his uniform of invisible green, and the small world-famous hat. He rode a white palfrey, which stepped with such calm pride, so confidently, so nobly—that had I then been Crown Prince of Prussia I should have envied that horse. The Emperor sat carelessly, almost lazily, holding his rein with one hand, and good-naturedly patting the neck of the horse with the other. It was a hand like bright marble, a mighty hand—one of the pair which bound fast the many-headed monster of anarchy, and reduced the war of races to order—and it good-naturedly patted the neck of the horse. Even the face had that hue which we find in Grecian and Roman marbles, the features were as nobly proportioned as in the antiques, and on that countenance was plainly written, "Thou shalt have no gods but me!" A smile which warmed and tranquillized every heart, flitted over the lips—and yet all knew that those lips needed but to whistle, et la Prusse n'existait plus—those lips needed but to whistle, and the entire clergy would have stopped their ringing and singing—those lips needed but to whistle, and the entire Holy Roman Empire would have danced. It was an eye clear as the sky; it could read the hearts of men; it saw at a glance all things at once and as they were in this world, while we ordinary mortals see them only one by one and by their dim shadows. The brow was not so clear, the phantoms of future battles were nestling there, and a quiver swept over the brow, and those were the creative thoughts, the great seven-leagued-boots thoughts wherewith the spirit of the Emperor strode invisibly through the world.

Or read the Veronica episode (chapters xvi. and xvii.), a mere sketch, it is true, but instinct with poetical feeling, in conjunction with the love-songs of the "Lyrical Interlude." Here are one or two passages:—

> I sat down once again at the feet of my beautiful friend; near me lay her brown hound, and we both looked up into her lovely eyes.
> Ah, Lord! in those eyes lay all the splendour of earth, and an entire heaven besides. I could have died with rapture as I gazed into them, and had I died at that instant my soul would have flown directly into those eyes. Oh, they are indescribable! . . . She sat near an old iron-grey soldier, a knightly-looking man with cross-barred scars on his terrible brow. They spoke of the Seven Mountains painted red by the setting sun, and of the blue Rhine which flowed beneath in sublime tranquillity. But what cared we for the Seven Mountains and the blue Rhine, and the boats with their snow-white sails which floated thereon, the music which rang forth from one of the boats or the jackass of a student who, seated in it, sang so beautifully? I and the brown hound gazed into the eyes of the beautiful lady, and looked at the face which came forth rosy pale from amid its black braids and locks, like the moon from dark clouds. The features were of the noblest Grecian type, the lips boldly arched, over which played melancholy, rapture, and child-like caprice, and when she spoke, the words were breathed forth almost sighingly, and then, again, shot out impatiently and rapidly; and when she spoke, and her speech fell softly as snow, yet like a warm genial shower of blossoms from her lovely mouth—oh! then the crimson of evening fell gently over my soul, and the memories of childhood flitted through it with ringing melody.

Burns, Béranger, Heine are generally regarded as the great song-writers of the world, a judgment that is unlikely to be challenged until there shall arise a greater than they. Some have found pleasure in comparing Heine with Byron or with Catullus. Such parallels avail nothing. Heine's songs have sunk deep into the hearts of the German people, and are sung by those who have forgotten or who never knew his name. This is true immortality. It would be difficult to match in any literature the dramatic simplicity of the "Lorelei," or the passionate longing expressed in the stanzas:—

A pine-tree stands alone on
A bare bleak northern height;
The ice and snow they swathe it,
As it sleeps there, all in white.

'Tis dreaming of a palm tree,
In a far-off Eastern land,
That mourns, alone and silent,
On a ledge of burning sand.

Or to match the perfect expression of a feeling of almost divine awe as we find in the lines:—

Thou art even as a flower is,
So gentle, and pure, and fair;
I gaze on thee, and sadness
Comes over my heart unaware.

I feel as though I should lay, sweet,
My hands on thy head, with a prayer
That God may keep thee alway, sweet,
As gentle, and pure, and fair!

And lastly, where, except perhaps in Burns' "Parting Song to Clarinda," does the everyday love tragedy find so true and poignant an expression as in the following lines? We give, as in the case of those already quoted, the translation of Sir Theodore Martin:—

A young man loves a maiden,
For somebody else she sighs;
That somebody else loves another,
And marries his winsome prize.

The maiden in mere vexation,
Because of the loss she has had,
Weds the first kind soul that offers,
And this makes the young man mad.

'Tis an old, a very old story,
But still it is always new;
And when and wherever it happens
A heart is broken in two.

It is by his "Buch der Lieder" and his "Reisebilder" that Heine will live.

THE DRAMA.

"THE PRICE OF PEACE."

"Derwent will stick at nothing," says one of his political supporters; "he has the courage of his convictions." Lord Derwent is the Prime Minister of England, and the protagonist of Mr. Cecil Raleigh's Drury Lane drama The Price of Peace, of which the chief episode—in the strict sense of the term—shows us how the Prime Minister of England, taking the courage of his convictions in both hands and a revolver in one, does not stick at assassination. The circumstances are as follows. At one of his receptions at Carlton-house-terrace, he has received a cipher despatch revealing that five thousand British troops are isolated on the North-West Frontier of India, so as to be at the mercy of "our hereditary foe"—Hyperborean let us say, discreetly—should the foe declare war, as he promptly would were he to learn the contents of the despatch. This all-important document the Prime Minister has handed to his daughter who, for reasons which, without entering into details, one may say do more honour to her heart than to her head, yields it up to an admirer of hers, the principal villain of the play, and Leader of her Majesty's Opposition. By this gentleman the despatch is transferred, for a consideration, to a spy in the service of the Hyperborean Government, who not only copies its contents, but commits them to memory. The theft is discovered. What is the Prime Minister to do? If the spy leaves the house alive there will be immediate war, opening with a great British disaster. Clearly this is the moment for the Premier to demonstrate the courage of his convictions, which he proceeds to do by summoning the spy into his study and, with the full consent and complicity of the Home Secretary and another member of the Cabinet, shooting him comme un petit lapin. The three statesmen then spread abroad a cock-and-bull story of suicide. That the scene is "dramatic," that is, charged with emotion culminating in violent, not to say fulgurant, action is not to be gainsaid. You get a "thrill," but the thrill immediately finds relief in a burst of hearty laughter. For the "problem" is of course as absurd as the persons who are set to solve it are incongruous. That the cold-blooded murder of one man is better than the possible slaughter of five thousand is just the sort of sophism which leads a muddy-brained anarchist to kill a Tsar at St. Petersburg or a King at Monza. It is not exactly the sophism to impose upon the Prime Minister of Great Britain and two of his colleagues in the Cabinet. When I saw the elderly gentleman in the blue ribbon and star of the Garter produce a revolver from the drawer of his bureau, I thought we were in for a replica (in still higher life) of the scene wherein Major Pendennis produces a revolver from his drawer and cows the bully Morgan, ultimately shouting, "It's not loaded, you fool." But the Premier's revolver was, it proved, loaded. He had the courage of his convictions, and Mr. Cecil Raleigh has the courage of his inventions. Well, let us, in our turn, have the courage of our sense of humour, and say we don't believe a word of it, but are vastly amused with it, all the same.

Though both the emotion and the action of the scene are false, given the personages concerned, the emotion and the action are nevertheless, as I have said, dramatic, and the wonder is that Mr. Raleigh has been able to find a corner for a really dramatic scene in the panoramic series of public "events" and public monuments in which he is compelled to locate his story. For the size of Drury Lane Theatre, the traditions of its management, and the taste of its patrons combine to demand not the dramatic, but the spectacular. Drury Lane drama has become less and less a drama of "situations" in the theatrical sense and more and more a drama of "sites" in the topographical sense. There must always be vast crowds on the stage, collected in accurate representations of places well known to Londoners. Lord's, Boulter's Lock, Tattersall's, Earl's-court, all have their turn. This time we have the interior of Westminster Abbey and the House of Commons in full Session—both from the spectacular point of view admirably done. That is to say, Drury Lane drama is wonderfully true to still life. Truth to life itself is, however, not so easily attained. The events that are supposed to happen in the Abbey and the House might conceivably happen, but they have not happened in our time, and are not probable at any time. A bride renounces her bridegroom at the foot of the altar—the reverse of the situation in Much Ado About Nothing, of course—but a situation of romantic drama is not exactly a precedent for realistic drama. The Prime Minister dies on the floor of the House just as he is on the point of confessing the truth about the assassination. Again, we don't believe a word of it, and again we are amused—in the extended sense of the word—all the same.

The truth is, there is no taking a Drury Lane drama seriously. We are to gape in amazement at the spectacle, the feats of stage architecture and engineering, the marshalling of the huge crowds; the story is a mere fantastic supplement which may be believed by the marines. Nothing could be better, as spectacle, than the reproduction of the Niagara Skating Rink, ice-floor, tiers of boxes, skaters and all, or than the sinking of the villain's steam yacht; the things that happen at the rink or in the yacht are of no account whatever.

For my part, I confess to enjoying drama of this type—for a change. It is a relief from brain-fag. It presents you with a panorama of London while you sit at ease in your stall. And the inevitable absurdities of the story are at any rate more tolerable than the brazen music and semi-darkness which accompany the other kinematographs or "living pictures" at the Variety—perhaps I should say the other Variety—houses. Then it is quaint to see the seriousness of the actors, who put as much "conviction" into their parts as though they were figuring in a real play. There is Mr. Henry Neville, for instance, as the Prime Minister, an absolute volcano of energy; and there is Mr. Cooper Cliffe, consummately Machiavellian and luridly Mephistophelean as the wicked Leader of the Opposition. Mrs. Raleigh and Miss Lettice Fairfax decorate the stage with their handsome persons and expensive gowns. The crowd is immense, in the slang as well as in the dictionary sense. Altogether, then, this Price of Peace is a most entertaining farrago.

And I see I was nearly forgetting one scene which, to the quiet mind, is the best in the play, though it really has nothing to do with it—the best, because here is an "intimate" touch, something of real observation. It represents a Convent School (actually existing) in the Marylebone-road, with its peaceful isolation from the world. The sense of isolation is heightened by the sounds that break in from without, the music of the Life Guards on their way to Albany-street Barracks. There is nothing irreverent; on the contrary, there is a genuine dignity in the simple professions of faith placed in the mouths of the nuns (whose Mother Superior, by the way, is very beautifully played by Miss Sitgreaves), and the children, too, are very good. There is something very sweet and refreshing in this little scene. It leads one to think that, released from the exigencies of Drury Lane drama, Mr. Raleigh might produce work on the plane of true, sincere art.

SHAFTESBURY.

The Life, Unpublished Letters, and Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury. Edited by Benjamin Rand, Ph.D. (Swan Sonnenschein. 15s.)

Shaftesbury's "Characteristics." Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by John M. Robertson. Two vols. (Grant Richards. 21s.)

It will be news to most people that Shaftesbury wrote a work called "The Philosophical Regimen," and nobody would have been more amazed to hear it than Shaftesbury himself. Dr. Rand has thought fit to bestow this title on the contents of a couple of common-place books preserved among the Shaftesbury papers in the Public Record Office, and first brought to public notice by the President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in his useful volume on Shaftesbury and Hutcheson. With what looks like a touch of covert humour, the President there remarked that these papers would probably repay a more careful investigation than he was able to give them. On this hint, however, Dr. Rand has gone seriously to work; and the result is the massive volume before us, containing 581 pages of hitherto unpublished matter from Shaftesbury's pen. About half of this has been furnished by the common-place books. The rest consists of letters from the philosopher to various correspondents, chiefly from the same source—the Shaftesbury papers in the Public Record Office. Dr. Rand has added twelve unpublished letters from Shaftesbury to Locke, preserved in the Lovelace collection, now the property of Captain King-Noel; and the whole forms an interesting volume, though the interest, as might be expected, is not equally maintained throughout. Shaftesbury, to tell the truth, is not in himself a profoundly interesting personage. But for the influence of Locke, who directed his education, and seems to have early impressed upon him that it was his duty not to go through life as a mere titled nobody, he would probably never have aspired to be anything else; and if Mr. Sidgwick is right in saying that the "Characteristics" marked a turning-point in the history of English ethical thought, this is mainly due to the fact that Shaftesbury became the literary exponent of a natural reaction against the moral and intellectual Epicureanism of the Stuart age. "Shaftesbury," says Mr. Sidgwick, "is the first moralist who distinctly takes psychological experience as the basis of ethics." Surely the Stoics had done so; and Shaftesbury did but equip himself with their armour and weapons. If any fresh proofs of this were needed, the note-books entitled by Dr. Rand the "Philosophical Regimen" supply them abundantly. The contents of these volumes were called by their author Ἀσκήματα, or "Exercises." They are, in fact, a series of themes, composed in the form of self-examination and self-exhortation, and written for the most part in a brusque, elliptical style, on texts taken from Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. Dr. Rand has partly rearranged them by grouping them under thirty-four heads, such as "Deity," "Providence," "The End," "Good and Ill," "Shame," &c. They were undoubtedly meant as private exercises for the writer's own mental and moral improvement. Such a passage as the following may serve as a clue to the general purpose:—

> Now, therefore, begin anew; truly anew, and not as before; not μετρίως ἀσκητικῶς (laying hold with small effort, Epict. Ench., cap. 1, sec. 4); not κατὰ ψυχρὰν ἀθυμίαν (with half-hearted zeal, Epict. Diss. Book III., cap. 15, sec. 7). Know thy work, know thy subject-matter, instruments, rules. Has the carpenter so many? Is there so much closet-work, paper-work—so much study, writing, figuring, practising, there—and not in the same manner here? Why writing? Why this flourishing, drawing, figuring, over and over, the same still? What for? What, but for the art? Not for show, but for the exercise, practice, improvement. Writing and then burning. Drawing and rubbing out.

Shaftesbury, however, spared these exercises, and we do not regret it; they are easy and not uninteresting reading, though their strongly pessimistic flavour causes them to pall on the taste as one proceeds. They seem to have been written at intervals during a period covering the whole of Shaftesbury's literary activity down to the closing years of his short and rather sad life. On these years, spent at Naples in the vain hope of mending a constitution long undermined by congenital disease, the concluding letters in the volume throw a pleasing though rather melancholy light. The declining philosopher busies himself with antiquities, medals, drawings, and pictures, which are brought daily for his amusement, buys old masters for Sir John Cropley, the friend of his youth, arranges the copper-plate illustrations for the new edition of his "Characteristics," and keeps "an eminent master," a pupil of Carlo Maratti, at work in his house, painting the "Judgment of Hercules," designed by himself, under his own eye. This picture is to be the modern counterpart of the famous "Tabula Cebetis," described in the well-known Greek tract often in those days printed as a supplement to the Discourses of Epictetus. He is himself writing, in French, the description of this picture, which is to be the last of his literary compositions. He keeps up his interest in English public affairs, gives his opinion on current politics, and sends for all those pamphlets, on both sides, which have had the best circulation. He has at command music of the finest and gravest sort, in which his young and devoted wife, to his great delight, finds as much pleasure as himself. The winter of 1712 was his last. He died in his wife's arms in the month of February, 1713, less than four years after his marriage, in his forty-second year.

Mr. J. M. Robertson has provided us with a readable and well-printed edition of the "Characteristics," preceded by an elaborate introduction, and with some useful foot-notes. We agree with Mr. Robertson that Shaftesbury borrowed his philosophy from other sources. We do not agree with him that it was drawn more or less directly from Spinoza, whose teaching, Mr. Robertson argues, Shaftesbury was sure to hear of during his sojourn in Holland in 1698, even if he had not studied it before. Shaftesbury was not the man to pay much attention to the opinions of any contemporary philosopher. In the great controversy of his time—that between the Ancients and the Moderns, now chiefly remembered by Swift's immortal "Battle of the Books"—he was wholly on the side of the ancients. Mr. Robertson is nearer the mark in suggesting that Shaftesbury possibly owed something to the "Enchiridion Ethicum" of Henry More, which he praises in one of his letters.

LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND.

Letters of Thomas Edward Brown. Edited, with an Introductory Memoir, by Sidney T. Irwin. (Constable. 12s.)

The high place which the late T. E. Brown should have held among our recent poets was somewhat obscured by the fact that he chose to write in the racy but unfamiliar dialect of the Isle of Man, the "isola bella" to which his mind ever turned fondly and where his closing, as his earliest, years were spent. No such obstacle lies in the way of his admirable letters, which will be generally pronounced to be the best that have appeared in this country since those of Edward FitzGerald were given to a charmed world in 1889. Brown's description of FitzGerald's letters would indeed not need very much alteration to stand for his own correspondence:—

> There is an ἦθος in FitzGerald's letters which is so exquisitely idyllic as to be almost heavenly. He takes you with him, exactly accommodating his pace to yours, walks through meadows so tranquil, and yet abounding in the most delicate surprises. And these surprises seem so familiar, just as if they had originated with yourself. What delicious blending! What a perfect interwett of thought and diction! What a sweet companion!

It is true that Brown's life and character were somewhat widely different from those of FitzGerald. Instead of being enabled by fortune to lead the life of a country hermit, boating and browsing in books and companying with new or old friends as the fancy took him, Brown had to devote the greater part of his life to work which was none the less uncongenial because he did it well and often enjoyed it. The son of an ill-paid Manx clergyman, he crowned a brilliant school career with the doubtful blessing of a Christ Church servitorship, in the days of Dean Gaisford, when a servitor was made to feel the very inferior clay of which he was constructed. Gaisford actually refused Brown a Fellowship on the score of his poverty, though all the resident Dons petitioned in his favour. Brown's sensitive soul was cut to the quick by the numerous humiliations which he had to endure at Oxford, of which he has left the world an incisive record, though they are scarcely mentioned in these letters. Mr. Irwin has narrated the main facts of his life and sketched his character with great skill and affection in the brief but excellent memoir which introduces the letters. There we read how Brown, after one or two unsatisfactory experiments in life—he was for a time headmaster of the school at which Mr. W. E. Henley, afterwards his editor, was educated—was invited to go to Clifton, a school then struggling to win its place among the best of the new public schools. There he spent about thirty uneventful but influential years. His work both as a housemaster and as a teacher was done with a certain Celtic enthusiasm overlying and interpenetrating the thorough sense of duty that he had partly inherited and partly learnt from his father, of whose beautiful character a sketch is given in one of his best letters. But this was never the life that Brown would have designed for himself. What that life would have been one may guess from one of the few letters of the Clifton period that have here been printed. It is dated December 25, 1875, and begins by glorying in the "silence and solitude" that have followed the "row and worry" of the end of term:—

> And now the last rumble of their chariot-wheels has died away, Eastward, and there is not a soul about, and the sunshine is not embarrassed by having to make shadows for any strange bodies, and all is clear, luminous, delicious, universal intelligence. It floats and buoys me up all round. "My mind to me a kingdom is," or rather a four-post bedstead of gentlest solace. And surely this sweet blue air is the very life of the intellect. All storms, and individuals, and rapprochements, and relations, and permutations, and combinations seem to me now brutal and destructive, wasteful and deadly. That a blackbird should pipe may well be borne, and I swear to you (imagine some ethereal bird-of-paradise oath!) that there is nothing else. The sky is hung over this place by a most delicate diamond boss at the zenith, and believe me! it all swims in silent blue music. (I saw a sheep then, but never mind!) Where are the men and women? Well, now look here, you'll not mention it again. They're all in church. See how good God is! See how he has placed these leitourgic traps in which people, especially disagreeable people, get caught—and lo! the universe for me!!! me—me.

This very characteristic extract illustrates not only Brown's quaint sense of humour but his passion for a free communion with nature. Both these ruling qualities found full expression in the last five years of his life, when he shook off the bonds of school work and withdrew to his beloved native country, the "lil oilan" of Man, which his poetry had done so much to expound to the world of taste as the novels of his friend Mr. Hall Caine have done for the public at large. More than three-quarters of the letters here printed belong to these last five years, and it is on them that the writer's epistolary reputation is likely to be based. His likeness to FitzGerald comes out in many details, notably in his affection for the ways and speech racy of the soil.

> The Island [writes Brown] is one moving ant-hill of story. . . . It really does seem to me as if the whole Island was quivering and trembling all over with stories—they are like leaves on a tree. The people are always telling them to one another, and any morning or evening you hear innumerable anecdotes, sayings, tragedies, comedies. . . . And you've not been there a day before all this closes round you with a quiet familiarity of use and custom which is most fascinating.

Readers of FitzGerald will not fail to be reminded of his favourite chats with his old sea-captain and days spent in listening to the yarns spun by the Aldeburgh fishermen. Brown has transmuted some of the Manx stories into his best verse; it did not suit the rather exotic genius of FitzGerald to do as much for his East Anglian folk-lore, though he did overcome his constitutional laziness so far as to compile a vocabulary of local words and idioms. One notes another point of resemblance in both men's power of dashing off the daintiest little thumb-nail sketches with which to adorn their letters. For an example take Brown's impression of a Ramsey squall:—

> It blows great guns, a mighty blizzard strides landward, its wings deep purple tinged with a fury of sweltering snow. In front of it leap the exultant waves, blue and pale green; behind all an ingruent horror.

If space permitted we should like to illustrate other qualities, the humour, kindliness, love of music, sense of deep religion, which are stamped on the pages of these delightful volumes. Much could be written on the significance of Brown's favourite Virgilian phrase, "Antiquam exquirite matrem," in connexion with his love for the Isle of Man. But we must confine ourselves to the appropriate subject of literature. Brown's letters are thickly set with little gems of literary appreciation, wherein again they resemble those of FitzGerald. We have collected a few of these, which should whet the reader's appetite for more. A happy contrast is drawn between Ariosto and Spenser:—

The "Orlando Furioso"—have you read it? . . . What a brilliant bird-of-paradise sort of creature it is! I think the hard enamel of this Italian reprobate pleases me better than Spenser with his soft velvet carpet, on which you walk ankle-deep in the moss of yielding allegory.

Of Scott, on a late re-reading, Brown writes:—

What a man! I am full of wonder, love, and praise; I seem to see all manner of great and good things; but the main thing is—the joy and the glory of it all is—what I suppose the French mean by verve, at any rate what I understand by that favourite term of French criticism. The inexhaustible streaming and bubbling up of the great old heart of him, his own boundless enjoyment of it all; this is health to the navel and marrow to the bones.

Of many French novelists we have striking appreciations, from which the following passages are taken:—

Madame Bovary is an exceptional woman. She is not like Messalina, but fate-borne like Clytemnestra. Pity her! she is pathetic I believe me she is, and intended to be so. The men are not adequate; there is the central poignancy of it all—the hobereau—is he much more? the commis—dreadful creatures. But Madame Bovary staggers into their arms drunk with the most infernal philtre, her eyes blinded with a mist as fatal as that which befooled Pasiphaë. Get rid of the satire notion, and approach this awful ruin as a ruin.

Manpassant did not attach much importance to beauty; but, in spite of himself, she sometimes hung upon his neck. . . . I think his "Bel-Ami" one of the most brilliant and annihilating works. A very devil! But, somewhere behind, there is a God, a God that hisses at his own creation, and spits upon the hurly-burly that has escaped from his hands.

It is impossible to do more than glance at Brown's dream of a chance night-meeting with Coleridge on the Quantocks, "like a great white owl, soft and plumy, with eyes of flame!" These volumes are not only full of "fine confused reading," but help to remove the fear that the growth of telegrams and post-cards had killed the art of letter-writing. We have little hesitation in saying that Brown's letters, mostly written within the last ten years, are worthy of a place on the same shelves that hold the letters of Horace Walpole and Cowper, Lamb and Gray, and Edward FitzGerald.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Richelieu.

While Mr. James Breck Perkins' fresh and graphic sketch of CARDINAL RICHELIEU AND THE GROWTH OF THE FRENCH POWER (Heroes of the Nations Series) (Putnams, 5s.) will not win the same popularity as Mr. Firth's exhaustive study of Cromwell, its most recent predecessor in the same series, it deserves a warm welcome. It will naturally be compared with the volume, of about the same size, on the same subject, by Professor Lodge, of Edinburgh. We need only say briefly that there is room for both. Professor Lodge deals more fully with the policy and the administration of Richelieu; Mr. Perkins more fully with his surroundings, his personality, the social life of his time. Mr. Perkins, as we knew fifteen years ago when he prefaced his exhaustive study of Mazarin by a sketch of the administration of Richelieu, is a master of the original authorities. In the last fifteen years he has not been idle, and if his studies of French history at the beginning of the eighteenth century have not been so successful as his earlier work, he has established claims to the gratitude of historical students. His sketch of Richelieu is facile and brilliant. We have found its interest so great as to read it at a sitting, which is after all something of a tribute to the liveliness of a history which is the work of a man who knows the period minutely. Mr. Perkins skilfully manages in a brief space to convey a vivid picture of the stern, concentrated character: he is certainly not a partisan, but he makes us feel the real greatness of the Cardinal. His sketch of Richelieu as a Churchman strikes us as particularly just; and equally vigorous is his account of his policy in regard to the Huguenots. Incidental characters, too, are well drawn, particularly Louis XIII. An English reader will note a few Americanisms; an ecclesiastic would perhaps regard such forms as "tunics" and "dalmaticas" as showing unfamiliarity with Church vestments; a lover of Dumas might resent the account of Urbain Grandier. But of the general accuracy and force of the book there can be no doubt. It is a vigorous and interesting portraiture of a great man, with a vivid picture of the times in which he lived.

For the Electors.

THE THIRD SALISBURY ADMINISTRATION, by H. Whates (Vacher, 15s. n.), is a convenient compendium of recent political history, which would be still more convenient if it had an index. The style is the flowing matter-of-fact style of the political leading article; and the point of view may be inferred from this passage in the introduction:—

Had Mr. Chamberlain become War Minister the course of history might have been changed. With a man of less aggressive temper at the Colonial Office the fire that smouldered in South Africa would have been damped down. Even had it burst into flame the likelihood is that the War Office would have been administered by Mr. Chamberlain with such energy and resource that the conflagration would have been extinguished without serious difficulty.

Not the least useful pages are those of the appendices, where we find extensive excerpts from Blue-books and other official documents.

South Africa.

Dr. M. J. Farrelly has only been about four years in South Africa; but as advisory counsel to the Transvaal Republic on the legal questions arising under the Conventions with the Imperial Government he was behind the scenes. His views on the political problems of the hour are set forth in THE SETTLEMENT AFTER THE WAR (Macmillan, 10s. n.), a work which should remove any lingering doubts that any one may entertain as to the justice of the British case, or the desire of the young Afrikanders to break up the British Empire in South Africa. Dr. Farrelly advised Messrs. Kruger and Steyn at Bloemfontein; and the advice which he gave them was good. He was himself a pro-Boer to the extent that he was in favour of the independence of the two Republics, provided that they gave all white men equal rights; but he was under no illusions as to Mr. Kruger's desire to come to terms. As regards Mr. Kruger's proposals for the extension of the franchise, he remarks sardonically that, supposing them to have been made law, the result would have been that "at the end of seven years and a half from 1889, if one had spent a large portion of one's life attending to the matter, the franchise would be attained." And he also declares that Mr. Kruger "thought the minimum demand was a maximum, that a mere bargain was being introduced, that, if he held firm, the Imperial Government would retreat, and never under any circumstances would resort to arms to redress the balance of power between Boer and Uitlander." Dr. Farrelly remonstrated, and there was a moderate party among the Boers that would gladly have attended to his remonstrances, but the young Afrikanders got their way. Ultimately the Veldt Boers forced the hand of the Government—which, Dr. Farrelly thinks would have preferred to wait a little longer in the hope of Continental complications—by seizing the strategical positions on the frontiers of Natal; and then came the ultimatum.

As regards future policy, Dr. Farrelly knows his mind. There must be absolute and permanent annexation of the conquered territories, and then

> The institution of Crown Colony Government for some years to come is plainly inevitable. Any immediate institution of representative Government, in which the Boer inhabitants were admitted to the suffrage, would mean transferring the fight from the kopjes to the ballot-box. An electoral system in which the Boer had no vote would mean erecting an Uitlander oligarchy; and there is reason to fear an ideal kind of Government would not be the result, besides the inevitable consequence of perpetuating race-feeling.

Dr. Farrelly's book may not be the most interesting to read of the many books that have appeared on the problem with which it deals; but it is, we think, the soundest and most instructive. It deserves a wide sale—especially among those who are tossed upon a sea of doubt as to the exact facts of the case.

A Life of the Queen.

QUEEN VICTORIA: A PERSONAL SKETCH, by Mrs. Oliphant (Cassell, 3s. 6d.), is the last thing that Mrs. Oliphant wrote. The manuscript was not quite finished when she died, and it has been necessary for a supplementary note to be added by another hand. It is a book of which the critic can say very little except that it is a good book of its kind, but that its kind is not the best, and that it will leave the reputation of the author where it stood before. Mrs. Oliphant was a clever book-maker as well as a gifted novelist; and the work before us is a piece of book-making. It is "readable"; it is in admirable taste. One would have expected no less from Mrs. Oliphant, and, considering the subject and the circumstances, one had no right to expect more. The life of a reigning Sovereign, written by a loyal subject, could hardly be so written as to rank with Froude's study of Henry VIII. or Carlyle's study of Frederick the Great; and we may be grateful to Mrs. Oliphant for turning aside for once from the proper path of her genius to write a book which will undoubtedly interest many readers, though it afforded no scope for the display of her most characteristic talents.

Under the title of FROISSART IN BRITAIN (Nisbet, 6s.) Mr. Henry Newbolt provides a translation of portions of the chronicles bearing upon English history. It certainly is interesting to have this quaint first-hand account of such events in our annals as the battle of Otterbourne and the rebellion of Wat Tyler. The book is well got up, and has a couple of dozen pictures taken from old prints. It should have a place on the shelves of all school libraries, as it might help to make history lessons popular. Masters who have not taken modern history at the Universities will teach history the better for having it in front of them. Mr. Newbolt's introduction, however, is rather gushing than instructive, and therefore disappointing.

Mr. Edward Lummis' THE SPEAKER'S CHAIR (Unwin, 2s. 6d.) is a brightly-written little sketch of the duties and position of the Speaker and of the occupants of the Chair since the time of Edward III. when the Speakership first became a permanent office. The stormy times of the last half century are very lightly touched on. They would make a very different and more exciting story—as is well illustrated by the story of Mr. Speaker Arthur Onslow, who was asked what would happen if he carried out his threat to name a member. "The Lord in heaven only knows," he said. The knowledge is hardly likely to be withheld from any Speaker of modern times. Mr. Lummis is generally accurate, but he seems to have got wrong about Sir William Williams, the enemy of Jeffreys. Sir William was charged with libel (for having licensed the publication of Dangerfield's narrative), not in 1681, but in 1684, and it is not correct to say that the Duke of York remitted part of his fine, for the Duke had, in 1686, when the case came on, ascended the throne as James II.

JOHN RUSKIN (Melrose, 1s. n.) gives the story of Ruskin's career, especially of the early part of it. Mr. R. Ed. Pengelly, the author, is an enthusiastic admirer, but his book is a good popular sketch, and written with good taste.

We have received a new edition (the eleventh) of Messrs. Black's guide to LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT (1s.). We are glad to note that it contains a bibliography, albeit only a short one.

FICTION.

Mark Twain.

At first sight it is not very easy to decide whether the new volume of our old laughter-provoking friend "Mark Twain" should be classed under fiction or elsewhere. There are more sermons than stories in THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG, &c. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). Mr. Clemens has of late years allowed the tendency to what Americans call "preachments" to have its way, sometimes at the expense of both his humour and his readers. In the present volume a terrible example of this is provided by the long and rather dull—that we should say so!—article on "Christian Science and the Book of Mrs Eddy," which is a well-meaning but wearisome and somewhat unnecessary piece of satire. It is true that the curious sect of the Christian Scientists has apparently taken some hold of the public mind in the United States. Thus Mr. Clemens may have had a good reason for exerting himself to destroy popular faith in a creed which may do considerable harm to the credulous, and still more to their dependants and children. Still, we are not reconciled to the occupation of fifty pages by an attack which is really summed up in the one joke of the article, as follows:—

> Mrs. Fuller brought in an itemized bill for a crate of broken bones mended in two hundred and thirty-four places—one dollar per fracture.
> "Nothing exists but Mind?"
> "Nothing," she answered. "All else is substanceless, all else is imaginary."
> I gave her an imaginary cheque, and now she is suing me for substantial dollars. It looks inconsistent.

Mr. Clemens reprints his articles on the Austrian Parliament, on the payment of American Ambassadors, on the American disinclination to take any steps to put down the small abuses of daily life, and so forth. They are all marked by good sense, but many, we fancy, will prefer the inimitable fooling of "Mark Twain." This is well represented by the story that gives its title to the book, a worthy pendant to such delightful studies of life in the small riverside towns as are to be found in "Tom Sawyer," "Huck Finn," and "Life on the Mississippi." Still more charming is the fragment called "The Captain's Story," which we have read before but are delighted to meet again. This gives a rationalized version of Elijah's success in praying down fire on the altar, and well illustrates the moral:—

> You read the Bible. Don't you worry about the tough places. They ain't tough when you come to think them out and throw light on them. There ain't a thing in the Bible but what is true; all you want is to go prayerfully to work and cipher out how 'twas done.

Many readers will think that the nicest thing in the book is "The Private History of the 'Jumping Frog' Story," which not only contains a gem of French-English—"I no saw not that that frog had nothing of better than each frog" for instance—but shows that Mr. Clemens is not afraid of a joke at his own expense. It will be remembered that a friend maliciously called "Mark Twain's" attention to the condensed version of his story which Mr. Sidgwick had introduced into his "Greek Prose Composition," with a hint that this was an ancient Greek tale. The humourist fell into the trap. Now he reprints his article bodily, with a footnote explaining that the title of Mr. Sidgwick's book made the confusion. "It seemed to mean that the originals were Greek. It was not well chosen, for it was pretty sure to mislead." It is not every humourist by profession whose sense of humour has allowed him to take a joke against himself in such good part.

THE DEAN'S APRON, by C. J. Wills and Godfrey Burchett (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), describes life in a provincial cathedral town. It requires considerable literary skill to make this sort of thing interesting; but the authors have overcome the difficulty, and produced a work of the school of Anthony Trollope which is interesting throughout, though never exciting. The Dean married beneath him, and the story is mainly concerned with the social adventures of his wife whom the cathedral circle sought to snub. They had some success at first, but in the end they were duly brought to heel. How this happened is well related, with careful observation and quiet humour. We congratulate Messrs. Wills and Burchett.

THE LOVE THAT LASTS, by Florence Warden (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is a not very thrilling tale of secret towers inhabited by disguised females in male attire, and singularly inept villains who take their brides into the midst of it all, hoping to keep them from the heart of the mystery by the device which Bluebeard found ineffectual a good many years ago. To show a young woman a portion of her own house which she is not to enter because there is "absolutely nothing to see" leads invariably to the sort of adventure described on page 213, where Alison "drags aside the heavy curtain."

Those who love to follow the intrigues of the wicked and loiter in the red ways of crime may be sure of complete satisfaction in the reading of THE CRIMSON CRYPTOGRAM (Long, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Fergus Hume. Not since "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" has this author written so enthrallingly or with so much skilful characterization. We will not do Mr. Hume the disservice of telling the plot, but content ourselves with recommending his latest book to all who would spend an ardent hour in unravelling one of those curious crimes which he knows so well how to invent, the kind of crime more common, fortunately, in fiction than in fact.

Since the early days of the sporting novel it has been the pleasing ambition of all writers of fox-hunting stories to out-Hawley Smart in describing a run. Mr. Fox Russell makes a by no means bad start in this direction, but his novel, OUTRIDDEN (Everett, 2s.), lacks general interest. To the hunting man the book may bring pleasure, to the "general reader" the sporting note will appear too much insisted on. But "Outridden" is written by a man who knows his world and can give a fairly clear picture of its doings.

MONICA GREY, by Lady Hely-Hutchinson (Murray, 2s. 6d. n.), turns upon a theme which is not altogether unfamiliar. The heroine is a good woman who, being married, discovers to her horror that she is in love with a man who is not her husband. The knot is cut, in the usual way, by the deaths of the protagonists. It is a piece of unhealthy sentimentalism moderately well written, but badly put together. The author evidently wants to prove something—exactly what we have been unable to discover.

IN TALES OF THE PAMPAS, by William Baldin (Unwin, 2s.), the latest of the Overseas Library books, we have eight short stories of life in Argentina. They are moderately good, but not very good; though like most of the books of the series they tell us certain things about wild life in a wild country which we did not know before.

There is an enormous public waiting for the really amusing satire upon the modern vestryman. But although Mr. Allen Upward has perceived this fact he has not been able, in the volume entitled THE WONDERFUL CAREER OF EBENEZER LOUD (Hurst, 3s. 6d.), to do more than show the way. The story reads like a poor up-to-date réchauffé of that once much-read diary written by Thackeray's young friend "Mr. Stubbs," or a more parochial edition of Mr. Burnand's account of the real Robinson Crusoe.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Sir Edward Fry's opening speech at the meeting of the Library Association reads like a sermon against pernicious books. It also resembled some sermons that we have heard in exaggerating the evil which it denounced. Books of a directly corrupting tendency are of course to be deprecated and left unread; but they are not very often to be found in the public libraries, nor are they the favourite mental pabulum of the public. The experience of those who cater for the vast mass of the uneducated is that impropriety does not pay. The standard of propriety is actually stricter in periodical and other publications intended for the multitude than in those addressed to the cultivated and refined. It is, in fact, in regard to inept rather than immoral books that public librarians exercise too lax a censorship. A good many unnecessary "made" books live upon their patronage; and the sooner that patronage is withdrawn the better.

Mr. Frank Campbell, who at the beginning of the year resigned his post in the British Museum, has compiled an "Index Catalogue of Indian Official Publications," which are stored in the library. This is not, we suppose, an official publication; it lacks the imprimatur of the authorities. Some such record was much needed to serve as a standard to custodians of Oriental documents. Mr. Campbell's work bears evidence of much minute research and ungrudging labour. Above all the arrangement is systematic and yet so simple, and once its general construction is understood any document may be easily found. The contents of periodicals are set out, and a wealth of detail is furnished by appendices upon special subjects.

We can commend the excellent intentions of the librarian of a London parish who has published a "Dictionary" of his locality. We wish more librarians would do the same; but topography is a subject full of humours, and he who would study it needs something more than accuracy and a taste for cataloguing. Our author says that he has attempted to give concisely a short history arranged alphabetically. He displays a passion for detail which results in some delicious incongruities. For instance, the "Copper Mills" were on the river at the southern end of the parish, the watercress grown there is well-known." After the manner of the snakes which were not in Iceland are some of the entries. "Statues—none," "Heraldry—the parish has no coat of arms." Best of all, we are informed, under "Battles," that history does not record any battles as having been fought there, but sham fights have taken place on a neighbouring common. There is an entry concerning some elderberries having been "feloniously stolen" without being severed from the tree, which shows some cleverness on the part of the thief. But we must not be too critical—the brochure was originally compiled for a local bazaar.

The Public Library at Kimberley has, by the liberality of the De Beers Board and other subscribers, been considerably extended and altered, and the comfort of the readers much enhanced thereby. Miss Wilkes, the librarian, has resigned owing to ill-health, and a new librarian, Mr. B. L. Dyer, late an assistant in the Kensington public libraries, has been chosen, and has now arrived to take up his duties. Judge President Laurence, the chairman of the Library, to whom it owes so much, has been occupying himself during a visit to London in selecting new books.

The patient residents of Bow are at length rewarded by some tangible sign of the coming of the public library which they voted for so many years ago. The Vestry have now accepted a tender for the building, and a halfpenny rate is to be levied. This body cannot be commended for its attitude towards the library movement. Under the new London Government Act Bow will be incorporated with Poplar and Bromley, where libraries are now at work.

The foundation-stone has been laid of a new public library and technical school for the borough of Colne. The building is being erected by the Corporation at an estimated cost of £10,000. A movement is on foot for the adoption of the Acts at Dover. The City Council of Bristol has passed a resolution in favour of obtaining special powers to increase the rate to 2d. for the purposes of the libraries, now ten in number, and the new art gallery. The Town Council of Greenock resolved, in December last, to adopt the Free Libraries Act, and has since decided to place the library in the building in Wallace-square, formerly occupied as the Post Office. Mr. Andrew Carnegie has now intimated a gift of £5,000 to be devoted towards the purposes of the new library.

We notice Annual Reports of the St. Helens Public Library and the Carnegie Library, Ayr. The former registers a slight decrease in the lending issues, accounted for in the usual manner—by the war. A series of literary lectures was given during the winter months, and a fifth exhibition of rare, curious, and illustrated books in the reference department attracted great interest. Ayr also shows a decreased use of the books, but is not to be tempted into speculations as to the cause. The fiction issue is 76 per cent., religion and philosophy one per cent. And this is the land of Knox and Carlyle.

Correspondence.

DEWLANDS, BLACK NOTLEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The total destruction by fire of this humble dwelling, which took place last week, removes one of the most important relics of one of our greatest naturalists. John Ray (who, by the way, was never "Dr.," as he was described in some daily papers which announced the fire), though born in the village of Black Notley, was probably not born in this house, but in one nearer to the parish church and adjoining the village forge, his father, Roger Wray, being the blacksmith. Derham in his life of Ray speaks of his dying "at Black Notley (in a house of his own building)"; and, as this was certainly the Dewlands, it is probable that, on his father's death, the naturalist built this cottage—for it was little more—for his mother's occupation. In his diary he records:—"March 15, 1678, being Saturday, departed this life, my most dear and honoured mother, Elizabeth Ray, of Black Notley, in her house on Dewlands, in the hall-chamber, about three of the clock in the afternoon, aged, as I suppose, seventy-eight." As Ray was then acting as tutor to the son of Edward Bullock, of Faulkbourne Hall, Witham, only a few miles distant, he was probably with his mother at her death, and on the 24th of the following June (June, 1679) he himself moved to Dewlands, "where," he writes, "I intend, God willing, to settle for the short pittance of time I have yet to live in this world." He speaks in his letters of his garden as ill-situated and having a cold soil, of his house as exposed to north and north-east wind, and of himself as "one who is subject to colds and whose lungs are apt to be affected"; but at Dewlands he lived on and toiled on for twenty-five and a-half years, maintaining himself, his wife, and three daughters on the pension of sixty pounds a year bequeathed him by Francis Willughby and the profits of his literary labours. What these last were may be gauged from the fact that for his "Historia Plantarum," in three folio volumes of nearly 1,000 pages each, describing over 18,000 species of plants, and occupying most of his time for nine years—viz., 1683-8 and 1700-4—for he had no amanuensis—Ray received thirty pounds per volume, about threepence a page! At Dewlands the great naturalist died, on Wednesday, January 17th, 1705, modern reckoning, the dates of his birth and death now on his oft-restored tomb in Black Notley Churchyard being both wrong. From that time until its destruction the house remained practically unaltered. There is an excellent engraving of it in "The Correspondence of John Ray," published by the Ray Society in 1848.

EDUCATION AND FAMILY HISTORY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Many will read with interest and sympathy Mr. T. Thatcher's advocacy of the teaching of "heredity" as "a standing subject in our various colleges and training institutions for teachers." For my part I leave to more competent pens the discussion whether a subject so thorny as the breeding of men and women should be added to the burden of learning already heaped on young heads. There is so much to learn nowadays that we are in danger of forgetting that we are to teach the young mind how to learn, and the habit of learning rather than to make young and immature intellects learned.

But if ever "heredity" should become part of our national curriculum, it should be supplemented by a simple piece of instruction now much neglected. It is not of much use to teach lessons of atavism and hybridism and so forth to young people who do not know who and what manner of people their own great grandfathers were. This is neglected even in families who take a legitimate pride in their pedigree. Pedigrees are necessarily incomplete, and go too far back. For instance, a friend of mine is proud, and justly proud, of the fact that he is a descendant of William Drummond of Hawthornden. The mere fact that William Drummond left no male heirs need not disturb my friend's pride or his belief in his pedigree. But there is a far more fatal obstacle to any practical use of his distinguished origin. My friend must be at least eight descents removed from his poet ancestor. If we omit, for the sake of simplicity, the marriages of cousins (which obviously reduce the tale), my friend must have had between 1600 and 1900 at least 510 ancestors, inasmuch as he had four grandparents, eight great-grandparents, sixteen great great-grandparents, and so on. He knows that he is descended from Ben Jonson's friend, but he does not know the names, qualities, characters, constitutions of his sixteen great great-grandparents.

Now, before we can put our knowledge of heredity to any practical use, we ought to know and study at least our parents, their parents, and the parents of these. When a man marries he should at least have the like knowledge of his wife's ancestors. That would involve a knowledge of the life history of some twenty-eight individuals. Here, to a certain extent, the State assists us. For a trifling fee Somerset House will tell a man where and when his own and his wife's parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents (unless, indeed, they lived and died abroad) were born, married, and died. Even that information has its value and interest. Even the family names of the thirty nearest ancestors of a man's children may convey some knowledge of their status, origin, nationality. But obviously this information might (and perhaps should) be supplemented. We might compel people to register, not merely deaths, but the causes of deaths. It might be useful to us to know how many of our immediate ancestors died of consumption, or cancer, or gout, or in a lunatic asylum. We might register our ancestors' trades, incomes, education. Whether such knowledge would hinder us from contracting unwise marriages, or from leading lives unsuited to our inherited constitutions of mind and body, is more than doubtful. But in any case, if a knowledge of heredity is to be of any practical use it must be combined with a knowledge of our own immediate ancestors. Yet we must not forget that that knowledge has its obvious dangers as well as its possible benefits. When I was a boy at Rugby, I heard the present Archbishop of Canterbury preach from the text: "A bruised reed shall He not break." He told us boys that though God is very merciful to human weakness, we must nevertheless avoid the temptation to make our weaknesses an excuse for sin. A knowledge of our ancestors' weaknesses, added to that of our own weaknesses increases our tendency to make excuses for our sins. Perhaps, after all, it is best to teach us only to do nothing which is harmful to our offspring, and that, perhaps, is what good education should teach us without any question of heredity at all.

Yours faithfully,

Ealing. J. D. A.

THE ARTIST AND HIS CREATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the last paragraph of to-day's issue you say, "No literary parallel to the case of the sculptor who fell in love with his own creation."

Is not Flammarion's story in "Uranie" a parallel?

Yours very truly,

S. S. STANLEY.

Leamington, Sept. 22, 1900.

IS SWINBURNE A "GREAT POET"?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have the misfortune to be one of those whom Mr. Frederic Harrison called "the young fops at Oxford who admire Swinburne," and I have therefore been rather disgusted at the way in which the author of "Erechtheus" has been treated by the critics in their discussion about the latter-day dearth of great poets. For my part I do not want more than eight or nine great poets in a century; but eight or nine we have had, and Swinburne is one of them. He may, as Punch put it, have told a great many people to "go to blazes"; for I notice that his little critics are very much annoyed with him; but, after all, our chief concern is with the fact that he is the author of "Atalanta in Calydon," the "Songs before Sunrise," and "Tristram of Lyonesse." It should be remembered that he wrote "Ave atque Vale" and the "Triumph of Time."

If our small critics cannot appreciate poetry of this sort I am heartily sorry for them. They upbraided Swinburne because in the "Poems and Ballads" he seemed to think that domestic poetry was for domestics; and they upbraided him when in later life he went into the simple kingdom of Blake. They said his works were all style, as if a fine statue could ever be moulded out of anything but fine material; but when he hammered out the iron lines of Rosamund they said "we miss the old Swinburnian melody." It seems to me that they miss everything. On the other hand, Tennyson once acknowledged Swinburne to be a greater poet than himself. Matthew Arnold recognized his greatness; and Robert Louis Stevenson, the idol of the present generation, knew the first series of "Poems and Ballads" almost by heart. If we are to believe Mr. Henley this was because they were bad poetry.

Now, wild as the statement may seem, I think it could be proved that Swinburne has influenced English literature more decidedly than any other poet that ever lived. Tennyson, certainly, has waned before him. His metrical influence, of course, is unbounded. One notices it in no one more plainly than Mr. Henley. Paradoxes may be excused; but one does not like the most paradoxical person to be ungrateful. It matters very little to Swinburne what the present generation thinks about him. He stands at least on a level with the greatest of the century, and the fact will be recognized when his country has lost him. But it is very ridiculous, in the eyes of all who know what great poetry is, that the country which possesses the greatest poet now living in the world should be engaged in discussing why there are no great poets.

I fear that my letter is of undue length, but I should like to support what I say by two quotations, both of which I hold to be great poetry, and both of which are fit to be compared with the work of any poet that ever lived. The first one is from the greatest elegy we possess;

> There fall no tears like their's that all men hear
> Fall tear by sweet imperishable tear
> Down the opening leaves of holy poets' pages.
> Thee not Orestes, not Electra mourns;
> But bending us-ward with memorial urns
> The most high Muses that fulfil all ages
> Weep, and our God's heart yearns.

For the other quotation I will take the sixteenth stanza of "A Watch in the Night."

> Italy, what of the night?
> Ah, child, child, it is long!
> Moonbeam and starbeam and song
> Leave it dumb now and dark.
> Yet I perceive on the height
> Eastward, not now very far,
> A song too loud for the lark,
> A light too strong for a star.

Those who are acquainted with the whole of these poems cannot deny that they are superlatively great poetry without denying at the same time their inability to understand great poetry. A small critic cannot hurt a great poet; but he can mar other people's enjoyment of the great poet. I must therefore conclude with saying, quite dispassionately—for I admire some of Mr. Henley's verses—that Mr. Henley's causeries, together with the more elaborate work of better critics, are in direct opposition to those who would endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world.

Yours faithfully,

19, Pier-st., Aberystwyth. ALFRED NOYES.

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, Mr. Lang is well able to take care of himself; not so the English possessive. Mr. Little's letter turns on one point: "Personification alone, as a rule, justifies inflection." I will ask him to establish this rule, by quotations from standard writers of English. Yours faithfully,

Rugby, Sept. 21, 1900. W. H. D. ROUSE.

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to the editorial remarks in a recent number of Literature, the following is the correct version of the poem which I have copied from the original MS. in the author's handwriting, contained in a letter addressed to "John Taylor, Esq., at the Rev. Mr. Armstrong's, Clonoulty, Cashel," and preserved in the library of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. The postmark bears the date "Se. 6, 1816" (?) The figures 1816 are rather illegible, but the reading is probably correct, as the poem was originally published in an Irish newspaper (the Newry Telegraph) in 1817.

The poem is prefaced by the following remark: "I have completed the Burial of Sir John Moore, and will inflict it upon you; you have no one but yourself to blame for praising the two stanzas that I told you so much."

As many of the published versions are inaccurate, the following correct version may interest some of your readers.

I.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note
As his corse to the ramparts we hurried:
Not a Soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave where our Hero we buried.

II.

We buried him darkly, at dead of night,
The sods with our bayonets turning:
By the struggling moonbeam's misty light,
And the lanthorn dimly burning.

III.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Not in sheet or in shroud we wound him,
But he lay like a warrior taking his [rest]*
With his martial cloak around [him].*

IV.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow,
But we steadfastly gaz'd on the face that was dead
And we bitterly thought of the morrow:

V.

We thought as we hollow'd his narrow bed,
And smooth'd down his lonely pillow,
That the Foe and the Stranger would tread o'er His head
And we far away on the billow!

VI.

Lightly they'll talk of the Spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him:—
But little he'll reck, if they let him sleep on
In the grave where a Briton has laid him.

* These words have been accidentally torn out of the MS., but there can be no doubt what they were.

VII.

But half of our heavy task was done
When the clock struck the note for retiring.
And we heard the distant and random gun
That the Foe was sullenly firing.

VIII.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down
From the field of his fame fresh and gory:
We carv'd not a line and we rais'd not a stone,
But we left him alone with his glory!

Yours faithfully,

Dublin, Sept. 24, 1900. J. E. GORE.

R. L. STEVENSON'S "PAINSTAKINGNESS."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, A propos your note on this subject in your issue of September 22nd an interesting illustration of his consciousness of the pains he took with what he calls the "plastic part of literature" is afforded by the last sentences of his "Gossip on Romance." He is speaking of Scott, and "He was a great day dreamer," he writes, "a seer of fit and beautiful and humorous visions but hardly a great artist . . . of the pleasure of his art he tasted fully; but of its toils and rigils and distresses never man knew less. A great Romantic—an idle child." In my copy of Stevenson's volume some reader, remembering the last sad laborious passages of Scott's life, has placed a note of interrogation against the passage I have underlined, but it was of course the contrast between Scott's ceaselessly flowing pen, and his own concealed laborious art that Stevenson had in mind.

Very faithfully yours,

W. J. LANCASTER.

REMNANTS OF AN ANCIENT RACE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It seems to have escaped the notice of our historians and philologists that the so-called Bulgarians of Southern Hungary, settled in Ö'Besenyö, Bolgar-Telep, Winga, and other places, and numbering some 20,000, who speak a language which differs from the Bulgarian and is called by themselves the Paulican or Palityán, are in reality of the same ancient race as the Paulicians who live in the neighbourhood of Philippopolis in Bulgaria.

Mention is made of the Paulicians in Church history from the seventh century onward. They were persecuted as a sect and scattered. At the request of the Patriarch of Antioch some of them were permitted to settle near Philippopolis in the year 970, and the city Alexiopolis was built for them 130 years later. As they lived apart from the Bulgarians the Sultan declared in the year 1808 that they must have a head. They presented a petition to the Greek Patriarch, which, however, was rejected, whereupon they applied to the Pope, and were received into the Roman Church. Those who settled in Hungary came into the country about 150 years ago. Maria Theresa received them as subjects on condition that they became Roman Catholics. They are a sober, industrious people.

Last year several of their number sent me a petition setting forth that while the New Testament had been already translated into more than three hundred languages it had not yet been translated into their native language, and requested humbly and urgently that the Gospel might be given to them in the Paulican tongue. I took steps to fulfil their request, having found a competent translator in the person of Mr. I. Bratán, sub-keeper of the archives of the royal city of Temesvár, and the Gospel of St. John was issued here by the National Bible Society of Scotland at the beginning of this year.

It was with profound interest that I received afterwards the communication that Paulicians of Philippopolis who had seen the Gospel declared that the language was identical with their own. Our Hungarian Paulicans were of opinion that their name had come down from a certain Paul who had led them into Hungary, but it appears now that it is of ancient origin, the Paul of the Hungarian Paulicans being in reality none other than the Paul of the Paulicians of the olden time.

I am yours very truly,

ANDREW MOODY, D.D.

"HORNS" IN SHAKESPEARE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the Review of "The Evil Eye" in last week's Literature reference is made to the forester's song in As You Like It, and Jaques' cynical remarks on horns. These seem by your reviewer to be taken literally; but surely no man, woman, or child ever before interpreted them otherwise than as an aspersion on the constancy of the female sex, the song chiming in with Jaques' pessimistic view of human nature. I do not know a single instance in Shakespeare in which the mention of "horns" does not imply that the wearer's wife has been unfaithful to him.

OTHELLO.—A horned man's a monster and a beast.

IAGO.—There's many a beast then in a populous city.

Othello, Act. IV., Sc. 1.

ULYSSES.—O deadly gall, and theme of all our scorns!
For which we lose our heads to gild his (Menelaus') horns.

Troilus and Cressida, Act. IV., Sc. V.

But instances are numerous.

Your obedient servant,

J. FOSTER PALMER.

8, Royal-avenue, S.W., Sept. 22, 1900.

 We hardly know why Mr. Palmer puts any interpretation at all upon our reviewer's reference to Jaques. What Jaques said was, "It would do well to set the deer's horns upon his head as a branch of victory." All our reviewer said was, "Every one will remember Jaques' words about setting 'the deer's horns upon his head for a branch of victory.'" He then quoted the lines of the forester's song—

Take thou no scorn, to wear the horn,
It was a crest ere thou wast born.

Is not this "the single instance" Mr. Palmer wants? Even if we accept the cynical interpretation of Jaques' words, still the hunter is consoled for wearing "the horn," the sign of the cuckold, on the ground that it was also a symbol of something better.

EMERSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—During my absence in Switzerland I have missed my Literature and have only to-day seen the number for September 8. On page 171 of that number is an article on Emerson, in which the author ascribes to Emerson some verses written by Oliver Wendell Holmes:

Deal gently with us, ye who read! &c.

More than enough of error has already crept into literary records in reference to these verses, and the fault is mine; but it is going too far to rob my dear dead friend of some of the daintiest lines he ever wrote and to ascribe them to Emerson, who wrote much that was lofty and noble in the form of verse, but never wrote a line of poetry in his life.

Shortly before his death Holmes sent me a complete set of his works, each volume containing an appropriate inscription, and on a separate sheet of paper in "Over the Teacups" was written the "Deal gently" lines. As I did not know them and could not find them in his poems I assumed they were unpublished, and as such I sent them to the Athenæum, where they appeared, and since then they have been frequently reprinted with a reference to their origin. But quite recently I came across the lines in an old edition of Holmes' poems.

Yours faithfully,

London, Sept. 8. J. Y. W. MACALISTER.

 This quotation occurred in an incidental reference to Emerson's poetry contained in an article on Emerson's prose by E. M. We are much obliged to Mr. Macalister for his letter. The error had already been pointed out by a correspondent of the St. James's Gazette, which had kindly quoted largely from the article. We acknowledge and regret the mistake, one of those which, during the vacation, even the most cautious writer may occasionally commit by reason of a lack of reference. The autumn holiday has so many pleasures placed to its credit that we are inclined to charge it with this literary lapse, and can only remind our contributor of Emerson's lines in "Suum Cuique,"

Nature shall mind her own affairs:
I will attend my proper cares,
In rain, or sun, or frost.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Publishers are never slow to adapt themselves to circumstances. The general election has upset many calculations, but it will help some books which are being hurried along to reap what benefit they can from the Parliamentary campaign. Mr. Murray was first in the field with his announcement of an appendix bringing up to date Mr. Sydney Buxton's "Political Handbook"—which can be obtained separately or bound with the volume—bringing it up to date. Messrs. Hutchinson have a number of works in hand which are of special interest at the moment, chief among them being "Lord Rosebery: His Life and Speeches," by Mr. Thomas F. G. Coates, in two large volumes running to over 1,000 pages, and containing full reports of the most important speeches, "by permission of the Earl of Rosebery and The Times." Another book about Lord Rosebery has been written by Miss Stoddart and is announced by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. "The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain: the Man and the Statesman," by N. Murrell Marris, is coming from the same publishers, and, like the Rosebery work, will include an account of the political history of the country during the last thirty years. Messrs. Hutchinson will also issue Mr. Henry Broadhurst's "Story of his Life from a Stonemason's Bench to the Treasury Bench," which was announced in the spring. Mr. Broadhurst's autobiography includes experiences which vary from tramping a thousand miles in mid-winter in search of work to being entertained at Sandringham by the Prince of Wales, and is being prepared for the press by Mr. A. P. Grubb. Another Parliamentary book is the late Sir John Mowbray's "Recollections of the House of Commons," edited by his daughter, and announced by Messrs. Blackwood.

The prospects for the "fall" publishing in America are doubtful owing chiefly to the Presidential election. Whenever this occurs the trade is never so brisk, and publishers do not "search" for new authors. There is also the depression caused by the Chinese troubles and by the doubtful fortunes of American Imperialism. These things keep people more to the daily Press and less to the book. Nevertheless, the number of volumes to be published are in excess of last year's, and shows a cheerful optimism in spite of many adverse circumstances. But hardly any book of real importance is coming in the field of serious literature. The greatest activity will be in fiction, most of the popular novelists being represented. The inauguration of the Publishers' Association has come at a useful time—at the beginning of the autumn season. It will have much work to do, especially on the question of international copyright. In the new "Trade List Annual," the "Reference Catalogue of America," no less than twenty-nine names appear among the publishers who were not represented last year. Several are missing that appeared in the previous volume, but these are the outcome of business changes.

Mr. J. G. Alger, the author of "Englishmen in the French Revolution," the "New Paris Sketch Book," and "Glimpses of the French Revolution," after fifteen years of research in the Paris "National Library" and the "National Archives," may be said to have reached a vantage point for the study of the French Revolution, where only such men as Professor Aulard keep him company. He has just completed a work shortly to be published in London, called "Phases of the French Revolution." It depicts the ordinary life of Parisians during the period, and studies the part played by foreigners, especially Americans and English. Mr. Alger has discovered fresh facts respecting Paul Jones.

Messrs. Smith, Elder, who opened their autumn season on the 18th with Mr. Henry Seton Merriman's new novel "The Isle of Unrest," and followed this week with "The Life of Jesus of Nazareth," by Prof. Rush Rees, in their "Historical Series for Bible Students," and a new novel by G. Colmore, entitled "The Marble Face," will continue on October 10 with a book by Mr. Frank T. Bullen, on "The Men of the Merchant Service," and F. Anstey's new novel "The Brass Idol." Mrs. Humphry Ward's new book "Eleanor," is due on November 7. The remaining works in Messrs. Smith Elder's list include "Fifty Years in South Africa," the reminiscences of Sir John Robinson, the first Premier of Natal; Dr. Conan Doyle's "History of the Boer War"; "Thomas Littleton, Fourth Baron of Lilford: A Sketch by his Sister," with an introduction by the Bishop of London; a school edition of Mr. Sidney Lee's "Life of Shakespeare"; an anthology of Anglo-Irish verse, edited by the Rev. Stopford Brooke and T. W. Rolleston; "Biographical Notices of Officers of the Royal (Bengal) Engineers," arranged and compiled by Colonel Sir Edward Thackeray, V.C.; a new volume of "The Poetical Works of Robert Bridges," and novels by Katherine Tynan, Oliver Birrell, Sir William Magnay, and others.

The other week we noticed at some length M. de Maulde de Clavière's volume on "Les Femmes de la Renaissance." An English translation of the work, by Mr. George Herbert Ely, is now issued by Messrs. Sonnenschein. Among the other books coming on October 8 from the same house are "Commerce and Christianity," by the author of "Evil and Evolution"; "Knowledge, Belief, and Certitude," by F. Storrs Turner, a history of the author's religious development; "Atlantis: The Book of the Angels," interpreted by D. Bridgman—a mystical and theosophical work; and a new edition (virtually a new book) of Professor Strasburger's "Handbook of Practical Botany," edited by Professor W. Hillhouse. Next week Messrs. Sonnenschein will publish a little book by H. A. Nisbett, joint author of "Sonnenschein's Science and Art of Arithmetic," on "Inductive Geometry." The same publishers will shortly issue the second volume of Mr. Budgett Meakin's Moorish Series. The first volume, entitled "The Moorish Empire," appeared last year and dealt with Moorish history; the second part gives a general description of the country; the third volume, which will be called "The Moors: a Comprehensive Account of that People," will be ready next spring. Mr. Meakin's work is published simultaneously by the Macmillan Company in the United States. The next volume in the "Social England Series"—"The English Manor," by Professor Vinogradoff—will also appear shortly.

On October 15 Messrs. Sonnenschein will bring out Mr. R. Farquharson Sharp's volume of biographical sketches of great writers—two dozen in all—from Shakespeare to Tennyson, entitled "Architects of English Literature." It is illustrated with facsimiles from MSS., all of which (except the Shakespeare autograph) are in the British Museum. On the same day Messrs. Sonnenschein will also issue Clara Tschudi's life of "The Empress Augusta," translated by E. M. Cope (uniform with the same author's "Marie Antoinette," "Eugénie, Empress of the French," and "Napoleon's Mother"); Dr. C. Keller's "Madagascar, Mauritius, and the other East African Islands," translated by H. A. Nesbitt; "The Science of Civilization; or the Principles of Agricultural, Industrial, and Commercial Prosperity," by C. B. Phipson; and "Christian Names of Evils: their History, Meaning, Associations, and Romance," by Helena Swan. During November will come the "Dictionary of Foreign Quotations (French and Italian)," and the fourth volume of the series, "German and Spanish Quotations," will be ready early next year. November, too, will see the publication of Professor Bickerton's "Romance of the Earth" and "Aristotle's Psychology," including the "Parva Naturalia," translated and edited by Professor Wm. A. Hammond, of Cornell University. Professor Hammond has translated Dr. Max Heinze's "History of Contemporary Philosophy," which forms part of Dr. Heinze's edition, Ueberweg's "Geschichte der Philosophie." Among the other books of Messrs. Sonnenschein are "Seneca's Tragedies"; Text, with a prose translation, by Dr. Walter Bradshaw, R.N.—the only complete English translation, we believe; and "The History of England in Verse," being a collection of ballads, songs, and poems relating to English exploits by land and sea, edited by Mr. Brimley Johnson.

The autumn list of the Cambridge University Press begins with theological announcements. Two will probably appear next week—Savonarola's "Meditations" and the first English edition of the "Thirteen Homilies of St. Augustine on St. John XIV., Joh. Ev. Tractatus, LXVII.-LXXIX.," which forms the Latin subject in the preliminary examination for Holy Orders for the years 1901, 1902. The Latin text of the Homilies is that of the Benedictine edition (Paris, 1830), and there is an English translation by the Chaplain of Trinity College, Cambridge (the Rev. H. F. Stewart), who writes an introduction. "Salisbury Processions and Ceremonies," a fifteenth century MS. formerly in use in that Cathedral Church, and still in the Chapter Library, has been edited by Mr. Christopher Wordsworth, who adds a paper on the topography of Salisbury Cathedral with plan. Other new theological announcements are "The Curetonian Syriac Gospels," re-edited, together with the readings of the Sinaitic Codex and a translation into English, by F. C. Burkitt, M.A., "The Prayer Book of Aldelnald the Bishop, commonly called the Book of Cerne," edited from the MS. Ll. 1. 10 of the Cambridge University Library, with introduction, facsimiles, and appendix, containing MS. Reg. 2A. * * at the British Museum, by Dom A. B. Kuypers, Benedictine of Downside Abbey. In the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges "The Book of Daniel," edited by Dr. Driver, will be ready shortly, and "Psalms, Books IV. and V., XC.-CL.," edited by Dr. Kirkpatrick, is now in the press. Two of the volumes among the Oriental announcements will be ready almost immediately—"Hand-list of Muhammadan MSS. Preserved in the Cambridge University Library," including all those (Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdû, Malay, &c.), which are written in the Arabic character, by E. G. Browne; and Vol. II. of the "Dictionary of the Hausa Language" (English-Hausa), by C. H. Robinson.

Another work to be published by the Cambridge University Press is a volume of "Songs of Modern Greece," with introductions, translations, and notes, by G. F. Abbott, who has endeavoured to exclude any poems previously found in Western Europe. There is nothing further at present to be said regarding the coming "Cambridge Modern History," but Lord Acton is announced as editing, with W. A. J. Archbold, M.A., a volume on "The Teaching of History," among the contributors to which will be Professor Gwatkin, Mr. R. L. Poole, Dr. Cunningham, Mr. Tanner, Mr. Woodward, Mr. Marten, and Professor Ashley. Lord Acton will write an introduction. Among the scientific announcements of the same publishers is a volume on "Advanced Exercises in Practical Physics," by Professor Schuster, and Charles Lees, D.Sc., his assistant director at the Physical Laboratory, Owens College, Manchester. Another new volume is announced for the Cambridge Historical Series—"Canada under British Rule, 1760-1867," by Sir J. G. Bourinot, Clerk of the House of Commons of Canada since 1880. The same publishers will soon have two philosophical volumes ready, "A Critical Exposition of the Philosophy of Leibniz," by Bertrand Russell, M.A., and Part II. of Professor Grote's "Exploratio Philosophica," which is edited by Joseph B. Mayor, M.A. "Francis Hutcheson," by W. R. Scott, M.A., Assistant to the Professor of Moral Philosophy and Lecturer in Political Economy in the University of St. Andrews, is also announced. Among the remaining works which appear in the list for the first time are "Fifteen Studies in Bookkeeping," by Walter W. Snailum; "The Conditions of Travel and Communication, especially in Asia Minor, in the first century after Christ," by Caroline A. J. Skeel; and "The Care of Books: An Essay on the Buildings, Fittings, and General Arrangements of Libraries from Roman Times to the End of the Last Century," by J. W. Clark, M.A., Registrar of the University of Cambridge.

Two theological works by Dr. Edwin A. Abbott are announced by Messrs. A. and C. Black, one being a guide through Greek to Hebrew Scripture, entitled "Clue," and the other being "The Corrections of Mark adopted by Matthew and Luke." The latter "aims at demonstrating that Mark contains a tradition from which, when edited and corrected, Matthew and Luke borrowed independently of each other; and some of these corrections are shown to have arisen from a different interpretation of a Hebrew original, which, when restored, brings the reader closer to historical facts." The same publishers announce a volume of "Christian Conference Essays" by members of various religious denominations, including Professor Auguste Sabatier, the Dean of Ripon, Canon Barnett, Dr. Brooke Herford, the Rev. Brooke Lambert, Dr. Agar Beet, Professor G. Henslow, and Dr. Horton. It is edited by the Rev. A. G. B. Atkinson, rector of Greensted, Essex, and contains an introduction by the Bishop of Hereford.

Among miscellaneous books, Messrs. Black announce the diaries and letters of Captain Boothby, R.E., between the years 1805-1809. Captain Boothby gives his conversations with such men as his chief, Sir John Moore, and Sir Sydney Smith, and his own pen and ink sketches illustrate the book, which is entitled "Under England's Flag." The re-issue of Mr. Carew Hazlitt's "History of the Venetian Republic," to which we referred a fortnight ago, will be ready on October 10. Other books are "The Human Ear: Its Identification and Physiognomy," by Miriam Anne Ellis; "On Sanitary and other Matters," by Dr. George S. Keith; "The Old Senate and the New Monarchy," by Miss F. M. Ormiston ("Historical Latin Readers"); "Athens and Sparta, and the Struggle with Persia," by E. G. Wilkinson, M.A. ("Historical Greek Readers"); and an "Introduction to the Study of Physics," by A. F. Walden, M.A., and J. J. Manley.

The list of books announced by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co., includes a volume of essays by lay members of the Anglican community. It is edited by the Rev. J. Burn, and entitled "Pro Ecclesia et Patria." The same publishers announce a volume of addresses delivered before the University of Oxford by Dean Stubbs, under the title of "The Teaching of the Lord's Prayer"; "Our Reasonable Service," a selection from the writings of Canon Knox-Little; a brief memoir of Richard Elwyn, late Master of the Charterhouse, by the Rev. R. Patterson; "Spiritual Letters of the Rev. J.P. F. Davidson," late Vicar of St. Matthias, Earl's-court, with a short memoir by his son, Arthur F. Davidson; "A Mother in Israel," being the life of Sarah Benney, by Mrs. Perrin, with an introduction by Canon Mason; and a re-issue after many years of the "Memoir of the Life and Episcopate of George Augustus Selwyn," by the Rev. H. W. Tucker. Among gift books Messrs. Wells Gardner have a new volume in hand by Miss Mary Macleod, who follows up her "Stories from the Faerie Queene" by a group of tales from Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," called "The Book of King Arthur and his Noble Knights." The list of new books of adventure is headed by a story of the Egyptian Rebellion under Arabi Pasha, told by Mr. Charles Neufeld, and called "Under the Rebel's Reign." Other volumes are "The Boer's Blunder," a story of the South African veldt, by Mr. Fox Russell; "The Goblin," a tale of the Yorkshire Moors, by Catherine S. and Florence Foster; and a new boy's book, entitled "The White Stone," by Mr. H. C. MacIlwaine.

The American books to be placed by Macmillans on the English market may be mentioned by themselves. They include, besides the two volumes already referred to, "The Peace Conference at the Hague and its Bearings on International Law and Policy," by Frederick W. Holls, D.C.L., a member of the Conference from the United States; "The History of Colonization from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," by Henry C. Morris, formerly United States Consul at Ghent; Volumes III. and IV. of "American History told by Contemporaries," edited by Professor Albert Bushnell Hart; "Extracts from the Sources of English History," edited by Elizabeth K. Kendall; "The Clergy in American Life and Letters," by the Rev. Daniel D. Addison; "The Hoosier Writers," by Meredith Nicholson; a second series of Studies in Literature, including "Studies and Appreciations," by Lewis E. Gates, Assistant Professor of English in Harvard University, and "The Beginnings of Poetry," by Professor Gummere; a new series of Pocket American Classics edited for use in Secondary Schools; "Social Justice: A Critical Essay," by W. W. Willoughby, Associate Professor of Political Science in Johns Hopkins University; "American Supremacy in the World's Politics," by Brooks Adams; "First Experiments in Psychology: A Manual of Elementary Laboratory Practice," by Edward B. Titchener, M.A., in two vols.; "The Teaching of English," by Percival Chubb, and "Foundations of Knowledge," by Professor Alexander T. O. McCosh, both in "The Teachers' Professional Library"; "Early Christian Literature, from Paul to Eusebius," by Professor J. H. Platner; "The History of the Higher Criticism of the New Testament," by Professor Henry S. Nash, and "An Introduction to the Books of the New Testament," by Professor Benjamin W. Bacon, all in the series of New Testament Handbooks, edited by Professor Shailer Mathews; the concluding volume of "The History, Prophecy and the Monuments: or, Israel and the Nations," by Professor James F. McCurdy; "Jesus Christ and the Social Question," by Professor Francis G. Peabody; "Along French Byways," by Clifton Johnson—similar to his volume on "English Hedgerows," published last year; "Spanish Highways and Byways," a volume on the lines of Mr. Clifton Johnson's books, by Miss Katherine Bates, Professor of English in Wellesley College; and a new edition of "A Kentucky Cardinal, and Aftermath," by James Lane Allen, illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

The chief literary announcements in Messrs. Hutchinson's new list are "Thackeray's Stray Papers," edited by Mr. Lewis Melville, and "The Francis Letters: the Letters of the Late Sir Philip Francis and Members of his Family," edited by Beata Francis and Eliza Keary, and now printed for the first time. It will contain a note by Mr. C. F. Keary on the "Junius" controversy. In other respects, perhaps, the greatest of Messrs. Hutchinson's undertakings is the work on "The Living Races of Mankind," the first part of which will be ready on October 8th. Mr. H. N. Hutchinson (no connexion with the firm itself) is responsible for a large part of the book, and is the general editor. Dr. W. J. Gregory deals with the African people, and Dr. Lydekker, who is now engaged in arranging the Anthropological Gallery at the Natural History Museum, deals with the races of North, Central, and South America. Hundreds of photographs from life have been selected from collections both at home and abroad. It will take eighteen fortnightly parts to complete the work. The Far East is represented in the list by "The Story of China," by Mr. Neville P. Edwards. "The Story of Belgium," with a chapter on the Congo Free State, by Mr. Carlyle Smythe, is also announced. "Hero-Patriots of the Nineteenth Century," by Mr. Edgar Sanderson, deals with great national struggles for freedom. The men chosen to illustrate them are Martin Diaz, the guerilla leader of Spain; Hofer of the Tyrol; Bozzaris, Kanaris, and other warriors of the Greek War of Independence; Bolivar, of Venezuela; Abd-el-Kader, of Algeria; Schamyl, of the Caucasus; Manin and Garibaldi, of Italy. "Disciples of Æsculapius," the volume of biographies of the late Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, with a biography of Sir Benjamin by his daughter, again figures in the list. Mr. Baring Gould is down for a volume on "Virgin Saintes and Martyrs," and "Thormanby" for a biographical work of another kind, "Kings of the Rod, the Rifle and the Gun," in two volumes. The names of the sporting celebrities chosen by "Thormanby" include Izaak Walton and Charles Cotton; Wm. Cotton Oswell—whose life, by his son, is being brought out by Mr. Heinemann; Joe Manton, and other famous gun-makers; Alexander Russel, editor of the Scotsman, the late Earl of Stamford, and Landseer and Millais. "William II. of Germany and Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary," by "a lady of distinguished birth and title," who shelters herself under the nom de plume of "La Marquise de Fontenoy," adds two new volumes to "The Secret Memoirs of the Courts of Europe."

Most of Messrs. Hutchinson's forthcoming novels have already been announced in Literature. Among their gift-books will be four volumes by Miss Evelyn Everett Green; "The Ruby Fairy Book," "Fifty-Two Stirring Stories for Boys," "Fifty-Two Stirring Stories for Girls," and "Fifty-Two Stories of the British Empire"; "Fairy Tales from Afar."

Mr. Anthony Hope's "Quisante," which Messrs. Methuen will publish on October 10th, is a story of political life in England at the present day.

Messrs. A. and C. Black announce that the increase in the extent of "Who's Who" for next year, consequent upon the incorporation of "Men and Women of the Time," has necessitated a rise in price from three shillings and sixpence net, to five shillings net. The present handy size will be retained by printing it upon specially thin paper.

"Animal Painters of England," by Sir Walter Gilbey, Bart., will be issued by Messrs. Vinton early in October. The two volumes contain a history of the Lives and Works of Fifty Artists, from the year 1650, with illustrations.

As one of the English studies in the series edited by Dr. Moritz Trautmann, Professor of Philology in the University of Bonn, a work is being issued in Bonn, by Mr. J. T. T. Brown, entitled "The Wallace and the Bruce Restudied," a criticism of the national epics of John Barbour and Blind Harry. An edition for the United Kingdom, limited to 150 copies, will be published by Messrs. Morison Brothers, Glasgow.

During the past eighteen years there has been in preparation a great national work under the supervision of the United States Government dealing with the rebellion. Its full title is the "War of the Rebellion: a Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies." It has cost close upon three million dollars. There will be 128 volumes, consisting of a thousand pages each, and there is a large atlas in thirty-five parts giving in great detail the plans of the battles and campaigns. The work was begun in 1871. Adjutant-General Townsend drew up the plans of the undertaking and proceeded slowly for some three or four years, when a more energetic Secretary for War came into power and gave the work into the hands of one editor who was to devote his whole attention to it. Since then various military men have had charge of this great enterprise.

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., of Boston, announce Dr. Lyman Abbott's book, "The Life and Literature of the Ancient Hebrews"; a popular edition of the works of Thomas Bailey Aldrich, in 7 vols.; a complete volume of the poetical works of Mrs. Browning; also one of Robert Burns; another volumes by John Fiske, "Old Virginia and Her Neighbours"; a seven-volume edition of the works of Thomas Wentworth Higginson, newly arranged and revised by the author; a popular edition of Holmes, in 8 vols.; two new plays by W. D. Howells; "A Prose Translation of Dante's Divina Commedia," by Charles Eliot Norton; a large paper edition of Mr. E. C. Stedman's "An American Anthology."

The Harleian Society has issued to its members another volume of "Musgrave's Obituary," which, commencing at G, ends at K. Vol. IV. is in the press, and Vols V. to VI. in the transcriber's hands. The entire work is edited by Sir George J. Armytage, Bart., F.S.A.

Mr. Eneas Mackay, Stirling, has in preparation a work on "Ancient Scottish Seals," by Dr. Walter de Gray Birch. The volume will have nearly 300 illustrations from special casts in the British Museum.

The fourth volume has just been issued in New York of "The World's Orators," with the sub-title "The Orators of the Reformation." In this volume has been gathered the sermons by no less than seventeen preachers ranging from Wycliff and Massillon. Examples are given from Savonarola, Luther, Calvin, Knox, Latimer, Bossuet, Fenelon.

Messrs. Jarrold announce two translations of novels from the Hungarian—"The Day of Wrath," the eleventh volume in their series of translations from the works of Maurus Jokai, and "St. Peter's Umbrella," a romance from the life of the Magyar peasant by Kalman Mikszath, translated by Mr. B. W. Worswick, with an introduction by Mr. Nisbet Bain.

Mr. Curtis Yorke's new novel is entitled "Carpathia Knox," and gives the story of an English family in Spanish surroundings.

Mr. John Milne announces a new novel by Miss Hannah Lynch entitled "Clare Monro: the Story of a Mother and Daughter."

The fourth and last volume of Mr. Arthur Lovell's Ars Vivendi Series, entitled "Concentration," will be published next month. As an appendix, a free rendering of Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms will be given with original notes.

The Art Annual (the Christmas Number of the Art Journal) for 1900, which will be published next month, will be devoted to the work of war artists in South Africa. Amongst artists whose work will appear will be found Caton Woodville, W. B. Wollen, John Charlton, W. T. Maud, Melton Prior, General Baden-Powell, Mortimer Menpes, Frank Dadd, Frank Craig, Dudley Hardy, W. Hatherell, E. Prater, and others.

The Antiquary for October will contain, among others, articles on The Ordinances of the Gild of Barber Surgeons of Norwich; Notes on some Stone Finds at Killucan, by Rev. W. Falkiner; Harvest Home in Derbyshire, by Thomas Ratcliffe; and King Alfred as a Man of Letters, by Warwick H. Draper.

Books to look out for at once.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Alderman Frank Green, the Lord Mayor-Elect, if he has not himself strayed into the land of letters, is connected by marriage with one whose name as a diligent compiler is held in honour. In 1869 London's forthcoming Chief Magistrate married the only daughter of Joseph Haydn, author of "The Dictionary of Dates," the "Book of Dignities," and the man whose name was taken for the Haydn series of dictionaries. "The Dictionary of Dates," first published in 1841 with 586 pp., and now in its 22nd edition, which contains 1,290 pp. of much smaller type, is well nigh indispensable as a book of reference. The eldest daughter of the Lord Mayor-Elect, who will act as hostess at the Mansion-house, bears the name of her maternal grandfather, and has herself published a book.

The death of Lord Howe reminds us that it was probably his estates in Birmingham which were involved in the suit made famous by Dickens as "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce." The case has been before the Court at frequent intervals during the present century, and the property in litigation belonged, we believe, originally to William Jennens, who died in London in 1798, at the ripe age of ninety-seven. Ten years ago the number of claimants to the estates was at one time given as about four hundred. Thus we realize that Dickens' version is by no means over stated.

The unveiling of Admiral Blake's statue at Bridgwater, which Lord Brassey performed last week, reminds us of the curious fact that Blake, who may well be called the founder of our modern Navy, has not yet found a really adequate biographer. Mr. Hepworth Dixon's life of him was somewhat perfunctory, and Mr. Hannay's little book, excellent as it is, is on too small a scale to be quite satisfactory. We are inclined to think that the task of writing a life of Blake on the scale of Captain Mahan's Nelson would be well repaid by the light that would be thrown on a glorious and important, but still somewhat obscure, part of our naval history.

* * * *

Some may find, in the words with which Dr. Johnson began his short account of Blake's life, a special reason for calling attention to him at the present moment. "At a time," wrote Johnson in 1740, "when a nation is engaged in a war with an enemy whose insults, ravages, and barbarities have long called for vengeance, an account of such English commanders as have merited the acknowledgments of posterity by extending the powers and raising the honour of their country seem to be no improper entertainment for our readers." Blake played a somewhat similar part in our naval war with the Dutch to that which Lord Roberts has played in the campaign against the Boers; he extricated us from an undignified position by totally destroying the Dutch claim to dominion on the high seas.

An amusing correspondence on an interesting point of Shakespeare criticism has been proceeding in a weekly contemporary. It is entitled "Brutus and Max," the former being the hero of Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar, the latter of the Saturday Review. "H. H.," a great admirer of "Max," in that he agrees with him "in nine cases out of ten," has been quite upset during a holiday in the country at the spectacle of "Max" taking himself seriously in a critique of Julius Cæsar. What was most appalling to "H. H." was that the arbiter elegantiarum of the Saturday should have taken the view of the average man. But in so doing we are Philistine enough to believe that he came nearer the truth than does "H. H.," who likes his "Max" to be paradoxical. The chief issue is as follows. The moral drawn by "Max" from Julius Cæsar is "the vanity of idealism in practical affairs"—i.e., in plain language, he thinks that Brutus meant well. "H. H.," on the other hand, regards the motive of the play as the "Nemesis that waits on crime," and calls Brutus a hypocrite. We are inclined to agree with "Max" that this view of Brutus' character, though borne out by Mommsen, was not Shakespeare's. His best argument is that the dramatist would have revealed the real Brutus in his soliloquies had he regarded him as a hypocrite. But is it necessary to look for a central idea, such as the vanity of idealism, in the play? The working out of a given theme which engrosses a Sudermann or an Ibsen was with Shakespeare secondary to the play of character and the diversity of scene. The very variety of his plays tended to rob them of the unity, sought after by lesser dramatists, such as Racine. "Max's" criticism is, we fancy, a little too modern, particularly as he is dealing with one of the historical plays based on facts of history as Shakespeare knew them. Shakespeare adapting the characters of Brutus, Cassius, and the rest probably thought as little of writing a drama with a special motive as Shakespeare creating Shallow or Falstaff.

Lovers of hymnology will find in Good Words of this month an interesting contrast drawn by the Rev. H. M. B. Reid, D.D., between Watts and Wesley. The greatness of Watts (1674-1748) lay in the fact that he was a pioneer—he met a new and rising taste for popular and congregational sacred song, and he was the author of "O God, our help in ages past" and "When I survey the wondrous cross." The curious thing is that he was defective, compared with Wesley, just where we might have expected him to be Wesley's superior. Watts was a Nonconformist minister, the son of a clothier; Wesley an Anglican scholar, of good family. But the true Evangelical note is found in Wesley. "Watts," says Dr. Reid, "is the respectable, staid singer of the middle classes, the bourgeois hymn-writer, so to speak; Wesley is perhaps the aristocrat among hymnists, but he is an aristocrat turned radical, a lover of the people, who finds a passionate joy in teaching peasants and artisans to sing the love of Jesus; a fine gentleman who is at home in the workhouse, the prison, and the lunatic asylum." Wesley was extraordinarily prolific. Neither of these two hymn-writers, indeed, would have subscribed to the maxim that no man is fit to write more than twenty-five to thirty really good hymns; but while Watts was responsible for nearly 600, Wesley wrote 6,500.

The extensive collection of books bequeathed to the British Museum by the late Henry Spencer Ashbee reached Bloomsbury this week. After careful examination by those who possess the requisite knowledge, the Trustees will decide whether or not the gift shall be accepted—little more than a formal matter, in this case, it is to be assumed, for many of the books, rare in themselves, have unique interest by reason of authors' annotations, extra illustrations, and the like. Mr. Ashbee had a passion for books; moreover, being a man of means, he could indulge his fancy without counting the cost. In whatever part of the world he found himself—and he was a great traveller—books attracted him. A life-member of the Bibliographical Society, with a seat on its council, he published through it, in the year 1895, "The Iconography of Don Quixote." The greater number of the books drawn upon for that excellent, succinctly treated work are to be found, we fancy, in the compiler's own library—this Don Quixote assemblage, indeed, forming one of the chief features of the bequest.

* * * *

As a writer, Mr. Ashbee gave us a "Bibliography of Tunisia" from the earliest times down to the end of 1888, "A Ride to Peking," 1881, and in French, which he wrote with almost as much facility as English, "Une Visite à la Bibliothèque de Tangore." In Paris as in London his was a familiar figure in those circles where rare editions are the subject of dignified discussion, and of one such meeting he has left us a reminiscence in "A Dinner of French Bibliophiles," originally published in the "Bibliographer." Books either actually unique or of utmost rarity abound in the Ashbee Library—not Mazarin Bibles, works printed by Caxton or other early printers, such as those possessed by the late Earl of Ashburnham, but scarce modern volumes, many of them detailed in a privately printed bibliography issued under a pseudonym some years ago. These it would be premature to particularize as the collection has not yet been formally accepted on behalf of the nation. At the time of his death Mr. Ashbee was contemplating a second iconography, similar in treatment to the Don Quixote, and members of the Bibliographical Society will regret that this was not completed. Mr. Charles Robert Ashbee, founder of the Guild and School of Handicraft, Whitechapel, is a son of the late collector. From his Press, whence has already been issued in specially designed type "Benvenuto Cellini," "The Pilgrim's Progress," and other works, in limited editions, is shortly to appear a scrupulously printed reissue of Gray's "Elegy," with an illustration of the tomb-stone in Stoke Pogis churchyard, by Mr. George Thomson, coloured by hand.

It is an age of literary memorials, some of them practical, some of them ornamental. So eminently a practical woman as Miss Kingsley deserves one of the former kind. In her memory there is to be a hospital for the treatment and study of tropical diseases, and an endowed organization for the study of native African laws, customs, and beliefs—two admirable objects in which Miss Kingsley took the liveliest interest. The memorial to John Bunyan is of the ornamental kind. A stained glass window has been inaugurated in his memory at St. Saviour's, Southwark, by the Bishop of Rochester. The incident must be regarded as a concession of theology to literature. Though Bunyan was baptized into the Church as by law established, he got hard measure for leaving it—two terms of imprisonment, of six months and twelve years respectively. His amazement would have been great if he could have been aware of the changes brought about by the whirligig of time; he might even have been reminded of the Chinese proposal to "oblate" before the coffin of the German Minister. But, of course, it was the author and not the schismatic whom the Bishop of Rochester and the Dean of Canterbury honoured. It is often claimed that the Church of England realizes the poetry of religion better than the Nonconformists. So it does, in the matter of ritual. In the matter of literature perhaps it may be said that no Anglican approaches the Baptist tinker. A memorial of a lesser kind but quite as useful is the tablet placed by the Society of Arts on the front of No. 54, Hunter-street, W.C., where Ruskin was born.

* * * *

Prebendary Harry Jones was not only a diligent parish priest whose name was more associated with social reform than with doctrinal theology, but also a popular contributor to the magazines. His papers in Fraser's long ago attracted attention, and on the Cornhill he was one of the most constant collaborators of his personal friend, James Payn. He was also a traveller, and had sent letters home to newspapers from Egypt, Palestine, the Sinaitic Peninsula, and America. He even acted as war correspondent for a brief period in 1870. His work was courageous, straightforward, and unconventional, if not conspicuously literary; his unconventionality was, in fact, apparent even in his sermons.

* * * *

Not a day goes by in the book-shops in the Paris boulevards without people being turned away by the booksellers unable to satisfy their request for a copy of M. Rostand's "L'Aiglon." For a year the volume had been promised us. The publisher, M. Fasquelle, distressed, when the poet fell so seriously ill, at the thought of still further delay, and the loss of the immense sale which the book would certainly have commanded during the exhibition year, offered M. Rostand to engage M. Catulle Mendès to read the proofs. But the poet refused, and publisher, bookseller, and public have had to forgo the profits of every sort which might have been theirs but for his scrupulous concern for his own higher interests. He has now gone to Cambo, near Bayonne, to rest and to undertake the work of correcting the proof-sheets of his play.

* * * *

His departure has evoked a capital article in the Journal from the pen of M. Claretie on the first volume of verses published by the author of "L'Aiglon" and "Cyrano de Bergerac," a little book entitled "Musardises," now not to be had for love or money in any Paris book-shop, and not even procurable by M. Lemerre, its publisher. M. Claretie, to whom M. de Feraudy, the actor, and happy possessor of it, has lent this volume, assures his readers that a good prophet at the time would have welcomed in this poet of 20 years the great Rostand of to-day. At that moment, however, M. Rostand himself had no self-confidence, as witness the following lines:—

Je pense à vous, ô pauvres héros,
A vous dont peut-être, ce soir,
Je partagerai les misères,
Parmi lesquels j'irai m'asseoir.

Et très longuement j'envisage
Pour bien voir si j'ai le cœur fort,
Pour m'assurer de mon courage,
La tristesse de votre sort.

Si j'étais, par le ridicule
Qu'on vous jette, mis en émoi,
Il est toujours temps qu'on recule;
Mieux me vaudrait rentrer chez moi.

The title betrayed the gentle précieux, rather than the fighter of the last five years, and a characteristic preface sought to explain to the uninitiated the mysterious felicities of this ancient word, as the name given to his rhymes of 1889. The verses were graceful and easy, as we may see once more from this extract :—

O chevaliers errants de l'art,
A qui la gloire destinée
Manqua peut-être—par hasard,

Etant votre ami, votre frère,
Un rêveur, un hurluberlu
Qui connaitra votre misère
Peut-être demain—j'ai voulu.

Vous dédier par ce poème
Les premiers vers que j'ai tentés,

But he would have been veritably a Cuvier among the critics who from these slight documents should have ventured to forecast the career of the author of "Cyrano de Bergerac."

English playwrights jealously guard the secrets of the plots of their forthcoming productions, and, judging by a recent controversy, it would seem to be a wise precaution. Their German colleagues, however, are more generous, and the story of Sudermann's new play, Johannisfeuer, already forms the subject of paragraphs in German newspapers. It is a domestic drama the action of which passes in the eighties. The scene is laid on an East Prussian estate. Vogelreuter, the well-to-do owner, is about to give his daughter in marriage to the son of the man whose name he has saved from dishonour, but at the last moment her lover is stolen from her by a Polish girl whom Vogelreuter had adopted out of charity. The hard, self-centred character of Vogelreuter—seemingly a little like that of Schwartz in "Heimat"—in some degree accounts for the calamity, but further criticism is impossible until the play is printed or performed.

The head of the police at Berlin has had his hands full of late. The Emperor has through him forbidden the performance of a drama by Adolf Rosée entitled Saint Germain, of which the hero is the Great Elector. A German critic suggests that no member of the Hohenzollern family may be represented on the Prussian stage except by permission of the landed aristocracy. The public recitation of Ernst von Wildenbruch's ballad, "Das Hexenlied," is also forbidden, as well as a farce by Blumenthal and Kadelburg mocking at the lex Heinze.

The Elizabethan Literary Society's session, which has just begun, seems to promise much interest. Here is their list of lectures :—Nov. 7th—"Shakespeare and Ibsen," by Richard F. Backwell. Dec. 5th—"Tom D'Urfey," by William G. Hutchison. Jan. 9th, 1901—"Some Plays Falsely Assigned to Shakespeare," by Sidney Lee. Feb. 6th—"The Elizabethan Revival of Surgery in England," by D'Arcy Power, F.R.C.S. March 6th—"Certain Peculiarities in the Style of the Poetry of the Eighteenth Century," by W. Blake Odgers, Q.C. April 3rd—"Robert Greene," by J. Churton Collins. April 17th—"The Satirical Element in Ben Jonson," by W. Francis Aitken. May 1st—A paper, by Miss Grace Latham. The lectures are given at Toynbee-hall at 8 p.m.

The London School of Economics and Political Science begins its operations for the Michaelmas Term on October 8. Mr. W. A. S. Hewins, the director, and Mr. Cannan take lectures on the theory and history of Economics. Mr. Lowes Dickinson deals with the Modern State and the Government of the British Empire. International Law, a subject of increasing importance, is in the hands of Mr. E. A. Whittuck. There are also to be series of lectures on the English Manor, on Commercial Policy, Banking, Railways, and Industrial Law and Public Finance, and the Housing Problem. Local Government and municipal enterprise both here and abroad are to be dealt with in lectures by Mr. S. Webb, Mr. Cannan, and Mr. P. W. L. Ashley. Sir Alfred Lyall gives a course of lectures on Indian Administration, and Mr. Graham Wallas on "The Development of Central Government in England since 1763."

Poets and Public Affairs.

Sir Walter Besant is indignant—and very properly indignant—because, when the statement was made that Mr. Rudyard Kipling had been invited to stand for the County Council, a Brighton reporter offered a criticism in the words "Great Scott!" This colloquial invocation of the shade of another great nineteenth century poet had no merit as a criticism save its convenient brevity. The author of it knew that Mr. Kipling was a poet—a fact of which he will find fresh proof in this number of Literature—and he desired to express in forcible language his opinion that poets are "feckless" persons unfit to be trusted with the conduct of public affairs. Against that view Sir Walter Besant protested, and we propose to endorse the protest, giving reasons for our faith. The first appeal is naturally to history ; and history is full of the names of poets, both major and minor, who have held political appointments and discharged their duties competently, and in some instances with conspicuous success. There have been failures among them, of course—both Burns and Thomas Moore were failures—but the record, on the whole, is brilliant, from the time of Chaucer to the present day. The father of English poetry, though the Brighton reporter may not know it, was a knight of the shire for Kent, was sent on five diplomatic missions to different parts of the Continent, and held various public offices. Spenser, the next poet of eminence in our annals, was secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and advocated the policy of coercion in pamphlets at the very time when he was engaged upon the composition of "The Faerie Queene." Since then there have been many other instances, both in England and abroad, of the same sort of thing. The author of "Faust" became a Privy Councillor, and the author of "The Revolutionary Epic" whom our reporter may or may not be able to identify with Benjamin Disraeli—became a Prime Minister. It was a poet—the head of the romantic school, Alphonse Marie Louis de Lamartine—who, being French Foreign Minister after the Revolution of 1848, withered the extremists with the memorable phrase, "Le tricolore a fait le tour du monde : votre drapeau rouge n'a fait que le tour du Champs de Mars." There have been poets holding permanent appointments in the Civil Service, from Joseph Addison, Commissioner for Trade and the Colonies, to Mr. Austin Dobson and Mr. Edmund Gosse ; and Victor Hugo was a mayor. There have been many poets in the diplomatic service, from Matthew Prior, who represented Queen Anne at Paris, to "Owen Meredith," who represented Queen Victoria at the same capital, James Russell Lowell, and Mr. Reginald Reid. It is a goodly list, though not exhaustive even with the name of Milton added to it. We doubt if a stronger list could be compiled out of any other class of the community more generally credited with the talents requisite for the conduct of practical matters. Solicitors, for instance, would make a much poorer show, though solicitors are reputed to be shrewd and are certainly more numerous. History, therefore, does not by any means support the idea that poets are persons to be disbowed out of the way whenever there is any important practical business to be done, and we do not think that common sense supports it either. Poets may be somewhat given to mismanaging their own affairs ; but that is a weakness which they share with such very prosaic politicians as Pitt and Richard Cobden. On the other hand, they do bring the faculty of imagination to bear upon the practical problems to which they have to address themselves, and imagination is a valuable factor in statesmanship. It was because he had imagination, and was a poet, that Lamartine could check a threatened revolution with an epigram, and that the Earl of Beaconsfield gave a charm to the Imperial idea which it certainly does not derive from the commercial and prosaic utterances of many other supporters of an Imperial policy.

THE YOUNG QUEEN.

. . . Some of us may have been unaware to what perfection those fruits have been already matured in the virgin soil of Australia, but if there was surprise in any quarter it was pleasurable surprise. The whole country felt a thrill of pride as the work of her sons was revealed to her, and revealed to her at a time when the ties between her and them had been newly consecrated by common effort and by common sacrifice in a righteous cause.—The Times.

Her hand was still on her sword-hilt—the spur was still on her heel—
She had not cast her harness of grey war-dinted steel:
High on her red-splashed charger, beautiful bold and browned,
Bright-eyed out of the battle, the Young Queen rode to be crowned.

And she came to the Old Queen's presence, in the Hall of Our Thousand Years—
In the Hall of the Five Free Nations that are peers among their peers:
Royal she gave the greeting, loyal she bowed the head,
Crying:—"Crown me, my Mother!" And the Old Queen stood and said:—

"How can I crown thee further? I know whose standard flies
"Where the clean surge takes the Leeuwin or the notched Kaikouras rise.
"Blood of our foes on thy bridle and speech of our friends in thy mouth—
"How can I crown thee further, O Queen of the Sovereign South?

"Let the Five Free Nations witness!" But the Young Queen answered swift:—
"It shall be crown of Our crowning to hold Our crown for a gift.
"In the days when Our folk were feeble thy sword made sure Our lands—
"Wherefore We come in power to beg Our crown at thy hands."

And the Old Queen raised and kissed her, and the jealous circlet prest,
Roped with the pearls of the Northland and red with the gold of the West—
Lit with her land's own opals, levin-hearted, alive,
And the five-starred Cross above them, for sign of the Nations Five.

So it was done in the Presence—in the Hall of Our Thousand Years—
In the face of the Five Free Nations that have no peer but their peers;
And the Young Queen out of the Southland kneeled down at the Old Queen's knee
And asked for a mother's blessing on the excellent years to be.

And the Old Queen stooped in the stillness where the jewelled head drooped low:
"Daughter no more but Sister, and doubly Daughter so—
"Mother of many princes—and child of the child I bore,
"What good thing shall I wish thee that I have not wished before?

"Shall I give thee delight in dominion—rash pride of thy setting forth?
"Nay, we be women together—we know what that lust is worth.
"Peace on thy utmost borders and strength on a road untrod?
"These are dealt or diminished at the secret will of God.

"I have swayed troublous councils—I am wise in terrible things—
"Father and son and grandson I have known the heart of the Kings.
"Shall I give thee my sleepless wisdom or the gift all wisdom above?
"Ay, we be women together—I give thee thy people's love:

"Tempered, august, abiding, reluctant of prayers or vows,
"Eager in face of peril as thine for thy mother's house.—
"God requite thee, my Sister, through the strenuous years to be,
"And make thy people to love thee as thou hast loved me!"

Personal Views.

THE LITERATURE OF SOCIETY, PAST & PRESENT.

"Read," says Bacon, "not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider." Excellent advice to the student, but tried by this standard it would perhaps be necessary for society, commonly so called, to put in a plea for mercy. It hardly finds time to weigh and consider, it reads too much of all sorts to be over-apt to believe and take for granted, it may have an inclination to contradict if not to confute, while it would be difficult to acquit it of a tendency "to find talk and discourse." After all a number of persons constantly thrown together and seeking relaxation in each other's society may as well find part of their talk and discourse in current literature as in scandal or even in politics. At the time when "Robert Elsmere" was discussed at every dinner-table a rising young statesman declared that he had purposely refrained from reading it as the confession of ignorance saved him half-an-hour at the beginning of each conversation. Presumably he wished to vary his gambits, otherwise one hardly sees to what profounder purpose he destined these rescued half-hours.

If we would compare the present with the past we must search the collections in country houses outside the dignified shelves of the "Library." The apartment thus designated contains the big folios and quartos which Crabbe declares "Are much admired, and are but little read," though their beautiful engravings often repay examination; standard works now studied in editions more portable though less gorgeous; and a host of smaller books, sometimes very amusing, but oftener so badly printed that modern eyesight retires discomfited. Go into the living rooms and bed rooms, however, if your ancestors have been kind enough to supply these with book-shelves, and you will discover quaint stores of books which look as if people really did read them—old-fashioned travels, essays, poems, memoirs, and, above all, novels. After turning over their pages one is tempted to exclaim "plus cela change, plus c'est la même chose." True the heroines of the novels were more sentimental, the heroes more boisterous, the travellers were more leisurely, the poems longer and more didactic, but underlying all the same demand is met by much the same supply. Readers wanted to have their own thoughts translated into language more or less epigrammatic, they wished to flatter themselves that a smattering of science and philosophy was leading them to daring speculation, and they were by no means displeased when the moralist told them how wicked the world was growing, and what a dreadful catastrophe would ensue if they did not mend their manners. They liked to read about fresh places, and they enjoyed biographies of people they had known themselves or who had known their grandfathers and grandmothers. There seems sometimes an idea that subsequent to Fielding and Smollett and prior to, and contemporary with, Walter Scott, the fashionable novel-reader was limited to Mrs. Radcliffe, Miss Ferrier, Miss Edgeworth, and Miss Austen, and an amusing writer discoursing on the "Decay of Sensibility" seems disposed to take the two last named ladies as priestesses of the Sentimental School. To those who have dipped into Mrs. West, Laetitia Matilda Hawkins, and other writers of the first decade of the nineteenth century, Miss Edgeworth (as for instance in "L'Amie Inconnue") was rather the Cervantes who laughed the romantic young woman off the stage, while Elizabeth Bennet and Catherine Morland were monsters of insensibility in comparison with the heroine of Mrs. West's entertaining "Tale of the Times," who writes thus to her lover:—

> If I ever appear to forget your generous behaviour, add to the list of those infamous women of antiquity whom you have so often reprobated, the more infamous name of Geraldine Powerscourt, who basely neglected the disinterested friend who risked all his fairest hopes to alleviate her sorrows.

The excellent Hannah More begs the "timid young lady not to start" if she recommends her to substitute "Watts' or Duncan's little book of Logic" and others of the kind for "so much English sentiment, French philosophy, Italian love songs, and fantastic German imagery and magic wonders" in which society of her day seems to have delighted. But, alas, not society alone horrified the good lady by its inclination both to read and to write novels.

> Not only [she laments] among milliners, mantua-makers, and other trades where numbers work together, the labour of one girl is frequently sacrificed that she may be spared to read these mischievous books to the others; but she has been assured by clergymen who have witnessed the facts that they are procured and greedily read in the wards of our hospitals!

Almost all the writers, whether novelists, poets, or professed moralists, who wrote with the spectacle of revolutionary France before their eyes seem to have been terribly alarmed for the effect on the English mind of everybody's writings save their own. The ingenious author of the "Pursuits of Literature," stated to have been T. S. Mathias, can hardly find a good word for anybody, but of all the sinners who were likely to contaminate a susceptible age he most severely castigates M. G. Lewis, the author of "The Monk," better known by his collection of "Tales of Wonder."

Danger to religion was also feared from the hospitality shown by many landowners to the exiled French ecclesiastics.

> Lo, confessors in every hamlet found,
> With sacred sisters walk their cloistered round;

exclaims the anxious if somewhat unmetrical poet. But deeper than all these the sturdy guardians of British virtue sought the source and origin of evil in "La Nouvelle Héloïse." Begin almost any work you please, except the high-flown historical novel, and you will come back to that dangerous undermining of domestic bliss, that false sentimentalist, Jean-Jacques Rousseau. You would think that you were perusing the seathing denunciations of an English Nordau, and would wonder that the degeneration which had evidently set in over a century ago had not yet culminated in utter destruction.

We must hurry past the age of Byron and the Lake Poets, only pausing to glance at an eminently society novel, "Glenarvon," in which Lady Caroline Lamb gave her own romantic version of her affection for Lord Byron. He is Glenarvon and she Calantha. Her husband, William Lamb, is Lord Avondale, and amongst the well-known people introduced under fictitious names Lady Holland appears as the Princess of Madagascar. Probably the unveiling of these portraits afforded as much amusement as later guesses at the prototypes of the characters in "Vivian Grey," and "Lothair."

Classes and masses alike were wooed and won by Dickens, Thackeray and George Eliot, by Tennyson and Browning, by Carlyle, Macaulay, and Ruskin, nor did Science remain altogether cold to Darwin, Huxley, and Herbert Spencer.

One Sunday evening, not long ago, a rather large party in a country house was asked to decide on the ten novels best worthy of preservation. Each made his or her selection, and the novel was considered chosen which appeared in the greatest number of lists. "Vanity Fair" came out easily first, and "Pride and Prejudice" a good second. This goes to prove that the old favourites are not forgotten, yet it is difficult to estimate the progress of taste among what are commonly called the "leisured classes." It must be remembered that the number of persons roughly embraced in these classes has enormously increased, and that education, whether or not more effectual than half-a-century ago, is at all events more systematized. Apart from the multiplicity of periodicals it is a recognized custom to have books lying about everywhere, and they are so cheap, and published in such attractive forms, that there is no excuse for their absence. Moreover, they figure largely among the presents interchanged in the present day, and no question is oftener asked than "Can you tell me of a good book?" It is needless to dilate on the well-known fashions in literature, but it is a cause for hearty congratulation that novels dealing with certain social problems are at a discount. Stories of adventure have been rather overdone, and the taste for slum and "kail-yard" tales was perhaps a little artificial. Theological novels, on the other hand, vary in character, but will probably be always with us.

To-day a good many French and a few German and Italian novels are read. French memoirs, and such books as those of Lucien Percy, are always popular, and foreign works on art highly esteemed. It is, however, doubtful whether the perusal of foreign literature has increased in proportion to the circulation of other books. One reason may be that, though people travel far more than formerly, facilities for extended tours have so largely increased that a run on the Continent, or to the East, or a sojourn in an English colony on the Riviera, is generally substituted for such residence in a foreign city as entailed mixing in the society, often literary, of the place. This is too wide a subject for our limits, but one not devoid of interest. During the present year the three books most frequently named in conversation have perhaps been Sir H. Maxwell's "Wellington," Miss Cholmondeley's "Red Pottage," and Mr. Wilkins' "Love of an Uncrowned Queen." All are well written and entertaining, and cannot be said to minister to a decadent taste.

As for poetry, it has recently had a distinctly martial tendency, and some of it—notably that of our Kipling—has been more fortunate than the muse of the following anecdote:—

> Mr. Pye, the present Poet Laureate, with the best intentions at this momentous period (1795), if not with the very best poetry, translated the verses of Tyrtæus the Spartan.* They were designed to produce animation throughout the kingdom, and among the Militia in particular. Several of the reviewing generals (I do not mean the monthly or critical) were much impressed with their weight and importance, and at a board of general officers an experiment was agreed upon, which unfortunately failed. They were read aloud at Warley Common and at Barham Downs by the adjutants, at the head of five different regiments, at each camp, and much was expected. But before they were half finished all the front ranks, and as many of the others as were within hearing or verse-shot, dropped their arms suddenly, and were all found fast asleep. Marquis Townshend, who never approved of the scheme, said with his usual pleasantry that the first of all poets observed that "Sleep is the brother of Death."

THE LONDON OF CHAUCER.*

In a brief time we shall be celebrating the 500th anniversary of Geoffrey Chaucer's death. London claims the poet as her son, and the claim is disputed by few competent authorities. Moreover, if no conclusive evidence on this point can be found in Chaucer's writings, a passage in "The Testament of Love" points to the affection with which he regarded "the Citie of London, that is to mene soo deare and swete, in which I was foorth grown; and more kindely love have I to that place than to any other in yerth, as every kindely creature hath full appetite to that place of his kindely ingendure."

THE PALACE OF BRIDEWELL.

And what manner of place was this London wherein, as we shall assume, Chaucer was born, along whose every highway he trod a hundred times, and a mile or so without whose walls—for not till long afterwards did Westminster form an integral part of the metropolis—he died on October 25, 1400? Happily, there is continuity in the life of a city as in that of an individual, and, all too few as are the landmarks which have come down to us from the fourteenth century, we have but to look with eager, earnest eye to discern behind the London of to-day, glimpses at any rate of the London divided from us by ten thousand yesterdays. Here the name of a street or district, there a religious pile which has withstood the storms of centuries, again a fragment of ancient architecture, or perhaps even the murmur of Thames waters as they slide seaward, may serve to call up a picture, a dream, of Chaucer's London.

For many there is no such thing as poetic justice, but in this connexion we may note what, in any case, is a curious coincidence. Would you discover the site of the house wherein Chaucer is deemed to have been born about 1340, you must go to Thames Street and stand beneath the railway bridge across which modern travellers—strange successors of Chaucer's pilgrims—are borne in their thousands to Canterbury. John Chaucer, the poet's father, was a citizen and vintner, and a member by necessity—for no one was permitted to carry on trade save under the regulations of a guild—of the Society of "Vintoners," unrecognized by letters patent till 1364, although their origin dates much further back. In Chaucer's day, in the reign of Edward I., the Thames-side hereabouts was beset with cooks' houses, the cooks who dressed meat but sold no wine; but thereafter "faire and large houses with vaults and cellars" were built, for the greater convenience of those who followed the lucrative calling of the vintner. It must be remembered that in the fourteenth century sort of wine, highly esteemed when it was new, came from Rhenish, Portugal, Bordeaux, and elsewhere. Possibly in his own house on the river-side Henry Picard, vintner, entertained in 1363 the King's personages; and maybe Chaucer's father, if not the poet himself, was one of the guests. This entertainment, whereat, as we know from Stowe, dice and hazards were the games, and whereat the King of Cyprus lost his temper as well as his gold, is said to have originated the toast "five times five." Of a thousand other penalties meted out to those who violated regulations, one may be cited. In 1364 a vintner, who sold unwholesome wine, here and there perhaps, was compelled to drink some of his liquor, the residue of which was poured over him.

We have said that the life of London possesses continuity, and what more striking proof of this could be adduced than by pointing to the fact that the City's central building to-day on the same site, bears the same name, is associated with the same traditions, as in Chaucer's time. Then as now the cathedral church of St. Paul's, not Wren's edifice that we know, but that older pile with tower in centre which we connect with many a stirring scene, stood on the eminence within the Ludgate. With its hundreds of officers, from bishop and dean and archdeacons, to bookbinder, baker, and brewer, its palace, its chapter-house, its cloisters, St. Paul's stood as the foremost representative of that ecclesiasticism which, despite worldliness and indifference on the part of monk or prelate, still had a firm hold on the mass of the people at the time of which we speak.

Ingress to the City could be gained only, of course, through the gates in the stout London wall, whose names survive in Ludgate, Moorgate, Aldgate, and the rest. It was a city composed of great religious settlements, of the palaces and mansions of nobles and wealthy merchants, of picturesque tenements of wood and plaster, with open shops or stalls on the ground floor, whence the prentices were ever eager to issue, and abandon fashioning or crying of wares, to take part in pageant or merry-making. Where now stands Printing-house-square the Dominican or Black Friars had their home, and here, in a precinct of their own, enclosed by its wall, they sumptuously entertained the King. Chaucer's friend, the "philosophical Strode," that learned and travelled monk of Jedburgh Abbey, of whom we know so little—the conjecture that he was tutor to one of Chaucer's sons is not credited—and to whom with "the moral Gower" "Troilus and Cressida" is dedicated, was one of these Dominicans. Close by, the thick walls of Baynard's Castle shadowed the river; on the other side the Fleet was the Palace of Bridewell; further on the church of St. Brigid or Bride; the domain of the White Friars; the place whence the Templars had been driven; the sumptuous home of the Duke of Lancaster, John of Gaunt (friend and patron of the poet) at the Savoy; until, passing the palaces of other powerful nobles, with gardens running down to the Strand of the Thames, by and by one came to the King's house at Westminster.

One of the few certainties in connexion with Chaucer's life in London is that in the year 1374 he was granted a lease of the Matilda, and one of the most glorious, powerful, and wealthy settlements of the kind in London. An insignificant arch of its outbuildings was recently discovered in Duke-street, Aldgate. In the Minories was the settlement of the Clare Sisters; close by, the Priory of the Crossed or Crutched Friars; and, in a north-westerly direction, the Nunnery of St. Helen, Bishopsgate—part of whose ground was purchased by Sir John Crosby for the building of Crosby-hall, where Sir Thomas More lived and wrote; the domain of the Austin Friars; the home of the Augustine Canons of St. Martin's le Grand; that of the Minorites' or Grey Friars', where now stands Christ's Hospital; Sir Walter Manny's "House of the Salutation of the Mother of God"; the Carthusian monastery with which, as the Charterhouse School of later times, we associate Addison, Thackeray, and many more; Rahere's ancient church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, by whose command, communicated in vision, it was built; and a dozen other historically interesting piles within and without the city walls.

It was, then, in a London studded with fine priory churches and green with walled-in gardens; of for the most part unpaved streets hung with swinging signs or alestakes, where the inn, or town residence, of this country prior or that noble was flanked by the high-pitched roof and gables, the projecting upper storeys, of the trader; of narrow thoroughfares breaking occasionally into wide spaces like that which surrounded St. Paul's—it was in and about such a London that Chaucer moved with downcast albeit strangely observant eyes. And the London of Chaucer was also, be it remembered, the London of John Gower, who, meeting the King as he sailed on the Thames, afterwards wrote the "Confessio Amantis" at the Royal request, of "Long John" Langland, author of "Piers the Ploughman," of John Lydgate, who did not enter the Benedictine Monastery at Bury St. Edmunds until after Chaucer's death, and of Thomas Occleve or Hoccleve.

Of the people of his day Chaucer has left us a series of faithful, vivid pictures. They are drawn from life by a man who lived among them, and whose genius has mirrored them for all time. Mine host of the Tabard, a study, mayhap, of one of the poet's own relatives; the true knight, who seldom doffed his armour, of so chivalrous a bearing; the young squire in the sumptuous apparel adopted by the wealthy of his day—there were stringent regulations against the lower classes aping those of higher station; the Oxford clerk in threadbare coat, "lean as a rake," a simple, godly man; the monk, who cared little for things eternal so long as he might eat and drink to his heart's content, a great sportsman and a judge of horseflesh; the doctor of physic, a member of the Barber Surgeons' Guild, dressed in red Persian silk; the Serjeant-at-Law, in scarlet gown and white hood, come it may be from a moote held in the portico or paradise of the cathedral; the Lady Eglantine, sweet and dignified and charming, on her way to one or other of the nunneries; the bullet-headed miller; the merchant in Flemish beaver and boots with handsome clasps; the town parson and the summoner; the hypocritical pardoner, never without a store of sham relics; the limitour, the cook, the wife of Bath—these, and all the other pilgrims who set out from the Tabard for Canterbury, Chaucer noted as he rambled about the streets and alleys, the priories and palaces, the river bank and the adjacent meadows.

We could have wished that in addition to his long and representative gallery of living, breathing folk he had bequeathed to us some word-pictures of old London. But it is less difficult to recreate the town than its population, and he chose the better part.

THE CHAUCER EXHIBITION AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The authorities of the British Museum would have been lacking in enterprise had they permitted the 500th anniversary of the death of "Britain's first poet, famous old Chaucer," to pass without recognition. So far from this being the case, an instructive series of Chaucer's works has been arranged in the King's Library. The first two cases contain nineteen MS. volumes, and a book of coloured reproductions of the Tellers of the Canterbury Tales, copied from the MS. in the library of the Earl of Ellesmere. Chaucer died in the last year of the fourteenth century, and seventy-seven years elapsed before William Caxton—who, coming from Bruges, established his press at Westminster within a stone's throw of the spot where Chaucer rested—laid the foundation stone of printing in this country, probably by the issue of the "Dicts and Sayings of the Philosophers." For long, then, Chaucer's poems remained in manuscript, and hence arose those variations which caused Dr. F. J. Furnivall to issue in 1868 a six-text edition, to which all students now go for authentic information.

The first volume in Case 1 is a fifteenth century MS. of the Canterbury Tales of the C (orpus) type, which is one of those used for the six-text edition. It has illuminated borders, and is open at the Prologue, the initial letter of which is decorated with a portrait of Chaucer, standing, open book in hand. Next comes Thomas Occleve's poem, "De Regimine Principum," with the familiar portrait of his friend and master exposed to view. The third volume is a MS. copy of the Canterbury Tales of type B. (Harleian), this text having been printed for the Chaucer Society in 1885. Thereafter we find an imperfect example of the A. type, acquired by the British Museum from the library of the late Earl of Ashburnham. Of the D. type, resembling Caxton's editions, is an example with the page open at the Clerk of Oxford's Tale, that story of patient Griselda, which "he learned at Padow of a worthi clerk," "Fraunceys Petrark the Laureate Poete." Special note must be made of a copy of "Troilus and Cressida," some of the marginal notes of which are possibly by the poet himself. The MSS. include, too, some of the minor poems, the "Complaint to his Purse," for instance, addressed to Henry IV. in 1399, probably the last thing written by Chaucer.

For the majority of people, perhaps, the printed books will have an even greater appeal, and this because the earliest of them are associated with William Caxton, Richard Pynson, and Wynkin de Worde. As has been said, the first book known with certainty to have been printed in England is the "Dicts and Sayings" in 1477, but experts agree that although not issued until about a year afterwards, the first edition of the Canterbury Tales must have been begun immediately after Caxton set up his press. Of this book two perfect copies only are known, that now to be seen at the British Museum, from the library of George III., and that in the library of Merton College, Oxford. In 1896 an example lacking two leaves realized £1,880. Another lacking nineteen leaves, £1,020. In 1897, again, the still more imperfect Ashburnham copy made £720. The earlier printed log on view in Bloomsbury is worth a fabulous sum, although, if we are not mistaken, it was purchased in 1775 for no more than £47 15s. The second printed Chaucer is Caxton's edition, circa 1484, illustrated, and with revised text. There follow the third edition of the Tales, printed by Richard Pynson, circa 1492, regarded as the first production of his press, and the fourth edition, bearing the imprint of Wynkin de Worde and no date 1498, both of these being based on Caxton's second issue. The Ashburnham copy of the Wynkin de Worde, deemed by the collector to be the only perfect one, made £1,000. In 1486 Caxton printed the "Book of Fame" and somewhat earlier "Troilus and Cressida." These are exhibited, as is also Wynkin de Worde's 4to issue (1517) of the last named work. This latter copy formed part of the Ashburnham library, at the dispersal of which it was bought for £110. A quaint woodcut therefrom was reproduced in that fascinating volume, "C.C.C. Notable Books," privately issued to commemorate Dr. Garnett's Keepership of the British Museum Library.

It was in 1526 that Pynson began to reprint, in three parts, the first collected edition of Chaucer's works. Other editions followed in 1532, 1561, 1598, 1602, 1687, and 1721, specimens of each of which may be studied in the King's Library. In 1721 Lintot published the "worst edition ever printed," although the initial illustration, showing the mounted pilgrims setting out from the Old Tabard Inn, possesses undoubted fascination. The most scholarly issue of Chaucer's works procurable until comparatively recent times was the edition for which Thomas Tyrwhitt is responsible, issued with dissertations, notes, and glossary, 1775-78. Taking full advantage of the results of Tyrwhitt's labours, Dr. Furnivall, after much original research, and heedful of the knowledge accumulated during a whole century, edited in 1868 the six-text print of the Canterbury Tales. Crowning the whole series at the British Museum is the Kelmscott Chaucer, printed in Gothic character by William Morris. It is open at those fine pages, surrounded by Morris' rose border, and decorated by two woodcuts after designs by his friend Burne-Jones, on the first of which the Romance of the Rose comes to an end, while on the second the Parliament of Fowls begins. It is appropriate that William Morris, who has not altogether inaptly been called the Chaucer of modern times, should have left us this book as his greatest achievement in the craft whose development owes so much to him. The British Museum authorities are to be cordially congratulated on exhibiting so excellently their unrivalled collection of Chaucer.

LIBRARIANS IN CONFERENCE.

The twenty-third annual meeting of the Library Association, which took place at Bristol last week, was notable for the many interesting local papers contributed, for the practical line taken on most subjects, and for the hospitality shown to the visitors by the city authorities and others, both in Bristol and Bath. Sir Edward Fry's successful opening address we have already commented on. The Librarian of Bristol, Mr. Norris Mathews, fittingly contributed the first paper on the growth of the public library movement in the city; Dr. C. W. Kimmins, secretary of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, spoke on Lectures under the Public Libraries Acts, and Mr. C. F. Normand expounded the establishment of Readers' Unions in the public libraries, giving particulars of a successful effort in this direction in connexion with the Students' Free Library at Tottenham.

Many divergent opinions were expressed on the two latter papers. Mr. William Bailey held that, since newspapers were so cheap as to be within the purchasing power of all, the subscription was no longer a necessity and might be withdrawn for books and lectures. Possibly Sir William's experience as governor of the new John Rylands Library at Manchester may have led him to this conclusion. The matter was put forward at the meeting last year when pleading for Ward Club-rooms, where the people could read the papers, smoke, and be provided with billiard tables. The vice-chairman of the Manchester Public Libraries deplored the mass of "worthless literature" taken out by the public, which sounded rather like an indictment of himself and his colleagues for having anything worthless in their libraries. As to providing extra means of teaching, the general impression appeared to be that as long as public libraries were restricted in expenditure to the proceeds of a penny or halfpenny rate, they could not add to their responsibilities, or reduce the funds available for books and maintenance.

On the Wednesday the first paper was by Mr. T. Aldred, Librarian of St. George-the-Martyr, Southwark, on the subject of "Book Selection and Rejection." He did not indicate the metaphysical distinction between selection and rejection, nor did he enunciate any strikingly original points, but his remarks, which covered practically the whole science and art of librarianship, provoked a long discussion. The opinions expressed revealed the fact that a great deal of trust, perhaps overmuch, was placed in the opinions of reviewers. One speaker suggested that no novel should be placed in a public library until it had been two years out of the press, but the audience did not take this proposal seriously. The talk finally resolved itself into a symposium on library committees. It appeared that these were not all that could be desired, and that sometimes their views on selection were diametrically opposed to those of the librarians. Considering the composition of such bodies, there must always be some friction in matters of literary judgment. Many representatives of the ratepayers only regard the library from a commercial standpoint.

Other papers of interest were one on Picture Galleries in relation to Public Libraries, by Mr. A. G. Temple, Director of the Guildhall Art Gallery, who advocated the establishment of art libraries, and as a first practical step named a list of works which would serve as a nucleus; and Mr. C. T. Macaulay's paper on the literary associations of Bath, which showed a long line of famous inhabitants, including Wolsey, Laud, Ken, Prynne, &c. At Bath, where the members were entertained at luncheon by the Mayor, the ancient charters of the city were exhibited and described by Mr. Austin King. Bath had been much more fortunate in preserving its records than the neighbouring city of Bristol. On the discussion of the annual report the council's proposal that some at least of the monthly meetings hitherto held in or near London should take place at provincial library centres was approved. Mr. T. Webb Williams' paper on the "Medieval Libraries of Bristol and the Vicinity" was a valuable contribution, giving much information about the MSS. and books which were dispersed from the different monastic collections. Mr. S. Smith (Sheffield) in a paper on "Masonic Libraries" had gathered together many particulars about the Lodge Libraries and other collections both in England and America, and stated that there were Masonic literary societies in connexion with nearly all. It was a pity that want of time necessitated several papers being taken as read, particularly three from different standpoints on cataloguing and classification. English librarians have not yet secured that uniformity of method which in the United States has established a system of co-operative cataloguing upon recognized lines. Another paper taken as read was by Mr. J. Y. W. MacAlister and Dr. W. G. Savage on the "Risk of Contracting Infectious Disease from Library Books." It was comforting to learn from an abstract of the paper that as a result of bacteriological experiments there was no cause for alarm, except it might be to those guilty of the pernicious habit of licking finger and thumb when turning pages. We may hope that such abusers of books, and they are far too numerous, will take due warning. Throughout the visit much enjoyable relaxation from business was provided, and visits were paid to many interesting churches and other ancient buildings, to the principal manufactories of the city, and the docks at Avonmouth, while excursions were made on Friday to various places of interest in the vicinity.

THE DRAMA.

"THE WEDDING GUEST."

In writing a first-night "notice" of The Wedding Guest in a morning journal, after devoting the greater part of my space to considering the character of the heroine, Margaret Fairbairn, I omitted to say that the part was played by Miss Dorothea Baird. I was quite unconscious of the omission until I read the newspaper and then I could scarcely believe my eyes, the blunder was so absurd! This is not the first time that I have had to bewail the strange accidents that happen when the printer is pressing for the last slip of "copy" in the small hours of the morning. But here is my opportunity for repairing my oversight by saying that Miss Baird played her part to perfection, identifying herself with it so completely that one could not think of another actress in her place. For the matter of that, the part might have been written for her. It is that of an innocent child-wife, and girlish innocence is in every tone and gesture and action of Miss Dorothea Baird. She has the virginal serenity, the limpid wide-eyed gaze of some Madonna of Raphael. Hence she is invaluable to the play, the whole point of which turns upon the absolute innocence of Margaret Fairbairn. For Margaret receives the rudest of shocks which a child-bride can undergo, the discovery that her bridegroom has had what the French call a collage before marriage. Visiting a sick woman and her baby, she finds that the woman is her husband's cast-off mistress and that the baby is her husband's child. Thus is the Fool's Paradise of innocence shattered by the ugly facts of life.

Why did Mr. Barrie choose this subject? It is not a new subject. Scores of novels and plays have dealt with it. Have not Mr. Grundy and Mrs. Clifford just been disputing over their several versions of it? Nor, I venture to think, is it a subject suited to Mr. Barrie's talent, which, unless I am much mistaken, is a quiet meditative talent, altogether too delicate, too domestic, to handle "sexual" questions. Merely from the moral point of view I do not think Mr. Barrie's treatment of the theme profitable. Between the two women he does not hold the balance fairly. He makes the mistress a révoltée, a fierce, embittered "degenerate," a fury when she is not a maniac. Of the seductive, presumably sensual, influence she exercised over the man we see not a trace. On the other hand, the wife is a milk-and-water schoolgirl, whose instinctive modesty is not always clearly differentiated from conventional prudery. That she should return to her father's house on the discovery of her husband's "past" is natural enough. But that she should, long before she suspects that her husband is concerned in the matter, turn with horror from the fille-mère merely because the woman is "not married" is not natural, but merely "missish." In other words, both for mistress and wife Mr. Barrie has selected types which do not admit of the case between them being adequately stated. Contrast with this the treatment of the same theme in A Debt of Honour, which is now to be seen at the St. James's, and La Gioconda, which was the other day to be seen at the Lyceum. Mr. Grundy makes the mistress as innocent as the wife, shows, in fact, that women may enter upon a liaison as purely as they enter into matrimony. D'Annunzio shows that the influence of the mistress over the man may be as respectable (in the literal sense of the term) as the wife's—the artistic inspiration which she supplies being as important to an artist as orthodox domestic affection. Both these plays, observe, end in tragic catastrophe, and rightly so end, for death is needed to give dignity to the theme. But Mr. Barrie's play does not end in tragedy; really it does not end at all; it simply "peters out," and somewhat cynically too. The mistress takes herself off, and the wife departs, sadder but wiser, with her husband to resume her interrupted honeymoon. And so it comes about that, by travelling outside the range of his talent, a writer who in all our minds is associated with pleasantness, wholesomeness, and sweetness has contrived to produce a play which shows the seamy side of virtue and leaves a nasty taste in the mouth!
